PARABLE I.

"And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees ; therefore, every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down, and cast into the fire."—MAT. iii, 10.

The forerunner of Jesus was here giving that instruction to the people which was necessary for them to receive, in order that they might be prepared to receive the more mighty than himself. He showed them the futility of depending on their being descendants from Abraham as to their being accepted in that dispensation which was immediately to be introduced.

Although that circumstance was of consequence to them in respect to that shadowy dispensation which was waxing old and ready to vanish away, it could not serve them as an induction into that by which all things were to be made new ; by which the shadows of the law were to flee away, and Jew and Gentile, as of twain, made one new man.

Fruits meet for repentance are, therefore, required ; for as they stood in their law character, they were a generation of vipers, as is every child of Adam in the earthly character. And as those Pharisees were ever desirous of performing something whereby God might accept them and delight in them, it was proper for them to be informed, that good works or fruits alone would receive approbation, of which they, in the character of vipers, were destitute.

"And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees." Note the axe is an instrument by which the tree is severed from its roots, which, in the Parable, signifies the executive power of the law ; the trees every individual of mankind ; the root, (not roots) that one Adamic nature from which we all sprang. "Therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire."—Has any one, in or by the carnal mind, brought forth good fruit ? Is there any spiritual life in Adam the first nature ? It was said to him, "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." If we sprang from a spiritually dead root, can we possess any spiritual life derived from that root ? If we have no spiritual life, can we bring forth the fruits of righteousness ? If not, the axe must do its office ; the trees must be hewn down, that is, severed from the old root, cut off from the Adamic nature ; for in that nature we can never partake of the tree of life, for behold God placed cherubims and a flaming sword in the east, the place of light, that we in that nature, cannot approach the tree of life. It is, therefore, showed unto us, in the priesthood of the law, that neither the High Priests themselves, nor the people in their representatives, could enter the holy place until they were slain in the outer court, which was done by proxy, in those sacrifices which were offered for the priests and the people. The trees, when hewn down, must be cast into the fire ; that being consumed, in respect to the carnal or old man, there might no part of that life appear which was derived from Adam the first.

Further, see the nature of this fire, as described by Malachi iii. 2, 3, where Christ is represented by a refiner's fire, and by a fuller's soap ; whereby the sons of Levi were to be purified, that their offering might be in righteousness. And that we are right in respect to this fire, is made sufficiently evident by the words of John, in that he saith, speaking of Christ, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire," speaking to the Pharisees, whom he called a generation of vipers ; and here he noted the difference between his own baptism and that which Christ would administer. John does not say that Christ would baptize them with the Holy Ghost and fire, if they would willingly consent to his ministry ; but asserted, saying, "he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." We then observe, that the fire, into which the trees are cast, when hewn down, is the same with which he baptizes ; and that is what always accompanies the Holy Ghost. He, who has happily experienced the work of grace, in taking him from the wild olive tree and grafting him into Christ, knows well that the Lord contended with him by fire.

ILLUSTRATION.

As it is a thing well known that the foregoing parable has generally been applied, by christian commentators, very differently from the application, made by these notes, it is thought expedient to enlarge this edition by candidly considering suitable evidences by which the subject may be the more easily judged of.

The same reason which renders an illustration of this particular subject necessary, requires an illustration also of notes on other parables, which I propose the execution of, in as plain, impartial and scriptural a manner as God, by his grace, may assist me to do.

In my labors on this very important subject, I think it advisable to state the common use which has been made of the text, in as plain and concise a manner as is convenient; seek for the relation between the common explanation and the text with the context; consider suitable arguments to show the impropriety of the common application, and also to shew the consistency of the notes with the text, context and the general tenor of the gospel.

The doctrine of a future and eternal state of unmerciful punishment, having obtained almost universal assent in the christian church for many centuries, many of the parables spoken by our Saviour, as well as many other passages of scripture, have been generally used to prove and enforce that sentiment, among which this parable spoken by the forerunner of Christ is found.

I said of a future and eternal state of unmerciful punishment; for surely that punishment which is never to end, cannot be said to be administered in mercy, even by those who think they can see such punishment to be consistent with divine justice.

Agreeably to this doctrine, it has been generally supposed, that the true meaning of the above text is, that by trees is meant righteous and wicked men, and that every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit, signifieth every wicked man who bringeth not forth the fruits of righteousness. Hewing those trees down and casting them into the fire, signifieth the cutting off of the wicked from all their enjoyments, and casting them into the before mentioned state of future, eternal, unmerciful punishment.

Let us now look for the relation between the above explanation, and the text with the context. Why are the trees which bring not forth good fruit, hewn down and cast into the fire? Answer, because they did not bring forth good fruit, but evil fruit. This is the natural sense of the text. What is the evil fruit produced by those trees which are to be cast into the fire? Answer, sin. To this answer none will object. Now look carefully. Will the cutting off of the wicked from all possible comforts, and consigning them to future, eternal, unmerciful punishment, cause them to cease bringing forth evil fruit, and to bring forth good fruit? Answer, for that punishment which weans the creature from sin, and inclines him to righteousness, is by no means unmerciful, nor can it be endless. And surely it does not require a very critical investigation to show the impropriety of hewing down and burning trees, because they bring forth evil fruit, if this hewing them down and burning them, will in no degree prevent their bringing forth this evil fruit.

In the 8th verse, John required of those whom he calls a generation of vipers, to bring forth fruits meet for repentance; but in the 10th verse, he intimates that they must be hewn down and cast into the fire; and in the 11th verse, he informs them what he meant by their being cast into the fire. I indeed baptize you with WATER unto repentance, but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoe I am not worthy to bear; he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with FIRE. We now see that if Christ's baptizing that generation of vipers with the Holy Ghost and with fire, mean their being cast into future, eternal, unmerciful punishment, then the common application of this parable is correct; if not, then it is easy to see that all mankind standing in the same character, in which the unregenerate scribes and pharisees stood, they must be cut off from the olive tree which is wild by nature, and be grafted into the good olive tree, which is Christ, in order to bring forth the fruits of righteousness required, that Christ may be manifested as the Lord our righteousness. And that the Saviour's baptizing with the Holy Ghost and with fire, effects this necessary work of regeneration, will not be doubted. It is hardly necessary that I here say any thing on the subject of the consistency of my explanation of the above parable, with the general tenor of the gospel, as nothing can be more evident. If the gospel was a scheme of endless condemnation, sin and misery, I grant the explanation which I have given of this scripture would by no means accord with the general tenor of the gospel; but if the gospel be a scheme of salvation from sin and death, then these notes appear to agree with it.

AN APPEAL TO THE PUBLIC.

The subject which leads me to make the following appeal to a candid public, is one which would have been avoided, had it not been for circumstances, which render silence inexpedient. It is with reluctance that I attempt a vindication of my own character; for it is ever a matter of delicacy, for a man to attempt to speak or write in his own defence; nor would I now undertake the painful task, had the case been less aggravating; but, as it is, I cannot, conscientiously, let it rest.

In the 15th No. of the Gospel Advocate, Vol. 4, there is a communication addressed to Mr. Ragon, a Methodist preacher, who had slandered my character, with a design, (as I suppose,) of retarding the progress of the doctrine for which I contend. I therein called upon him to substantiate his statements through the same medium, if he could; and, also, to answer a few questions, which were proposed him; but, as yet, he has not answered me, and I fear, he never will. I have been informed, that he says he never will reply to my questions. Since, therefore, he has thus refused to reply, after waiting a long time, even till the patience of many of my brethren has been exhausted, I now give him another opportunity to repel my accusations, and answer some questions, with the hope that he will now reply.

Mr. Beals, a citizen of Pierpont, Ashtabula county, called on Mr. Ragon, and asked him if I ever sent him a challenge for a public debate? Mr. Ragon's answer was as follows: "I don't know what else you will make of it; for Mr. Sisson, who lives near Mr. St. Clair, told me that he, [Mr. St. Clair,] called on him with a special request, to attend one of my meetings, and there in the forenoon preach his sentiments in full; after which, I might reply." This conversation between Mr. Beals and Mr. Ragon, was given me in writing. A short time after this I called on Mr. Sisson, (who is a Methodist,) in the presence of Mr. Bruce, of Chardon, and asked him if he ever knew me to request the privilege of attending Mr. Ragon's meeting, in order to preach in debate with him? He answered that he did not. I again asked him, if he ever told Mr. Ragon, that I left such a request with him? His reply was, "No; neither do I believe that Mr. Ragon ever said so!" I again enquired, did you not tell him something that would give him such an impression? He answered in the negative. I then observed to him, that Mr. Ragon had said so, and I could prove it, by three or four good witnesses; therefore, one or the other of these, (if I should speak plain, I should say Methodists,) had uttered a base falsehood; or, to be a little more mild, have wilfully mistaken the fact!

Friendly reader; are you a believer in the soul-chilling doctrine of endless misery? If so, do you not believe that all LIARS shall welter in the flames of an endless hell of liquid fire, where waves of melted lava roll to all eternity? While the vindictive justice of your God, in darts of malignity without mercy, shall be hurled at their guilty souls? If this be your belief, surely you can have no hope for Mr. Ragon.... May God have mercy on him and his brethren, who have espoused his desperate cause!

Again: I beg the attention of the reader, to another circumstance. Mr. Ragon informed a woman in Salem, named Julia Ann Applebee, that he had conversed with a young woman, who had worked for me, and that she told him, that I made a "constant practice of swearing, in my family; that I swore more than I prayed." I now call on Mr. Ragon, to inform the public, through the medium of the Gospel Advocate, who this young woman is; where she lives; when she worked for me; when I used profane language; and what oaths I used? And I declare the story to be FALSE. No woman, man, or child, has ever heard me use profane language since I commenced preaching. But, if Mr. Ragon can disprove my assertion, he is at liberty to do it, and clear his skirts of guilt! And, if he refuses to comply with my proposals, I hope and trust, the public will give to each his due.

The reader will discover many severe charges in this communication, against Mr. Ragon, which I think can be sustained in any court of justice. I, therefore, wish no one to take upon himself any responsibility on my account; for I am determined to abide the result of a close investigation before the public; and, if I have done any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die.

If the Methodists will overlook the conduct of Mr. Ragon, in this case, what may we not expect from them hereafter! I have been advised by many of my brethren to institute a suit against him, but I have, as yet, deferred doing so, hoping he would appear before the public, in a vindication of what he has said.

Editors of the several Religious Papers, are humbly requested to give this statement an insertion, for the sake of one who wishes to have the truth brought to light; who pleads NOT GUILTY to the charges alledged against him by one or more, who dare not meet him in the field of investigation. That I have been severe, I admit; but, a case like this, I think requires severity.

DAVID ST. CLAIR, 2D.

Hamden, Nov. 15, 1826.

SENTIMENTAL.

[Selected for the Gospel Advocate.]

Five years had elapsed since I saw my friend, Lorenzo, the day after his union with his amiable Clarissa, cast a "lingering look" towards the venerable cottage of her father, and drive towards the rural spot destined for their future place of residence. The pursuit of happiness had led me from the circle of my friends, into distant parts; where I too often had observed the painful scenes of misery and wretchedness, which sin, ignorance, and folly produce, and which are entailed upon our species, by the want of a resolution to discard them, or a destitution of that knowledge which would annihilate the procuring cause of every moral evil.

While attempting to investigate the causes of inquietude, of woe, and of abject wretchedness, I had been led to conclude, that the want of an acquaintance with the pure principles of the Gospel, is perhaps, the cause, of incalculable misery. Surely, said I to myself, our kind CREATOR, has not, in establishing the laws of nature, rendered necessary, nor proper, those acute miseries so often experienced by his offspring..... The fowls of heaven, and beasts of the field, are evidently more happy, in proportion to what they are capable of experiencing, than the reputed "lord of creation." And is it not true, I inquired, that we invent a thousand wants and evils, in the gratification, and practice of which, there is, at best, but a momentary enjoyment? It is, if I mistake not, our pride, our extra-gance, our ignorance, and perhaps our unchastened ambition, which so frequently leads us to the portals of wretchedness and despair. Let man limit his desires to his own fireside, or at most to the circle of his friends, who, having been tried are found worthy of confidence; and, with a becoming resignation to the will of HEAVEN, his happiness will be complete, or at least as perfect as can be expected here below.

A train of reflections, similar to the foregoing, were passing through my mind as I rapped at the door of my friend. With mingled emotions of joy and apprehensiveness, I entered their dwelling, and saluted the friends of my youth. I had heard but little of them since their settlement in life; and it was impossible to restrain a degree of anxiety proportionate to the interest I felt in their welfare. Perhaps their humble dwelling had become the residence of disappointed hope and its concomitant misery: perhaps they had sought for happiness in the giddy circles of fashionable folly, and like thousands of others, had been rewarded with vexation and remorse: and, perhaps, by embracing the corrupting dogmas of a fashionable religion, they had become callous to the emotions of friendship, or the voice of charity. But these apprehensions were soon dispelled.

We were soon seated by the cheerful fire, engaged in conversation. By the side of the interesting Clarissa was seated her son of about four years of age, and, in her arms, an infant daughter of as many months. The glances of the father had attracted my attention; and every thing I beheld tended to convince me, that the happy pair were blessed with mutual affection. Health and contentment were seated upon their countenances, and the competence which their honest industry had acquired, was apparently received, and enjoyed, with thankfulness and gratitude. Surely, said I to myself, if happiness is to be found on earth, it is here. The mother caressed her infant, with the fondness of one whose soul was wrapped up in parental love, and listened, occasionally, to the innocent prattle of the urchin at her side, with a mother's fondness.

A momentary silence had occurred, and was agreeably interrupted by the mother. "These little ones," she said, addressing herself to me, "are considered by us, as rich blessings bestowed by heaven itself; as seals of our plighted and mutual love. Since our marriage, on which occasion you was present, we have been blessed with prosperity and happiness. Our all, this side the grave, is centered in our lovely children. Our joy is unutterable, while we witness the expansion of their faculties; nor is our happiness diminished, when we retrospectively survey our efforts to provide for them.... Our industry has been blessed, by our heavenly Benefactor; and we trust, that by a continuance of our efforts, with the blessing of heaven, our own and their wants, will be supplied. Lorenzo, you perceive, (she continued,) is apparently happy, and my enjoyment is enhanced by doing all in my power to render him so, and is not destroyed by any suspicions of inconstancy or want of affection for myself." As she paused, I found it difficult to refrain from expressing my emotions; and, involuntarily responded—you must be happy indeed!

A cruel thought obtruded upon my mind, and cast a momentary gloom over the pleasing scene. Oppressed with its weight, I ventured to express it. Your affectionate husband, madam, and your little children, with whose happiness your own is evidently identified, are doubtless indescribably dear to you; but, have you never been told, that, on account of the sin of our progenitors, even your little children have become liable to the wrath and curse of God! Yea, have you not been told, that possibly your FUTURE bliss will be enhanced, by beholding their unutterable woe and misery? And have you not been taught to believe it your duty, to be WILLING to witness all this, if it should appear to be the will of God to have it so? The chill of death, seemed for a moment to pervade the faculties of the mother; but soon a heavenly smile irradiated her countenance, and dispelled the unwelcome gloom. She replied:—"Tis true, we have heard such sentiments advanced, even from the sacred desk; but blessed be God, the impressions of that nature, so abhorrent, so destructive of rational piety, so repugnant to enlightened reason; nay, so hostile to the revelation of HEAVEN—have been eradicated by the illuminating spirit of eternal truth. Our minds have long since been liberated from the bondage of such unholy opinions, and we heed them not!" The light of Jehovah's countenance seemed to inspire her with love divine, as she proceeded. "God is LOVE; and hath commended his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners in due time Christ died for us. Nor did he die for us alone. He gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time. He died to redeem us from all iniquity; he was the propitiation for the sins of the whole world, and we, being sinners, and numbered among transgressors, feel for ourselves, that we have an interest in our redeemer. But these little innocents," she said, "who know no law, and are consequently incapable of wilfully violating any, whether human or divine, are not exposed to the penalty of any moral rule. Moreover, they were set forth by Christ, as patterns for our imitation, and well would it be for us all, if we imitated their humility and innocence more carefully. Yea, our blessed Saviour hath said, 'suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'

How then, can we doubt, therefore, that if they are taken from our arms by death, they will be embraced by our Saviour, and nourished by the God of all grace? No, sir, she continued; we, imperfect as we are, love our children; but God, Oh! delightful reflection! loves them and us, with a PERFECT LOVE. Believing thus, we are truly happy; and it is our heart's desire and prayer to God, that every parent may have the same holy and peace-giving faith."

As she ended, a tear of joy was seen trickling down her cheek, while a glow of generous pride, on the part of the happy Lorenzo, seemed to say "she is the idol of my heart."

The happiness of the moment was indescribable. Thy Gospel, Great God, I inwardly ejaculated, how precious—how consoling!..... Thy Love, all-gracious Heaven, how vast, how stupendous!—How little is known of thy nature, by those who fear thine implacable wrath! and how superlatively happy are those, who know thy will, and KEEP THY COMMANDMENTS.

EDITORIAL ADDRESS.

PATRONS OF THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE AND IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR: Four years have nearly elapsed, since the first number of this paper was offered to the public; and we felicitate ourselves, on being able to present you with the first number of the FIFTH VOLUME, in an improved dress, and under more propitious circumstances, than have hitherto attended the work.... It has been a desideratum, to have the ADVOCATE unshackled, either by the influence of pretended but misguided friends, or the fear of those whose errors it explodes. The object has at length been attained; and we pledge ourselves to the public, that so long as we are enabled to wield a pen, or offer a prayer to Almighty God, it SHALL BE a fearless advocate of gospel truth, and an impartial investigator of whatever concerns the present or eternal peace of our fellow beings.

In addition to what has heretofore been stated, relative to the course which we have marked out for ourselves, it is thought proper to give the following outline of our plan:

OUR CREED IS THE BIBLE. The scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, we take as the man of our counsel; and, it will be our constant endeavor to exhibit the truths therein expressed, in their native purity, simplicity, and loveliness. We do verily believe, that they are filled with the words of eternal life, salvation, and joy; and, thus believing, we shall honestly endeavor to recommend them to the regard of all men; vindicate them from the aspersions of the enemies of truth; and exhibit the impartial and superabundant love communicated through them to man, as the sacred medium of divine grace, so that the way-faring man, though a fool, may understand and believe.

Believing that the BIBLE, REASON, and COMMON SENSE, teach the ultimate triumph of Jehovah's Grace and Love, over Death, Sin, and Hell; we shall contend for "the faith once delivered to the saints," and vindicate the "restitution of all things," as spoken by the mouth of all God's holy prophets ever since the world began." Having constantly in view, the hope of a world's salvation, we shall use great plainness of speech, trusting the event with our Heavenly Father.

Being fully convinced, both from the history of past times, and our own experience, that superstition, bigotry, and intolerance, have in a measure been produced, upheld, and perpetuated in our world, by designing men, we shall endeavor to rescue the equal rights of man, from their unhallowed grasp; and expose the pretensions of those who take the place of God, in dooming to condemnation the world of mankind. In doing this, personalities will in all cases be avoided, unless persons become identified with error.

Holding it to be self-evident, that virtue and happiness, vice and misery, are inseparably connected, as cause and effect, we shall encourage virtue, that men may be happy; and expose vice, in the hideousness of its deformity, that it may be avoided. The honest inquirer after truth; the practical christian; the sober moralist; the philosophical reasoner; as well as the conscientious controversialist; will find in our columns, "a portion of meat in due season." Although we claim the right, to decide on the merits of any productions of our correspondents, yet well-written essays of suitable prolixity will meet with a cheerful reception, whether for or against the doctrines we maintain.

Not having been favored with a poetical talent, we shall select from the writings of others, to fill the corner allotted to sentimental productions of that kind; and content ourselves with soliciting the favors of those who court the muses. A judicious selection from the best authors, and the numerous papers received in exchange for ours, will render the Advocate both interesting and useful to our patrons.

In addition to the defence of truth, the exposition of error, the inculcation of religious and moral principles, and the ordinary subjects introduced into religious papers of this kind, we shall, in each number, give a brief summary of the most interesting intelligence of the day. This will be done with a view to save expence to our subscribers, and to render our paper interesting to our readers.

With this unvarnished statement of our plan, we submit our undertaking into the hands of our Creator, and the public; trusting in the all-prevailing righteousness of the former, and the acknowledged generosity of the latter. If the decision should be in our favor, that reward will be all that we desire; if against us, we shall endeavor to endure the trial, with becoming resignation. Our prayer to Heaven is, that our labors may be useful, in promoting the peace of our fellow beings; and that the benignant smiles of Omnipotence, may attend our patrons through the year, and for ever.

☞ Owing to a failure on the part of the paper maker we are compelled to issue this number on paper of a quality inferior to that which we had engaged; but have thought best to do so, rather than delay the publication. We are determined to have our paper issued PROMPTLY, let come what will.

EDITORS.

Those who are desirous of paying in advance for this volume, are requested to forward one dollar and fifty cents, as soon as convenient, to "J. GUTTEAU, Esq. P. M. Buffalo," or to the editors, free of postage.

DEFAMATION.

"Who steals my purse, steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands,
But he that filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed."

A great portion of our happiness is derived from social intercourse with society, in being surrounded by friends to whom we are united by the endearing bond of affection and friendship; friends, who have equal rights and privileges, and who claim from us, in return for their good will, a fellow feeling of mutual kindness and benevolent sentiments. But, notwithstanding the numerous claims which mankind, as the children of one parent, have on each other, is it not an obvious truth, that they too frequently call into action many uncharitable and unchristianlike feelings, which are founded on a disposition to lessen our neighbor's real or supposed good qualities? This evil habit of defamation is, assuredly, one of the greatest ills attendant on human society. If any good was to result from this contemptible practice, something might be urged in its excuse, but as it does not reflect any degree of credit on the defamer, nothing can be urged in extenuation of it.

By detracting from our neighbor's character, we do him the most serious injury by depriving him of his dearest earthly treasure, his reputation; for the loss of which he can never receive an equivalent.—In our pilgrimage on earth, we anticipate the deception of pretended friends and known enemies; and we are aware of the many, who bear the appearance of actual kindness and benignity, at the same time they are shedding their poisonous venom thickly around us, and are inwardly our greatest foes.—Let us all endeavor to bear in mind the "Golden Rule," and if we hear ill of our neighbor, let us not seek to augment the evil by making public any incident calculated to operate to his disadvantage, but in the true spirit of charity, labor to quench the flame by suffering it to pass unnoticed. E. L.

[From the Christian Register.]

Mr. Editor.—The following notes were found in the pocket book of a young lady after her decease. If you think their publication would be useful they are at your disposal.

"A few things which I desire constantly to keep in my mind.

1st. That it is the object of my life to prepare my soul for the enjoyments of heaven and to do all in my power to assist my fellow creatures in attaining the same end.

2d. That the eye of my God is at all times upon me.

3d. That I must keep a constant watch upon my thoughts, words and actions, and hourly carry on the work of self-examination.

4th. Let the love of God and gratitude to my Saviour, for what he has done for me, be the predominant emotions of my soul.

5th. Let the example of purity and holiness which Jesus has given us in his life be my standard of virtue, and let this be the object upon which my mental eye is continually fixed.

6th. Let me be ever striving to increase my stock of religious knowledge.

7th. Let me ever remember that prayer is the most solemn act in which I can be engaged, and let me never enter upon it with levity or without preparation.

8th. When I read the Bible let it be as I would read a message directly from the most High."

The Holy Inquisition.—It appears from documents which must be deemed authentic, that this infernal tribunal in Spain, during the eighteen years that an infamous wretch named Torquemada was inquisitor general, (to which office he was appointed by the most pious pope Sixtus VI. and the most catholic king Ferdinand V.) no less than 10,220 persons were burnt alive, 6,640 in effigy, and 97,371 sent to the galley or to prison; all under the horrible and blasphemous plea of supporting the mild and glorious doctrines of Jesus Christ. The grand total of the priestly murders and persecutions in Spain, are as follows; burned alive 34,658, in effigy 18,049, sent to the galley 288,214—besides those that were imprisoned, or quietly put to death, in dungeons, by starvation or disease for the honor of the cross! And these things are among the "ancient and venerable" institutions that the late Gouverneur Morris exhorted Spain to 'rejoice' in the restoration of, in a mild oration, which was listened to by a portion, (a little one only), of the American people, in the mad days of party spirit, not many years ago! It seems that the "holy inquisition" was first completely organized in 1203, by his holiness pope Innocent III; but it was his holiness pope Gregory IV, under whom it was authorised more fully to murder men, that Christianity might abound! There is a great deal of this infamous stuff still remaining in the world—and too much of a disposition to employ the fire and faggot even among ourselves, for the conversion of 'infidels.'—Niles Reg.

A GOOD REGULATION.—In Winthrop's Journal it is stated, that "in 1693, at the General Court, an order was made to abolish that vain custom of drinking to one another, and that upon these and other grounds. 1. It was a thing of no good use. 2. It was an inducement to drunkenness, and occasion of quarrelling and bloodshed. 3. It occasioned much waste of wine and beer. 4. It was very troublesome to many, especially the masters and mistresses of the feast, who were forced to drink more often than they would. Yet divers, even godly persons, were loth to part with this idle ceremony."—Salem Obs.

Mothers.—A pious, intelligent and faithful mother, is the greatest earthly blessing that a merciful providence can bestow on a child.—If she performs her duty, her offspring will rise up and call her blessed. It is evident from the biographies of Washington and Dwight, that their intellectual, moral greatness was derived from the blessing of heaven on the instruction and advice of their mothers. The same is no doubt true of many, if not all the worthies of our land, and the benefactors of our race.

"There is no greater weakness than for a man to be ashamed of his religion, because ignorant men despise it. Would you be ashamed of the light of the sun, because a company of blind men ridiculed the idea of light? Would you be ashamed of the noble faculty of reason, because madmen denied its existence?"

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Mr. Garnsey has made a motion in congress to inquire into the expediency of improving the harbor of Fayette, at Silver Creek, on the south shore of Lake Erie.

Mr. Jacob Barker, and others, which were found guilty under indictments for fraud, recently at New York, have taken their cases before the supreme court, on certiorari.

A meeting has been held at Watertown, for the purpose of devising means to render aid to the Greeks.

Allen Trimble, has been elected Governor of Ohio, by a majority of about 50,000 votes.

The merchants' clerks, at Canandaigua, have formed a mercantile library, at that village; the Governor and his lady made a donation to the same.

Fisheries.—The fisheries in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, according to a recent investigation, employ about 20,000 persons, and yield annually from 250,000 to 300,000 quintals of fish, or 250,000 barrels including fish of the different kinds: salmon, mackerel, herring, &c.

National Debt.—The reduction of the public debt comes in evidence of the general prosperity of the country, as well as of the prudence and wisdom of the government.—In 1817, the national debt of the United States was 123,000,000; and in January 1827 it will be less than $74,000,000, being a reduction of 50,000,000 in ten years.

Donation to the Greeks.—It is understood that a vessel will sail from Philadelphia in a few days for Greece with a cargo of twelve or fifteen hundred barrels of flour; a donation from the merchants and others of that city to the suffering Greeks.

Increase of Rochester.—The present population of this village, as we are informed by Mr. Elisha Ely, who has just taken the Census, amounts to 7,669.—Thus in about sixteen months, there has been an increase of 2,396 people.

It may be well to add, that of the 7,669 people in the village, there are

In the 1st, 2d, and 3d wards, on the west side of the Genesee, 4,839

Steam Carriage.—A gentlemen in Springfield, Mass. has constructed a steam carriage upon very simple principles, which bids fair to be a valuable improvement. It was designed as a model to test the principle; and the strength of a one horse power has only been applied. It moves up hill as well as otherwise, and carries eight men. Its cost was one hundred dollars. The proprietor is now erecting one of larger dimensions, with 5 or 6 horse power, estimated to cost $1000, and to consume one cord of pine wood per day.—Noah.

Safety Carriage.—A Mail Stage was publicly exhibited on the 15th inst. at Baltimore, having an apparatus for detaching the horses, and locking the wheels in cases of danger.

By inserting a brief SUMMARY of the news of the week, we effectually silence the clamors of those who demand Magazine postage for this paper. The Post Master General has decided that such an arrangement will exonerate our subscribers from paying any more postage than is lawful for a common newspaper. We hope that all our patrons will assert, and receive, their just rights hereafter. Legal postage is one cent per sheet within the state, and one cent and a half, out of the state and over 100 miles.

MARRIED.—In this village, on Monday last, by Mr. Crawford, Mr. B. Wilcox to Miss Lydia Ann Calender.

At Lewiston, on Thursday last, by Mr. D. M. Smith, Mr. Volney Spalding, to Miss ——— Alvord.

THE GAMESTER.

See where the victim stands ! not covered with flowers,
But compassed round with fiends ;—His haggard cheek,
His beamless eye—what tell they ?—Of lost hours,
With mute, but dreadful eloquence they speak !
Of fame and fortune blighted, hopes betrayed,
And all the fearful wreck one cherished vice has made.

Hark to you hollow laugh of desp'rate mirth,
That while it fires the brain, and lights the eye,
Sounds the last knell of peace ; owing its birth
To the deep pangs of mental agony.
'Tis the convulsive joy of wild Despair,
Wrung from the tortured heart—a joy that Demon's share.

Oh, love of play ! so called in fashion's phrase,
Blighter of social hearths and peaceful hours ;
Cank'rer of manhood's fair and opening days,
That but for thee had else been strewn with flowers ;
Thou direst passion of the human heart,
None but a master's hand can paint thee as thou art !

Oh ! vice of all most hurtful to the soul,
Climax of every other vice—the mind
That once acknowledges thy fell control,
Spreads desolation round it ; like the wind
That sweeps the desert in its poison'd wrath,
Shedding where'er it breathes destruction in its path !

Oh, vice of all most deadly ! on thy shrine
Nature's soft links, love's sweet and holy ties,
Fall early victims—all the bonds that twine
Around man's heart, light up a sacrifice
More cruel than on Bramah's bloodstained pyre,
Where Hindoo mothers joy to see their babes expire !

Fame, honor, fortune, all are swept away,
All swell the gen'ral wreck ;—why stands he here
A ruin'd hopeless wretch ?—As breaks the day,
He quits the scene of plunder ;—in his ear
Ring the still rattling dice ;—his throbbing brain
Is crowded now with thoughts, that ne'er shall rest again.

Rushing with horror through the silent streets,
And shrinking from himself, he seeks his home
(Once 'twas a happy one,)—his pale wife greets
His wished return with smiles ;—how can man roam
From woman's calm endearments to partake
Those scenes that of his soul a leafless desert make ?

Ah ! she has listen'd with a beating heart
To every passing footstep ;—she has told
Each ling'ring hour's dull chime with frequent start,
And tears that none might chide, and none behold ;
And she has kiss'd her infant in his sleep,
Praying that heaven from him such fatal vice may keep !

But now she meets the lost one with a smile,
That should seem cheerful—save that her pale brow
And faded cheek tell other tales the while
Of sufferings which her lips will ne'er avow ;
Fondly she clasps the wanderer to her breast—
Alas ! not even there can his wreck'd heart find rest !

She leads him to the couch where calmly sleeps.
His beggar'd child ;—then e'en the gamester's soul
Owns all a father's feelings ! See, he weeps—
(But they are tears that madden as they roll—)
Oh ! drops, by years of anguish cheaply bought,
Could ye but wash away the ruin he has wrought !

It may not be !—already on his brow
Cain-like, is stamp't the burning mark of shame ;
And the chill hand of scorn is pointing now
Its withering finger at his blighted name ;—
It may not be ! ere sinks another sun,
Self-murder crowns his work of guilt—Despair's last work—is done. Mrs. C. B. Wilson.

FROM MOORE'S MELODIES.

A BEAM of tranquillity smil'd in the west,
The storms of the morning pursued us no more ;
And the wave, while it welcom'd the moment of rest,
Still heav'd, as remembering ills that were o'er !

Serenely my heart took the hue of the hour,
Its passions were sleeping, were mute as the dead,
And the spirit becalm'd, but remember'd their power,
As the billow the force of the gale that was fled !

I thought of the days when to pleasure alone
My heart ever granted a wish or a sigh ;
When the saddest emotion my bosom had known
Was pity for those who were wiser than I !

I felt how the pure, intellectual fire
In luxury loses its heavenly ray ;
How soon, in the lavishing cup of desire,
The pearl of the soul may be melted away !

And I prayed of that Spirit who lighted the flame,
That pleasure no more might its purity dim ;
And that sullied but little, or brightly the same,
I might give back the gem I had borrow'd from him !

The thought was ecstatic ! I felt as if Heaven
Had already the wreath of eternity shown ;
As if, passion all chasten'd and error forgiven,
My heart had begun to be purely its own !

I look'd to the west, and the beautiful sky
Which morning had clouded, was clouded no more :
" Oh ! thus," I exclaim'd, can a heavenly eye Shed light on the soul that was darken'd before !"

In Geneva, on the 21st ult. Walter Grieve, Esq. aged 52, Brig. Gen. of the 4th Brigade of N. Y. State Artillery.

In Glen, Montgomery co. N. Y. on the 28th of Oct. last, Miss Polly Reese, sister of Br. W. I. Reese of West Mendon, Munroe co. aged about 20 years. It need only be said, **** " why mourn her loss ?

She lived—she died !—she lives to die no more ;

Her sorrows, pains, and woes, forever o'er ;

Death, sin, and hell, have lost their cruel sway,

She lives with Christ in an eternal day ;

For God is Love."

THE EXPOSITOR.

"PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

THE PARABLES.

Those interesting portions of the New Testament commonly called the parables, contain such a fund of information, that an exposition of each one, in the progress of this volume of the Advocate, will, doubtless, receive the attention and approbation of our readers. We do not suppose ourselves capable of throwing much light upon them, in addition to what has already been done by others; nor shall we, in all cases, attempt to add any thing to the information already given to the public by our brethren; but shall endeavor to give, in this volume, a full and lucid exposition of each parable, either in extracts from the writings of others, or in words, if not ideas, of our own. Several of the parables have been heretofore explained in this work, perhaps to the satisfaction of our readers; but as knowledge is progressive, some thoughts may be suggested, upon a reconsideration of the same subjects, which will be of service to the reader; and also, since our subscription list is undergoing an alteration, and receiving an increase of many new names, even a republication of the same may be interesting to many, and perhaps with the contemplated additions, of service to all. In the first number of this volume will be found the first of the contemplated series, under the head of "THE EXPOSITOR;" by referring to which each week, the reader will find an attempt at an elucidation either of some one of the parables, or an explanation of some difficult or controverted portion of the scriptures.

[From Ballou's Notes on the Parables.]

PARABLE II.

"Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."

MAT. iii. 12.

The main central idea contained in this verse, and that which we understand thereby, is easy and familiar to our senses, and signifies a change from a state of nature. While wheat is growing in the field, it is encompassed with chaff; this is its natural state, which shews the natural state of man in which he is encompassed with the imperfections of Adam the first, who was made subject to vanity.—When the wheat is brought into the floor, it is for the purpose of taking its substance from its state of nature, that it may be better prepared for acceptable use; by which we are taught that circumstance into which God will bring the creature. For, as I have before represented the creature by the tree cut off from its root, so now we see him represented by wheat reaped down, or cut off from the stock on which it grew in the field, and lying on the floor.—Here pause, and open your bible to Micah iv. 11, 12, 13, and learn the intention of the Lord in bringing the enemies of Zion into his floor as sheaves. The daughter of Zion is commanded to arise and thresh; for which purpose, God promises to make her horn iron and her hoofs brass, that thereby many people might be beaten to pieces, but their gain was to be consecrated unto the Lord, and their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth: So as wheat is the substance of the growth, it is to be gathered into the garner of Christ, which is the church, or covenant represented by Sarah, or Jerusalem which is above, which is the mother of us all. "But he shall burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." We cannot conceive of more than one unquenchable fire, and that one is God, as it is written, our God is a consuming fire; it cannot be supposed that this fire is quenchable, neither can we with propriety suppose another unquenchable fire, as that would be supposing another nature equal to himself.

This fire is often alluded to in scripture, but Isaiah xxxiii. 14, is sufficient with the other hints already given: there the question is asked, "Who among us shall dwell with devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" And in the 15th verse the question is answered: "He that walketh righteously," &c. By which we learn, that unholiness cannot abide this fire, nor the wicked in the character of sinfulness, but purity and holiness; and men, in that character, may dwell even on high, and their place of defence be the munition of rocks, to whom bread shall be given, and waters be sure.

ILLUSTRATION.

The common use which has been made of this parable, is the same which has been made of the former; and it is evident that they were both spoken on one subject, and that their meaning is similar.

By wheat, in this text, commentators in general understand righteous men, and by chaff, wicked men; by gathering the wheat into the garner, is meant the receiving of the righteous into heaven and eternal happiness, and by burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire, is meant the future, eternal, unmerciful punishment into which the wicked will be cast.

As this use of the text is as dishonorable to the Saviour, and as tormenting to man as any use that could possibly be made of the text, the reader will not be surprised if there should appear to be no relation between the text, with the context, and the common use which divines have made of it. What do our divines mean by the righteous? Answer, those who have been regenerated and born again. What were they before? Answer, children of wrath even as others. If an unconverted man be chaff, and this same man by conversion become wheat, then chaff is converted into wheat.—Why then does the text say that the wheat is to be gathered into the garner, but the chaff burned up with unquenchable fire? Would a grower of wheat burn his chaff, if he could convert it into wheat, especially if he could procure no wheat but by the conversion of chaff? Again, what analogy can any body see between the ideas of the burning up of chaff, and the future, eternal, unmerciful punishment of wicked men? The burning up of chaff surely means a total destruction of chaff.—Who would pretend that chaff could be burnt up in a fire, and still remain chaff as before? As it is easy for the reader to see the impropriety of converting chaff into wheat, or of burning up the chaff in unquenchable fire, and having the chaff still remain chaff in the fire eternally, so it is equally easy to see the total want of any relation between the text and the use which divines have made of it.

In the notes on this parable the reader may see their analogy with the text, the context, and the general tenor of the gospel. Man is represented in two characters in the scriptures, as may be seen in St. Paul's 1st epistle to the Corinthians, xv. 45, 46, 47, 48, 49. "And so it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven. And as is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." As wheat is encompassed with chaff while growing in the field, so are mankind encompassed with the imperfections of the first man, Adam; and as the wheat is separated from the chaff, so the gospel dispensation is designed to separate mankind from all the imperfections of this natural state, and perfect the whole in Christ, the second man, who is the Lord from heaven.

It may be well for the reader to open his bible and read the context, and observe that fire is spoken of in verses 10, 11, 12. In the 10th verse John says that every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down and cast into the fire; in the 11th verse he tells the Pharisees that Christ should baptize them with the Holy Ghost and with fire; and in the 12th he says that Christ will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire. From these passages it is evident that the fire into which the trees were to be cast, the fire with which the Saviour baptizes, and the fire which burns up the chaff, are the same fire. And as this is the fire which accompanies the Holy Ghost, in its quickening and life giving operations, it is perfectly consistent with the text and context to suppose that this unquenchable fire is the fire of divine love, which is God himself, for God is love. Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it. This eternal, unquenchable fire of divine love is the great love which St. Paul speaks of to the Ephesians, chap. ii. 4, &c. "But God who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ." Rom. v. 8. "But God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." These scriptures show us as plainly as can be expressed, that God loves his offspring, man, while he is a sinner, even while he is dead in sins. Where then can be the propriety of explaining the above parable, or any other, to prove and enforce the idea that God will punish eternally and unmercifully, those his offspring, whom he loves with an unquenchable love?

It is hoped that none into whose hands these notes may fall, are so blinded by the unwarrantable prejudices of education, as not to see that to explain this and other parables to mean the final reconciliation, purification, and complete sanctification of sinners, is more consistent with the general tenor of the gospel than the contrary idea.

I said above, that the idea generally entertained of this parable, was the most dishonorable to the Saviour, and tormenting to man, of any to which the text could be applied, and I am satisfied that the statement is correct, and that no person will undertake to controvert it in any way by which they can be conveniently answered. To suppose that he who was sent of God, for the express purpose of saving sinners, to which end all power in heaven and on earth are committed to him, will exercise that very power to make those whom he came to save, endlessly miserable, is as dishonorable an idea as can be entertained of Christ, and surely no idea can be more tormenting to mankind.

How widely different such an opinion is from the testimony of the angel to the shepherds. "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."

While the false doctrine which this and many other scriptures have been forced to support, have been urged with a zeal which becomes a better cause, to the sorrow, mourning, grief and despondency of thousands, the true doctrine taught by them is calculated to fill the rational mind with the most exalted ideas of the scheme of salvation, the peace of God, which surpasses all the enjoyments of an earthly nature, those joys unspeakable which are full of glory, and that love and charity towards our fellow men, which are the bond of perfectness.

CONTROVERSIAL.

We copy the following remarks on revivals from the CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER. They refer to an article on the same subject from the CHRISTIAN REGISTER, which is also copied below. Both articles are written in a becoming style, and are worthy the attention of every one who is desirous of knowing the truth.

REVIVALS.

We have inserted the article on a preceding page, from the Boston Christian Register, because we believe the remarks are, generally, correct and reasonable. The writer confines himself to obvious facts.

The triumphant and insolent tone, in which modern "revivals" are trumpeted abroad, is truly astonishing. The advocates for those animal excitements, appear to boast of their success, as though the work was uniformly attended by signal evidences of a miraculous interposition of divine power. They seem to forget, or rather conceal, many humiliating facts, accompanying or following those irrational scenes. They treat those contemptuously, who cannot in conscience, say, they believe such excitements are ascribable to the agency of the Holy Ghost. These Revivalists (if we may coin a word to express our meaning,) exhibit but one side of the story. They tell us of their marvellous works, in making converts, but never divulge the many indecorous and lascivious circumstances which follow. It is known to many of us, that in the midst of powerful revivals, the very leaders and principal actors in them, have been detected in the most infamous deeds. Let revivalists ask for names, places, and dates, and they shall be forwarded forthwith. Still, we accord to our religious opposers, all that is their due. We cheerfully grant that many of those, who have been the subjects of those religious excitements, are honest, upright and virtuous people; and are entitled to the highest respect. But, we deny that these excitements made them honest, good people. From a very extensive acquaintance with them, we hesitate not to say, that we never yet knew an instance, in which a revival converted a dishonest man, to an honest one; a miser, to feelings of generosity; or a tattler, to a peaceable, quiet citizen. We have frequently said, and now repeat it, that if they will produce one solitary instance of the kind, we will believe we may have been mistaken. But, readers, the thing will not be attempted. Such events, if they occur at all, "are, like angel visits, few, and far between."

We have no pleasure in exposing the errors, or even the iniquities of zealots. But, in common with others, we claim the right of undictated opinion. The writer of this notice, once shared, in what is technically called "a revival," but it was then called "a reformation;" he has lived in the midst of several frantic excitements, where multitudes were all on flame, like burning straw; when some men, but many more women and children were sighing, groaning, screaming, falling down, seeing visions, &c. keeping up their religious orgies early and late;—and are we now to believe, that we are not qualified to judge candidly of such scenes? Are we to be scoffed and ridiculed, because we cannot pronounce them the supernatural work of God? or say "Shibboleth," according to modern orthodoxy? If so, we must make our defence, by appealing to facts. Let our opposers carry on their work, in their own way; but let them not hurl their shafts at us, because we have too much experience in those incantations, to be overcome by them. We respect the sincere and upright among them, let their zeal be ever so vehement; and will not wound their feelings by an exhibition of humiliating facts, so long as they manifest proper courtesy.

Most of the orthodox journals are filled with accounts of missions and revivals. The first relate to many interesting topics, and constitute by far the most interesting and valuable part of these publications. With regard to revivals, too, there is certainly nothing for which we should pray and endeavor more earnestly, than for a real revival of religion; and we can easily conceive of judicious and well written accounts of any remarkable improvement in the religious condition of a town or neighborhood, serving to convince others of what may be done by well directed effort, and stimulating them to similar exertions. Some of these accounts may therefore be read with pleasure and advantage; but to others, and to the practice of inserting all accounts indiscriminately, we object strongly. Many of them are weak and silly beyond expression—such as instead of inclining men of sense to uncommon attention to religion, must have an effect, so far as they have any effect, to disgust them with it, by associating it with ignorance and mental imbecility. Christians should remember, those especially, who write for the public, that they are not more accountable for the doubts, than they are for the disgust, they occasion. We extainly should respect the religious experiences of the weakest brother, if convinced of his sincerity; but there is no excuse for exposing them. It is true, all these accounts will be swallowed greedily by those, who mistake religious gossiping for religion itself; but this is a propensity, which those who assume the office of guiding, should seek to discountenance; not cater for it.

We also believe that the frequent publication of these accounts has a tendency to inflate the pride of those instrumental in getting up the excitement in question; and indeed, that these accounts often originate in this pride. It is telling the world what they have done. True they were but instruments, they will tell you; but where all are but instruments who does not perceive, that the glory consists in being the best and most effective instrument. To be sure they were but humble instruments, they will tell you—aye, humble. In the thirteenth century, when the ascendancy of the Pope was at its greatest height, he never forgot to style himself “the servant of servants.” Every body knows, that these excitements have come to be regarded as almost entirely the effect of personal influence, and those who may have shown themselves to possess this influence in a remarkable degree, are sent for from place to place; and to suppose that this can be done, and so much publicity given to it, without flattering the vanity of these persons, or increasing their self-complacency, would argue a strange ignorance of human nature.—Men mistake, if they think that the ambition of the clergy cannot be gratified without political power. There was more in the life of such a man as John Wesley, to feed personal ambition, than that of a Dominic, Loyole, or Laud.

Besides, in most of these communications respecting revivals the cloven foot of party appears. Often the main object of the writer is not to show what the Lord has done, but what his party has done. Indeed, a disposition is manifested at times to make the whole question of a man's orthodoxy turn on his favoring revivals; as if all sects did not favor revivals, when convinced that they are really revivals of religion. When we are told to favor revivals, it is not meant, certainly, that we should favor all the excesses which have been committed under this name—the excesses of some of the early Anabaptists or the French Prophets, for example. It is certainly meant that we should use discrimination; and this is all for which any sect contends—to distinguish the genuine from the spurious.

Something should also be said of the credit due these accounts, as they are often given.—We have met with more than one person, who has received from an orthodox newspaper his first intimation of the existence of a famous revival, which, according to the newspaper had been going on for weeks in his own neighborhood, and under his very windows. These accounts may help to keep up the spirits of a party, but they give very deceptive views of the real state of religion in the community; for even where the statements themselves are true, they are always deceptive, from what is omitted or overlooked. They tell us how many persons are under concern of mind; how many have joined the church. But they do not tell how many families have been divided in consequence, how many parishes have been broken up, how many minds have been disgusted with the whole subject of religion; nor how soon the excitement declines, nor how many of the subjects of it relapse into their former courses, and become worse than ever.—They do not tell how much intermeddling, censoriousness and spiritual pride, the excitement generates in those who partake of it, nor the questionable means employed in getting it up, nor the follies and excesses to which it sometimes leads; nor the bad effect all this has on the rest of the community, who do not believe in it, who despise it. They do not tell the influence it has on the society and enterprise of the place, nor its political bearings, nor the very serious consideration, that the evil which it does is commonly real and lasting, while the good is often illusive and evanescent.

To form a correct opinion respecting the nature and influence of the religious excitements, commonly called revivals, knowledge must be had on all these particulars; and the facts giving it can be communicated by those only who reside on the spot, and know the whole history of these excitements from the beginning to the end. Persons so situated would do an important service to truth, pure religion, and the public good, by making such communications. It is known to those who have read Dr. Chauncey's Seasonable Thoughts on the State of Religion, how much advantage he derived from this sort of aid in the position of that invaluable work. It is only necessary to add, that we should open our columns with pleasure to any such communications, if written with candor and seriousness, and with an obvious design, while they expose false religion, to recommend and cherish the true. In this way the materials may be collected for a work, which we hope will not be always wanting—a fair and full history of Revivals of Religion.

CHRISTIAN DISCIPLESHIP.

“Then said Jesus unto his disciples, if any man will come after me, let him deny himself, take up his cross, and follow me.”—MATT. xvi. 24.

It is a great and good acquisition to become a genuine disciple of Jesus Christ. But there are too many, we have reason to fear, whosp views of the subject are extremely superficial. They do not appear to consider, that men at this day, may be as really the followers of Jesus, as at any former period, though they cannot in every respect, be equal to the primitive disciples. The suspicion that men are incapable of following Christ, in an evangelical sense, is attended with many serious disadvantages. For in the same degree that we are convinced that a thing is unattainable, we neglect the means which are necessary to its attainment.—To remove all suspicions of this nature, let it be considered, we have, in the scriptures of the New Testament, a very fair account of our Saviour's preaching—of his doctrine, precepts and examples. In the text, we have the very requisition which was essential to discipleship, when it was delivered; and I know not that any alterations have been made, as to the terms of admission into the school of Christ.

Let us endeavor to throw some light on this subject, by attending to a few particulars.

1. It is requisite that a man become a christian from choice, or from a sober conviction of the value and excellence of the christian religion. Those who profess christianity, by constraint, or from motives of mere worldly policy, ambition or pride, without discovering an amiableness and glory in the character of Christ and of his cause, are not the followers recognized in the text. The profession will be formal and vain, unless the act be conscientious and voluntary. "If any man will come after me." If he has taken all the circumstances of the case into consideration, and on mature reflection is satisfied that an espousal of my cause would be desirable, then, let him come after me. Hence the general invitation is, "Whosoever will let him come;" that is, whosoever really chooses to serve me instead of satan, let him take my yoke upon him. It is said,

"Is of the same opinion still."

2. To be a true disciple, a person must give himself up to the Saviour, for instruction. We must be convinced of his superiority, and of his ability to teach and enlighten us in spiritual and in eternal things. Hence it is said, let each one "deny himself." Let him become teachable and docile; ready to receive divine instruction. Circumstances may occur, in which the command of Christ may be inconsistent with what we should deem prudence and good economy. But we should remember the declaration, "He that would save his life, shall lose it." We ought to be satisfied that Christ is a competent leader, before we engage in his service; but when enlisted, we should follow his directions.

When our children enter a school, they have to deny themselves, and submit to the judgment of the instructor. But all the self-denial which is required, when the teacher is competent to his employment, is, that submission to the regulations of the school, and attention to study; which are necessary to the improvement of the pupils. The requirements of Christ are suited to the condition of mankind, in different ages of the world; so that, at no period would it be unsafe, all things considered, to yield them obedience. Indeed, our safety, as an highly favored people, consists in a cheerful conformity to the law of the spirit of life, in Christ Jesus. All the self-denial which christianity now imposes on men, is, that they should not abuse their talents, time and privileges; but should conduct in a rational, sober and dignified manner.

3. Christian discipleship requires a preparation of heart, by which difficulties and disappointments may be met, with a good degree of patience and fortitude. We should be prepared to face the storm of adversity and breast a phalanx of opposition and persecution, with a firmness, becoming the good soldier of the cross. Christians profess to worship God, through a Mediator, who suffered Crucifixion. They take up their cross by following Christ's example, so far as duty requires. It was the ardent love of Jesus, which enabled him to triumph over temptation, opposition, and fiery persecutions; and nought but this same divine principle can produce in the conduct of his followers, a corresponding devotedness to the requirements of Heaven.

But, if none are real Christians, except such as take up their cross, so as to act contrary to their natural inclination, where, in the name of wonder, are Christians to be found? In what respect do professors deny themselves the elegancies and luxuries of life, where they are able to enjoy them? Where is the man, whose parsimony or poverty does not prevent, that does not enjoy the best that our fields or markets afford? Which do Christians most resemble, the rich man or the beggar, mentioned in the parable? If their clothing is not "purple and fine linen," it is something of equal costliness and splendor. Shew us the fashionable Christians, who take up their cross according to the popular notions concerning this subject. Let it be soberly remembered that whereas, on the one hand, we are not required to deny ourselves of the blessings which God has bestowed on us, for our good, so on the other, we are not allowed, as rational beings and as christian disciples, to pamper our pride, cloy our appetite, and revel mid scenes of luxury and sensual gratifications.—No; the great art of human prudence, consists, in "using the world, as not abusing it." The wisdom even of a christian, is exhibited to the greatest advantage, in what is called self-government. It is displayed to admiration, when all the propensities and passions of our nature, are controlled by the laws of reason, and kept in due subordination to the good principles of religion in the heart. Keep sober reason and religion at the helm, and you will be safely conducted through the gales of pleasure and the storms of passion, to the desired haven.

4. The last requirement is, that, as disciples, we not only learn the doctrine and precepts of our Teacher, but also follow his examples.—Much, indeed, is implied in the simple expression, “follow me.” It alludes to a practical illustration of Christ’s religion, as professed by his followers. We have not room to enlarge on this part of the subject, nor can it hardly be thought necessary. The Bible, especially the New Testament, is the principal book to be used in the school of Christ. In that precious Book, then, you are to learn the lessons of duty and meditate on the innumerable examples of a Saviour’s kindness, which we are called upon to imitate. Follow Jesus to the house of mourning; to the chamber of sickness; to the habitation of the unfortunate, and the hut of the industrious poor. Follow him to the widow’s desolate mansion, where the fatherless cry in vain for bread. Let it be seen by your fruits, that in all these things, you do, like your honored Master, “go about, continually doing good.” It should be the pride, the ambition, the joy of our hearts, to tread in the footsteps of the FRIEND of the needy. And without this practical commentary of our doctrine, it is but a dead letter, instead of the saviour of life unto life.

Are there any who have professed to follow the impartial Saviour, that will begin to complain, as did some of the disciples of old, “These are hard sayings; who is able to bear them?” But if they complain that we draw the chords of moral obligation too close, we hope it will no more be pretended that our doctrine is so lax as to please the carnal heart! We labor for the moral improvement of society and for the dissemination of truth and knowledge.

And while we express our felicity that so many young people of intelligent and virtuous habits are disposed to seek for religious instruction, in our sanctuaries, we would charitably hope there may be none, who, like the young man, mentioned by St. Mark, (xiv. 51,) embrace our religion in so loose a manner, that should they experience some severe attacks and be laid hold of with violence, would take a precipitate departure. It is an injury to our cause, for young men of good moral habits, to leave our meeting with the hope of adding to their worldly estate, or to court the esteem and applause of the rich and the noble. Thanks be to God, that there are so many whose dignified deportment and constant attendance on religious worship, where truth impartial and eternal is taught, who can be considered the substantial ornaments of the School of Christ.

THE PREACHER.

GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

A FRIENDLY HINT.

TWELVE QUESTIONS TO THE UNIVERSALISTS OF BUFFALO.

It is a well known fact, that the GOSPEL ADVOCATE has been read by many of the inhabitants of this village, with very little advantage to the publisher, during the four years it has been issued from the press in this place. The few faithful friends, who in prosperity and adversity, have afforded us their patronage, are entitled to our warmest thanks; and now, for the benefit of such as have taken our paper for their own and their neighbor’s accommodation, as well as on our own account, we invite the attention of our friends to what follows.

Seventeen hundred copies of this work have been issued weekly from the press, during the last year; and such is the present aspect of affairs, that it is thought expedient to extend it still farther! We have therefore, commenced the FIFTH volume, by publishing two thousand and seven hundred copies. We do this, believing that within six months from the date of the first number, every copy will be called for. It may be thought that we are too sanguine, and hazard too much in the undertaking; but, being tolerably well acquainted with the condition and wants of our brethren in this region, we are induced to think, that a less number would fail of supplying the demand. More than three hundred subscribers have added their names to our list since the present proprietors have assumed the management of the work; and as yet, we have only begun! And now, what say ye, brethren, universalists of the great “Emporium of the West?” How much have ye contributed towards the advancement of the work? Have your arms been unitedly raised in its defence, or your hands opened for its encouragement? While your brethren in other places, even in places quite remote from this, of influence and respectability, have been mindful of us, and the glorious cause in which we are engaged, what have ye been doing? Have not some of you dear brethren, been listening to the syren song of “popularity,” and been spell-bound by the honied accents of pride rendered perverse by your own indifference; nay, is it not true, that many have voluntarily subjected themselves to the necromancy of this world’s wisdom, and become the willing subjects of its reign? While your brethren, on every hand, have been mourning over the miseries of the world, entailed upon our species by the powers of darkness,—while they have labored and suffered reproach, in the cause which some of you have espoused, have you offered up a prayer for their success, or dropped a tear for their want of it? When your opponents have told you that the public feeling was against the ingenuous course we have pursued, the plainness of speech which we have used, and the frankness with which we have exposed the errors of the world, have ye not assented to their declarations without opening your eyes to behold the march—the unprecedented march of that very cause which they affect to despise, and which you profess to have espoused? And are you not even now, measurably identified with the enemies of our doctrine—so listless, inactive, and indifferent to the interests of Zion, that some of you are hardly distinguished from the lovers of “greetings in the market-places?”

The foregoing inquiries are not made out of any ill will towards you nor any person on earth; but they are made with a view to awaken the sleeping energies of our friends; to bring into exercise the faculties of every free-born soul; and to apprise you of the danger and disgrace that await the indolent; as also, to stimulate, if possible, our brethren to the performance of long neglected duty. A want of attention to the interest of our cause has been the principal reason of its want of complete success. Our opponents are emboldened by our apathy, rendered insolent by our inactivity, and made sanguine in their hopes of our defeat by our want of engagedness in the cause we inwardly approve. Nay, they fear, lest by one mighty and united effort our ends should be attained: and therefore, they fail not to use their endeavors to disunite us, that we may fall. They have said that our doctrine is unpopular, and we have believed them, until facts stare us in the face to prove the contrary; they have held out to us the husks of error and some have fed upon them; they have assailed us and some have yielded; they have pretended to be our friends and some have taken them at their word!—Shall it remain so? Shall we yet tamely bend our necks to the yoke which they delight to fasten upon us? Shall the ADVOCATE, which has stood alone against the phalanx of its enemies,—which has scattered to the winds of heaven their refuge, be driven from its moorings by the winds of a “mongrel theology” for the want of encouragement at home? We mean not to insinuate that this work can be silenced by the batteries of its enemies—It will live when orthodoxy is dead,—but we mean that it needs a more liberal encouragement from the friends of liberal principles in this place, and unless it receives it, the work must be published elsewhere. With a patronage of two thousand subscribers, many of whom are the first men in this and other states, it cannot and SHALL NOT DIE! But unless our brethren and friends in this place will aid us,—will strengthen our feeble hands,—and encourage our way-worn hearts, we must despair of its continuance here. Think not, brethren and friends, that we beg—to dig we are not ashamed,—we only ask you to do justice to yourselves, to the confidence of your distant brethren, to your consciences, to YOUR GOD AND HIS SALVATION! We therefore entreat you to awake, and arise from your slumbers. Put on the whole armor of God and truth, and HEAVEN will bestow the needed help, and grant you a speedy victory through Jesus Christ our Lord.

MISCELLANY.

DEDICATION AND ORDINATION.

On the two hundred and sixth anniversary of the Landing of the Pilgrims, the “First Universalist Society in Plymouth, Mass.” dedicated their New Meeting House to the worship and service of the living and true God, and set apart, by solemn ordination, Br. Jas. H. Bugbee, to the pastoral charge of the society. The services are represented as having been impressive, appropriate, and refreshing. The period chosen for the setting apart of the house and their pastor, added much interest to the solemnities of the occasion, and deserves to be recorded for the benefit of those who come after us. We can most fervently unite with our Brother Pickering, of the Telescope, in praying God, that “long may their present happy union be perpetuated, and their children, and their children’s children, realize, within the consecrated walls of their sanctuary, ‘How good, and how pleasant it is, for brethren to dwell together in unity.’”

A Minister of Marblehead in advice to his students, says, “I advise you to the judicious use of notes. Notes! I say, not written sermons. You may say some use written sermons, and do excellently well with them. I reply, if they do excellently well with them, I think they would do excellently better without them.” Dr. Staughton once said, (on the subject of reading sermons,) “I think that what is gained in correctness is lost in power.”

In a list of officers to a female charitable institution in N. York, we see the names of “Mrs. General Hamilton,” and the “Reverend Mrs. M’Auley.”—Religious Inq.

INTEMPERANCE.—The editor of the Middletown (Ct.) Gazette, remarks that “there is one excellent mode in which gentlemen may do much to prevent the abuse of ardent spirits, and that is not to drink them. The example of respectable persons will do more towards effecting a reformation of the dissolute, than moral lectures, or associations for the correction of vice.”

CHOICE SAYINGS.

MIDAS was so great a man, that every thing he touched changed into gold,—altered case now; touch a great man with gold and he will change into any thing.

Reflect on what you learn, and arrange your ideas under proper heads. In proportion as you improve your imagination, memory and understanding, you exalt yourself in the scale of thinking beings.

Secure the approbation of the aged, and you will enjoy the confidence of the young.

“My friend,” says Hyder, “the state of a beggar is more delightful than any envied monarchy:—awake, they see no conspirators; asleep, they dream of no assassins.”

Truth is no less true from the weakness of its votaries; nor can error be made truth by the approbation of misguided millions.

“God,” says the orthodox Dr. Scott, “never imposes upon us laws as arbitrary tests and trials of our obedience. The great design of them is to do us good and direct our actions to our own interest. This, if firmly believed, will infinitely encourage our obedience; for when I am sure God commands me nothing but what my own health, ease and happiness requires; and that every law of his is both a necessary and sovereign remedy against the disease of my nature, and that he could not prescribe less than he has without being defective in his care of my recovery and happiness, with what prudence and modesty can I fail to obey him?”

DIED.—In Phelps, Ontario co. Mr. Lemuel Hotchkiss, aged about 45 years.

In Troy, N. Y. on the 18th ult. Mrs. Anna Bradley Eaton, wife of Professor Eaton.

In Geneva, on the 21st ult. Gen. Walter Grieve, aged 53. He was a native of Scotland, but emigrated to this country and settled at Geneva, 32 years ago, when there were but three houses in the place.

In Milton (Va.) Andrew Monroe, Esq. elder brother of James Monroe, ex-president of the United States.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

EXPLOSION.—The boiler of the steam-boat GRAHAM, which plied between Hull and Grimby, Eng. burst on the 7th of Nov. and about half the passengers, of whom there were seventy on board, were swept into the river. Two persons were instantly killed, nine wounded, and four who are missing are supposed to have been drowned. An inquest was held on the dead bodies, and the jury returned a verdict of "manslaughter against the engineer and the acting proprietor of the packet."

SLAVE TRADE.—The extent to which the trade in slaves is carried on, may be imagined from a fact stated in a Brazilian paper, that on the first and second of October, there arrived at Bahia three vessels; one with five hundred and four; a second with one hundred and thirty three; and the third with four hundred & twenty-eight human beings; in all, one thousand and sixty-five!

IMPOSTURE.—Mr. Hartley, an English missionary, writes that the Greek monks have lately brought to the island of Zante, "one of the arms of John the Baptist!" and that they are enriching themselves by showing it to the credulous multitude! Some of the Greek ladies give as much as fifteen dollars, for a sight of such rarities! [See A Missionary Story!]

MISSIONS.—As a proof of the advanced state of civilization in the Sandwich Island, we may mention a riot between a gang of sailors and some missionaries, in consequence of a police regulation! Some facetious traveller once blessed his stars for having reached a civilized country, when he fell in with a gibbet!—N. Y. Pap.

EFFECTS OF GAMBLING IN LOTTERIES.—At the police office in Philadelphia, Dec. 18, an old man, well dressed, and of intelligent appearance, was charged with an assault and battery, and larceny, in picking the pocket of an Irishman. In answer to questions put to him by the mayor, the prisoner declared "that he was nearly sixty years of age: that he was reduced to poverty and desperation by gambling in lotteries; that he had within forty years, spent twenty-three thousand dollars or more than five hundred dollars a year; and that he never had drawn a prize of any importance!" He was committed for trial.

PANTHER.—A panther, measuring seven feet and an half from the nose to the tip of the tail, was killed on the 11th Decem. last, on the Plains near this village, (Buffalo,) which was supposed to be in company with another from the southern wilds.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.—This document, is as usual, highly spoken of by many, and contains much interesting information relative to the unparalleled prosperity of our state.

SUICIDE.—A young man, a book-binder, committed suicide, by cutting his throat, in Liberty st. Philadelphia. Poverty was the cause. Oh! what a remedy!

TO MRS. H—E. ON THE DEATH OF HER INFANT BOY.

Weep not, fond mother, o'er the tomb,
That shrouds thy infant flower;
Weep not that all that opening bloom,
Hath faded in an hour.

What, though the light of heaven shone—
In thy lov'd infant's smile?
What, though that light, forever flown,
No more thy griefs beguile?

What, though the Almighty lender soon
Recall'd that precious gem?
It shines with brighter ray upon Heaven's jewell'd diadem.

Then, weeping mother, cease to mourn
The cruel spoiler's power,
That from thy arms, thy babe hath torn
In beauty's morning hour.

The eye of faith beholds in this
A Father's tender love,
That early called him home to bliss
In better worlds above.

Fresh with the light of other spheres
The new-born spirit came;
But soon a land, where fall no tears,
Reliev'd its undimmed flame.

An inexperienced stranger here,
He went without regret;
Ere disappointment, grief, and fear
His path with thorns beset.
Ere vice had marred, with blackening spot,
The whiteness of the soul;
Or sin had dropped one deadly blot
Upon the bosom's scroll.

The storms of life shall ne'er assail
Thy infant's peaceful breast;
The winter's blast, or summer's gale
Break not his lasting rest.

The all of him that ere could die,
Now sleeps beneath the sod;
The spark of immortality
Hath risen to its God.

Then weep not, mother, o'er the tomb,
Where buried love now lies;
But hope to see it brighter bloom
In yonder smiling skies.

"PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

[From Ballou's Notes on the Parables.]

PARABLE III.

"Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men."—MAT. v. 13.

As will be shown in notes on another parable in this chapter, Christ represented the operation of the Holy Spirit by fire, under the similitude of salt. So in this parable he speaks of his disciples as answering the same purpose to the earth, by which we understand mankind at large, as the fire or divine salt did to them.

2d. He shows how unprofitable they would be in their holy calling, should they depart from the spirit of that fire by which he would baptize them, by the worthlessness of salt when it had lost its savor.

3d. That instead of their having power over their adversaries, and wisdom to silence gain-sayers; they would themselves be overcome by them, is meant by salt being cast out, and trodden under foot of men.

ILLUSTRATION.

Agreeably with the above notes, we may consider, 1st. The important character of the true ministers of the gospel.

2d. Their liability to lose that influence among men, which renders them profitable in the ministry.

3d. The disrespect with which a ministry is justly treated, which is destitute of the savor of the word of salvation.

As it is the nature of salt to save, preserve, and season, so is the true and faithful ministry of the gospel efficacious to save men from sin, to preserve them in uncorruptible purity, and to bring them into that proper temperament of mind by which they are acceptable sacrifices unto God through Jesus Christ.

The use of salt is seen in the directions given concerning sacrifices in Lev. ii. 13. "And every oblation of thy meat-offering thou shalt season with salt; neither shalt thou suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat-offering: with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt." This salt is the divine power of the covenant of God to save from sin, and reconcile the sinner to God, as may be seen by Rom. xv. 16. "that I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost." The Holy Ghost is therefore, the salt of the everlasting covenant ordered and in all things sure.

2d. A departure from the simplicity of the gospel of God, disallowing the power of the salt of the covenant to sanctify and season the sacrifice, setting up creeds, modes and forms as necessary unto salvation, leading proselytes to depend on a righteousness of their own for acceptance with God, is undoubtedly meant by the ministers of the word losing their savor, and becoming good for nothing. Such has been the melancholy falling away of the christian ministry, and such, for a long time, has been the unprofitableness of their labors.—There is no room for misjudging in this case, for the multitudes who have been proselyted by them, have discovered as much unholiness as the old Gentiles did before the gospel was preached by the apostles. This is witnessed by the cruel persecutions at the head of which has ever been found a carnal ministry, imposing creeds and carnal ordinances on men, of their own invention. And the great want of charity and brotherly kindness among the different orders of the clergy of this country, too plainly shows their want of that salt of the covenant of God; while the ill will and injurious bigotry of professors in general too plainly discover that they imitate their leaders.

These observations are not designed to represent that there are no instances, even in all denominations, of faithful evangelical ministers of the word, but it is very evident that this class is by far the minority.

In departing from the power of the gospel covenant, the christian clergy have acted the part which the prophet Ezekiel accuses the shepherds of Israel of acting. See xxxiv. 4. "The diseased have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, neither have ye sought that which was lost; but with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them." With unreasonable, unscriptural, and cruel doctrines and ecclesiastical disciplines, have the sheep of Christ been driven from the fold, and scattered on barren mountains. Therefore, "thus saith the Lord God, behold, I am against the shepherds; and and I will require my flock at their hands, and cause them to cease from feeding the flock; neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more; for I will deliver my flock from their mouth, that they may not be meat for them." No doubt the Jewish doctors supposed, that by compassing sea and land to make a proselyte to their traditions, by which they made void the law, they obtained a sacrifice well pleasing to God, though they judged and condemned their neighbors without mercy.— But they little thought while they were doing this, they were the children of hell, and that their proselytes would be still more so.

On their feast days could they rejoice and offer offerings to God in gratitude for their successes, but oh, the reproof! See Amos v. 21, 22, 23. "I hate, I despise your feast days, and will not smell in your solemn assemblies. Though ye offer me burnt offerings and your meat offerings, I will not accept them; neither will I regard the peace offerings of your fat beasts. Take thou away from me the noise of thy songs; for I will not hear the melody of thy viols." How much like those Jewish doctors, christian doctors are doing and have done, and how similar to the rejection of those, the rejection of these has been and will be, is not very difficult to see. Societies are now formed, at the expense of which sea and land is compassed to proselyte men to those sentiments and customs which have kept the christian church in a perpetual strife and debate, persecution and blood, ever since they were invented.

But 3d. God will recompense this folly on those who practise it, for they now appear like salt which has lost its savor, which is henceforth good for nothing but to be cast out and to be trodden under foot of men. The Lord will surely deliver his people from such shepherds, and make them who have dishonored him, to be lightly esteemed.

PRACTICAL.

To hear some Christians talk, one would imagine they thought it their duty, and a mark of sincerity and goodness, to be always complaining of corrupt and desperately wicked hearts, and consequently that they ought to have, or in fact should always have, such hearts to complain of. But let no man deceive himself. A wicked and corrupt heart is too dangerous a thing to be trifled with. I would not here be thought to discourage the humble sentiments every man should have of himself, under our present infirmities. But we may greatly wrong ourselves by a false humility; and whoever carefully peruseth the New Testament will find, that however we are obliged to repent of sin, a spirit of complaining and bemoaning is not the spirit of the gospel; neither is it any rule of true religion, nor any mark of sincerity, to have corrupt hearts, or to be always complaining of such hearts. No, the gospel is intended to deliver us from all iniquity, and to purify us into a peculiar people zealous of good works, to sanctify us throughout in one body, soul and spirit, that we may now be saints, may now have peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, and at length be presented without spot or blemish before the presence of God. Christ loved the church and gave himself for it, not that it might continue groaning in a state of corruption and wickedness, but that he might even in this world, sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water, by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious church not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish. And this is the invariable sense of revelation. Nevertheless it is manifestly true, that while we are in the body we shall be exercised with the passions thereof. But this is not our corruption or wickedness, but the trial of our virtue and holiness in resisting and subduing every irregular appetite. And it is the real character of every true Christian, not that he feels he hath a corrupt and wicked heart, but that he crucifieth the flesh with the affections and lusts, and perfects holiness in the fear of the Lord. A real christian may say, my heart is weak, and my passions strong; but he is no real christian, or the gospel hath not had its proper effects upon him, if he cannot at the same time truly say, I resist and restrain my passions, and bring them into captivity to the laws of reason and true holiness. Whatever is evil and corrupt in us we ought to condemn; not so as that it shall still remain in us; that we may always be condemning it; but, that we may speedily reform, and be effectually delivered from it; otherwise, certainly we do not come up to the character of the disciple of Jesus Christ.—John Taylor.

ORIGINAL LETTERS.

The following expostulatory letter, as will be perceived, was written by the "Church Clerk," of the Baptist Society in Bethany. We are desirous to record such productions, believing that our children's children, will cause them to be collected into a volume with Dr. Cotton Mather's Magnolia; or at least with his dissertations on witchcraft and the wars of the "Salvages."—EDITORS.

Dear Friend,—It has become the painful duty of your unworthy servant, to address you on a trying and solemn occasion. By the report of a committee of our church who have labored with you for a number of months, to return and live, for why will ye die? the committee report, that they cannot prevail on you to attend to your covenant relation with us; therefore, if you will not be prevailed on to walk with us, we are at last constrained to withdraw our hand of fellowship from you, and notify you of the same. Now, dear friend, I beseech of you to reflect for a moment on the trials that we have had with you in our church; we have granted you all the possible indulgence that church discipline will admit: Now I ask you in the fear of God, have you covenanted with your God to walk soberly, and be a faithful servant in his vineyard, that you may at last receive a crown of glory at his right hand in heaven above; and may this notice sink deep in your heart, so that you may properly reflect, and return to your first love, while Christ is waiting to be gracious. May you speedily embrace the charms of Christ, that he may once more set your soul at liberty, and that at last you may fall asleep in his arms with the righteous; for where doth the ungodly and the sinner appear?

By order of the Church,

To MR. RUFUS DEVENPORT.

The following letter is published by request, with a view to elicit some information relative to the subjects therein mentioned. Mr. Cochran, the gentleman to whom the original was addressed, in August last, has had time to reply; and if he should be disposed to censure either the writer or ourselves for publishing it, we have an apology in his silence or indifference. He, as a public man, and a professed preacher of the gospel, is amenable to the public for the doctrines he may advance, and should be ever ready to give an answer to every man that asketh a reason for his declarations. We cheerfully tender him the use of our columns for a reply to the interrogations and queries of Mr. Seaver; and after sending him this paper, shall wait with patience for his reply.

PENBROKE, August 1st, 1826.

TO MR. COCHRAN, PREACHER OF THE GOSPEL.

Dear Sir,—I have ever deemed it a privilege and a duty, to inquire of an instructor respecting things of which I am uninformed; and I do not doubt the pleasure you will feel in satisfying my mind in the present instance.

I understood from your discourse, on Sunday evening, 30th ult. that you believ'd, that God our Heavenly Father is a Being infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, in all his "perfections or existence, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness," &c. and all this I believe as fully as you can.

You observed that the salvation of all men was the original intention of God, and quoted a number of passages of scripture directly in point, to prove it. After this, you said, in substance, that none of the human family except the heathen, on whom the light of the gospel had never shone, could be saved, unless they complied with the conditions of the gospel, by exercising faith and repentance. Now sir, please to inform me what agent God our Creator has produced, or what agent has been self-produced, or whether there is an agent in the universe at all, or ever has been, that was, or is capable of changing the "original intention," of that infinite, eternal, and unchangeable God "in whom we live and move and have our being."

Has God ever introduced an agent, or suffered one to be introduced into the moral system, to mar the happiness of mankind, other or greater than was embraced in his "original intention," at the time when "man was created subject to vanity not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope?" And did not that agent of human misery which was at that time embraced in the "original intention of God," consist wholly as Paul says, in the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, that was to be manifested in the man that was subsequently made to till the ground? And will not the effect of that agent, principle, or cause, cease to exist or operate with each individual, at a time when in each individual of Adam's race, this mortal has or shall put on immortality?

By answering the above questions, you will confer a favor that will be gratefully received by one who fully believes "that the salvation of all men was the original intention of God," and that his intentions have never been frustrated or changed.

JAS. E. SEAVER.

THE DEVIL AND SATAN.

In the 44th number of the Gospel Advocate, Vol. IV. a request was made by a writer under the signature of "D. L." addressed to brother Lewis C. Todd, to have an explanation given of Job, ii. and iii. relative to his Satanic Majesty the Devil. We are informed by br. Todd that his time is so taken up with various avocations and duties, that he cannot conveniently attend to the subject, and wishes that "D. L." would refer to the writings of Mr. Balfour on the subject, which are in unison with his views. Another correspondent desires an explanation of Rev. xx. 1, 2, and with a view to make short work of the matter, as well as to give a specimen of Mr. B's, ability in treating the subject, we give, below, extracts from his "Second Inquiry" on those demoniical and much controverted subjects. Should any one, after reading the extracts, feel disposed to contend that the devil is a fallen angel or personal being, with "head, horns and tail," we would inform him, her or them, that Mr. Balfour's Inquiry may be had of R. W. Haskins, in this village, and is, in our humble opinion, an effectual refutation of such an idea.

EXTRACT.

Job i. 6—13. and ii. 1—11. comes next to be considered. To save room, I forbear transcribing these two passages. The reader can easily turn to his Bible and read them. The term satan occurs here fourteen times, but is uniformly left untranslated. It is rendered in the Seventy's version by the word diabolos, devil. Here, say many good people, satan must mean a fallen angel—"for the name, the things said to be done, and all the circumstances mentioned, go to prove his existence and wicked character." We frankly admit, that these two passages, have more the appearance of teaching this doctrine, than all the other texts usually adduced as proof of it. We even admit, that if the devil of Christians is taught in the Bible, this is the place. We hope then, that our friends are willing to abide by the result, whatever devil or satan this turns out to be.

I have examined these two chapters, with all the care and attention I could command, and shall submit the result for candid consideration, by stating and answering the following questions.

1st. Who wrote the book of Job? Answer; about this there are various opinions. Some have ascribed it to Job himself. Others to Elihu or one of the prophets. The general opinion has been, that it was written by Moses, and composed of materials left by Job or his friends in the Syriac or Arabic language. See Gray's Key.

2d. When was the book of Job written? Answer: It is generally agreed, that it was written sometime between the death of Joseph and the delivery of the law at Sinai. It is perhaps impossible for us to fix its precise date. Nor is this at all important, as to the object of our present investigation. Those who wish to see the various opinions entertained concerning this, may consult Gray's Key, p. 228—258.

3d. Was Job a real, or only a fictitious person? Answer; Some have held the latter opinion. I am strongly inclined to think that Job was a real person, for in after parts of Scripture, his afflictions are represented as real afflictions, and his patience under them as real patience, and as an example to us. He is spoken of just as Noah and Daniel are. One of the sons of Issachar, is called Job, Gen. xlvii. 13, and was one of Jacob's grandchildren, who went down with him into Egypt. If this was the person, who forms the subject of the book of Job, it fixes, generally the period in which he lived.

4th. Is every thing in the book of Job to be understood literally, or is any allowance to be made for embellishment or allegorical representation? Answer: Although I think Job was a real person, yet many things are set forth in the way of allegory. For example, God is not only represented as talking with satan, but as influenced by him to bring accumulated sufferings on a just man without cause. These are brought in such rapid succession too, as seldom occurs among men. Besides, there seems something studied and artificial, that only one servant should make his escape, to tell Job what had happened, and before he is well done, only one more makes his escape to bring additional evil tidings. And just as he closes his speech, a third also in like manner, and a fourth in the same way arrives, and closes the first scene of Job's calamities. Besides, throughout the whole book, there is something very studied and artificial in the set speeches of Job and his friends, and even of God himself at the close. The writer gives Job just double the number of camels, oxen, sheep, and asses, without one more or less, which he had at the beginning. And he gives him precisely the same number of sons, and the same number of daughters, as at the first. And finally leaves Job in a more prosperous condition than before his afflictions came upon him, with a long life of enjoying his prosperity. The book concludes without any notice of the removal of Job's disease, which by some is called elephantiasis, and was deemed by physicians incurable. Had the whole been matter of fact, and nothing in it allegorical, we hardly think such artificial statements could have been given.

5th. In what part of the world, were the scenes of the book of Job laid? Answer; we are told chap. i. 1, that—"there was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job." That this was in Chaldea or its neighborhood, is almost certain, for the Chaldean robbers or freebooters are said to have carried away Job's flocks, chap. 1. 17. Dr. Parish in his Sacred Geography, says—"Bochart and the authors of the Universal History, and some others place the land of Uz far south from Damascus, and almost directly east from the tribe of Reuben, and west from Chaldea, in Arabia Deserta." But see his work on the word Uz for other opinions about this. See also Gray's Key, as referred to above. It is not of essential importance, to determine the precise spot where Job lived. It is sufficient for our purpose that he lived in the east. See Job i. 3.

6th. What were the religious opinions of the people where the scenes of the book are laid? Answer: This is a point of very great importance to ascertain. Orthodox men who certainly did not write to favor my opinions shall furnish us with all necessary information about this: Prideaux in his Connexions, vol. 1. pp. 185—6. thus writes: "Directly opposite to these were the Magians, another sect, who had their original in the same eastern countries; for they abominating all images, worshipped God only by fire. They began first in Persia, and there, and in India, were the only places where this sect was propagated; and there they remain even to this day. Their chief doctrine was, that there were two principles, one which was the cause of all good, and the other the cause of all evil: that the former is represented by light, and the other by darkness, as their truest symbols; and that, of the composition of these two, all things in the world are made: the good god they name Yazdan, and also Ormuzd, and the evil god, Ahraman: the former is by the Greeks called Oramasdez, and the latter Arimanius. And therefore, when Xerxes prayed for that evil upon his enemies, that it might be put into the minds of all of them to drive their best and bravest men from them, as the Athenians had Themistocles, he addressed his prayer to Arimanius the evil god of the Persians, and not to Oramasdez their good god. And concerning those two gods there was this difference of opinion amongst them, that whereas some held both of them to have been from all eternity, there were others that contended, that the good god only was eternal, and that the others were created. But they both agreed in this, there will be a continual opposition between these two till the end of the world; that then the good god shall overcome the evil god, and that from thenceforward each of them shall have his world to himself, that is, the good god his world with all good men with him, and the evil god his world with all evil men with him; that darkness is the truest symbol of the evil god, and light the truest symbol of the good god. And therefore they always worshipped him before fire, as being the cause of light, and especially before the sun, as being in their opinion the most perfect fire, and causing the most perfect light. And for this reason, in all their temples, they had fire continually burning on altars erected in them for that purpose. And before these sacred fires they offered up all their public devotions, as likewise they did all their private devotions before their private fires in their own houses. Thus did they pay the highest honor to light, as being in their opinion the truest representative of the good god; but always hated darkness, as being, what they thought, the truest representative of the evil god, whom they ever had in the utmost detestation, as we now have the devil: and, for an instance hereof, whenever they had an occasion in any of their writings to mention his name, they always wrote it backward, and inversed, as thus, uenurqv."

EXCOMMUNICATION.

We are again called upon to record a transaction, which, could angels weep over the derelictions of mortals, would draw tears from their eyes. Mrs. Editha Curtis the author of the following letters, had been for a long time, a member of the Presbyterian church at Nine Mile Creek in Marcellus, Onondaga co. N. Y.—At length her spiritual understanding was enlightened by the truth, and she saw in the fulness of God's love, a rich supply for all his offspring. She saw that his goodness is infinite, that his grace is impartial, that his tender mercy is eternal and unchangeable. She found that God is the Saviour of all men, and finally rejoiced in the hope of the final restitution of all things.

Being unwilling to put her light under a bushel, she informed her brethren and sisters, as will be seen from her letters, of the joyful change which had been wrought within her; and stated her grounds of belief, in a charitable, friendly and commendable manner.—What was the result? Did they attempt to remove her doubts of the truth of their doctrine? No! They cut her off from their church; not for any wickedness she had been guilty of, but for reputed HERESY!!—Blessed be God, they are not entrusted with the keys of Heaven; the great HEAD of the church of God has the keys of heaven and hell; and when he shuts no man can open—when he opens no man can shut. Our prayer to God is, that the Saviour of sinners may speedily open the eyes, hearts and understandings of those blinded mortals who neither go into the kingdom of God themselves, nor suffer those who are entering to go in. We refrain from further comment,—the letters speak for themselves.

LETTER I.

Editha Curtis to her brethren and sisters of the church at Nine Mile Creek in Marcellus.

DEARLY BELOVED:—I have either been so happy or else so unhappy as in some measure to change my religious sentiments; and the last communion day I did not partake of the bread and wine, though I hope my soul feasted in the goodness and mercy of God with yours. But I think if you believed that Christ died for all, and that in the time of the restitution of all things, when all that the Father hath given to the Son shall praise him, he will see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, you would be more happy than you now are. Our heavenly Father says that he hath given all things into his hands, and power over all flesh, that he may give eternal life to as many as are given him. And our Saviour said, that all power was given to him in heaven and earth; and he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only: but also for the sins of the whole world. The prophet says, he was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities; and by his stripes we are healed. All we like sheep had gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquities of us all. Our Saviour said, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." Now I think, if you believed these and the rest of the gracious promises contained in the scriptures, your tongues would not be so silent in the praises of God when you meet together as they now are. For if it is a greater blessing to have ten saved than one, then the blessing must be in proportion, in saving the whole human family.

Christ is the head of every man; and do you think he will be satisfied while any member of his body is in misery? He is the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world: He is the way, the truth, and the life; he that believeth on him shall not be ashamed. And I think it is the sincere desire of my heart, if I am in error, that I may be convinced; and, that if you are, that you may be convinced. For I really believe, that the more goodness, mercy and love we believe in of our heavenly Father, the more we shall love him. He that loveth is born of God; for God is love. How can I believe that he will ever hate the works of his hands? He is of the same mind now that he ever was, and none can turn him. His tender mercies are over all his works, and he is no respecter of persons.

Now, my brethren and sisters, the reason why I did not partake of the bread and wine, was, because I thought it would be deceiving you and all who knew of it, without letting you know that my belief was changed. If you can now feel free to commune with me, I shall be happy to come forward; but if not, I shall stay away without any hard feelings. And I pray God of his boundless mercy to enlighten all our minds into a knowledge of the truth; for if we believe the truth, the truth will make us free;—free not only to forgive our friends, and commune with them, but free to forgive our enemies and love them. This I think is a cross which we all ought to take up more than we do, if we wish to enjoy the love of God: For he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how shall he love God whom he hath not seen?

I wish to ask you one question. Do you believe that the "ransomed of the Lord will return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads"—that they "shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away?" If you do, I desire to have you tell me who the ransomed of the Lord are? And as you are not here, let me answer it from the New Testament. I think it is all for whom Christ died; and the apostle says, he "tasted death for every man," and that he "gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time." We are further told that as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive;—"and "as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." And further; "as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life."—God hath concluded all in unbelief that he might have mercy upon all. He says, by the which WILL we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Christ, once for all. Hence, the angel said unto the shepherds "fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people, for unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour who is Christ the Lord." I cannot see how it can be good news to all, if but a small part are to be benefitted by it. If any of you can make ALL men a small part you think differently from me.

The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice; for he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet: the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. Then shall be brought to pass the saying, that is written, death is swallowed up in victory: O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law; but thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. This is not by works of righteousness which we have done, but by his great love he hath saved us,—not of works lest any man should boast. God looked upon us when we were in our sins, and the time was a time of love; and we love him because he first loved us. It was said "behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." All things are of God, who hath reconciled us to him by Jesus Christ, and who hath given us the ministry of reconciliation, to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are in earth, even in him.

After all these promises I do not see how we can put too much confidence in the love of Christ. For while we were sinners he died for us.

I have written three times as much as I intended when I began; but the thought that all creatures in heaven and on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, shall finally be brought to sing blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be to him that sitteth on the throne and to the Lamb for ever and ever, is so pleasing to me that I know not how to stop writing. But I will close, by praying that the God of all mercies, if I am right, will direct me still in the right to stay; and if I am wrong to teach my heart to find the better way.

MISCELLANY.

[From the London Courier.]

EXTREME MISERY.

GENTLEMEN:—Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Rogers, a chymist in Cheapside, brought in a poor half-naked man of color, who had just been applying to purchase some arsenic at his shop. From his manner, and his extremely destitute condition, Mr. Rogers believed that he wanted the arsenic for the purpose of self-destruction; and, therefore, he very humanely brought him before the Alderman, in the hope that, by receiving some charitable relief, he might be diverted from his miserable purpose.

The poor fellow had no clothing, except a coarse flannel shirt and very ragged canvass trousers; and the Alderman, having complimented Mr. Rogers on his humanity, proceeded to question the wretched being before him as to who and what he was.

His story was soon told:—He was stolen from his father's house, he said, when he was only seven years old, and sold into slavery at Rio Janeiro, where he was christened Louis Guled. After some years, he was brought out of slavery by the captain of an English merchant ship, and, on his arrival in England, he was re-christened John Hampden. From that time he had been chiefly at sea—sometimes in the merchant service, and sometimes in the Royal navy. He had served on board the Mutine frigate, Captain De Courcy, at the siege of Algiers; after which he was turned adrift, and had ever since been wandering about London, unable to obtain employment, and "getting more and more miserable every day."

"Then if you could find no employment," said the Alderman, "how have you contrived to exist so long?"

"Sometimes I go about trying to gather a few bones," he replied, holding up a tattered bag: "and if I can find enough to sell for sixpence, I pay four-pence for my night's lodging, and spend the other two-pence in food. But sometimes I can't find enough to buy me a crust; and then I go without food, and lie in the streets at night, until the watchman rouses me up from one place, and drives me to another. Twice have I been sent to prison, three months each time, for asking two or three halfpence, when I was so faint and hungry that I could not walk about any longer; and in prison I have had nothing but bread and water;—because they said I could get employment if I would."

"But you went to a chymist's shop in Cheapside, this morning:—what was your object in going there?" asked the Alderman.

"I went for a ha'p'orth of arsenic—I had no more money," he replied.

"And what did you mean to do with the arsenic?"

"Why, If I must tell the truth, I meant to use it myself, that there might be an end to me at once. I am sick of hunger and nakedness, and of being brow-beat, and put down, and imprisoned, by a parcel of fellows, many of them not half so good as myself; for, miserable as I appear now, I am a gentleman if I had my right."

Alderman Crowther asked him if he should like to be sent back to his own country: and he replied: "my country? I have no country!.... It is thirty years and more since I was stolen from my father's house; and where am I to look for father, or for friends, after thirty years? I have no country—no friends—no home: and it would be better I should die out of the way!"

The worthy Alderman told him his case certainly appeared worthy of much commiseration; and, having pointed out to him the wickedness of self-destruction, gave him a couple of shillings, for his immediate necessities, and directed that he should be taken care of in the Giltspur-st. Compter, until something could be done for him. "I send you to prison," said his Worship, "not by way of punishment, but in order that you may enjoy a few days of comfort and protection whilst your case is under consideration."

"God bless you, sir!" rejoined the poor fellow; "and be pleased to remember that I am willing and able to work, if any body will be kind enough to employ me."

From the Candid Examiner.

SUICIDE. Mr. Calvin Easton, of Milford, (Pa.) has fallen a victim to the soul-chilling and God-dishonoring doctrine of infinite partiality and endless misery. He recently became a convert to the calvinistic faith, under the ministrations of the Rev. Mr. G. The tremendous doctrine of devils and damned spirits vociferated by this priest of modern Moloch, as from lungs of brass, was more than he could bear—and his sincerity proved his destruction:—his mind became harrassed with the belief of an endless hell for the torment of sinners in a future world. He expressed doubts about the sincerity of his repentance, and despaired of salvation. He believed he had "eat and drank unworthily," and that he "was a reprobate, sealed to everlasting misery."—Insanity was the consequence; and the distracted miserable man sought relief in suicide, on Tuesday last.—"Death, the friend to the wretch, whom every friend forsakes," kindly came to his relief, and he left in despair a world, where he heard, instead of the gospel of life and salvation, (breathing "peace and good will to men,") that pretended gospel thundering the anathemas of a revengeful and angry God.

Christ declares, "I am the door: by me, if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture. The thief cometh not, but to steal, and to kill, and to destroys: I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." But, alas! this unfortunate man entered at a door where no pasture could be found—a door that leads to death. Let the heralds of sanctimonious error, and the instruments of mental distraction, remember that the blood of their victims will be required.

"God is love." The blessed Jesus "healed all manner of diseases among the people."—His pretended followers afflict men with mental disease, the most agonizing and most incurable sickness that ever befel wretched man. Jesus Christ and his apostles never drove men to insanity.—On the contrary, they relieved the sufferers, and cheered them with the tidings of peace and salvation. "Do thyself no harm," said Paul and Silas to the distracted jailor;—"Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved—thou and thy house," No injunctions that he must believe in an interminable hell and all its concomitants.

Thus is presented another, among the many instances which daily occur, of the awful consequences of that violent mode of conversion, where threats instead of persuasion are resorted to.

Mr. Easton was a respectable man, and his remains were interred with masonic honors, in a manner corresponding with the character which he had borne.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The tavern-house of Mrs. Clarke, partly occupied by herself and Mr. H. B. Jones, was destroyed by fire, on the night of Tuesday last.—Not a pound of provisions, not an article of furniture, not a rag of clothing was saved from the flames, excepting the night-clothes the poor sufferers had on when they fled from their beds, and escaped with their lives! It was a bitter cold night. What the amount of the loss was, we are unable to say, but it was the widow's all.—We hope those possessed of feeling hearts, will open their hands cheerfully on this occasion.—Donations of property of any description, if put into the hands of F. B. Merrill, Esq. will be duly forwarded to the sufferers.

Poetic Department.

[From the Edinburgh Magazine.]

"I came to the place of my birth, and said "the friends of my youth, where are they?" and echo answered,

"WHERE ARE THEY."

Long years had elapsed since I gazed on the scene,
Which my fancy had robed in its freshness of green,
The spot when a school-boy all thoughtless I strayed,
By the bank of the stream in the gloom of the shade.

I tho't of the friends who had roamed with me there,
When the sky was so blue, and the flowers so fair;
All scattered, all sundered, by mountain and wave,
And some in the cold, silent womb of the grave.

I thought of the green banks that circled around,
With wild flowers, sweet briar, and eglantine crowned,
I thought of the river, all still and bright,
As the face of the sky on a mild summer's night.

And I tho't of the trees under which we had strayed,
Of the broad leafy boughs, with their coolness of shade,
And I hoped, tho' disfigur'd, some token to find,
Of the names and the carvings impressed on the rind.

All eager I hastened the scene to behold,
Rendered sacred and dear by the feelings of old;
And I dream'd that unalter'd my eye should explore
This refuge, this haunt, this elysium of yore.

'Twas a dream;—not a token, or trace could I view
Of the scenes that I lov'd, or the trees that I knew:
Like the shadows of night, at the dawning of day,
Like the tale that is told—they had vanish'd away.

And I thought the lone river that murmur'd along,
Was more dull in its music, more sad in its song,
Since the birds, that had rested and warbled above,
Had all fled from its banks at the fall of the grove.

I paused and the moral came home to my heart,
Behold how of earth all the glories depart;
Our visions are baseless, our hope but a gleam—
Our staff but a reed, and our life but a dream.

Then, oh! let us look—let our prospects allure
To scenes that can fade not, to realms that endure;
To glories, to blessings, that triumph sublime,
O'er the blightings of change, and the ruins of time.

"PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

[From Ballou's Notes on the Parables.]

PARABLE IV.

"Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set upon a hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house." MAT. v. 14, 15.

It must first be remembered that Christ himself is the true light which lighteth every man who cometh into the world, see St. John i. 9; but when Christ had communicated the light of himself to his disciples, they acting in that light and walking by it, would be to others as Christ had been to them; see St. John xvii. 8. "For I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me; and they have received them." Verse 18, "As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world." The apostles were appointed to manifest the gospel to all nations, and whatsoever maketh manifest is light; therefore, Christ declared his disciples to be the light of the world. "A city set on an hill cannot be hid." The order, regularity and harmony, which ought to be observed among the disciples of Christ, are signified by a city. And that they ought carefully to exhibit all the virtues and graces of the gospel as conspicuously as possible, is meant by a city being set on an hill so that it could not be hid. "Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house." The disciples being lit by that true light which will finally light every man that cometh into the world, is meant by candles being lit, and that Christ had lit them for the purpose of their giving light to others, & that they ought not to secrete that light from the world, is signified by a candle when lit being placed on a candlestick to give light to all.

Let all professors of christianity, and especially those who are called to the glorious work of the ministry, remember well the application of the parable; "Let your light so shine before men, that they beholding your good works may glorify your father which is in heaven."

ILLUSTRATION.

- 1st. We may notice Christ as the true light.
- 2d. The ministers of his word partaking of and reflecting his light to the world; and
- 3d. The impropriety of hiding or keeping this light in obscurity.

As the natural sun is the light, glory, and beauty of the natural world, so Christ is the light, glory and beauty of the moral world. He is called the sun of righteousness, in Mal. iv. 2. "But unto you that fear my name, shall the sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." When Simeon of Jerusalem, who waited for the consolation of Israel, to whom it was revealed, by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, till he had seen the Lord's Christ, was blessed with that vision, and held the child in his arms, he blessed God, saying, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel." St. John calls Christ "the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Jesus calls himself the light, in the xii. John, 35, 36. "Then Jesus said unto them, yet a little while is the light with you: walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth. While ye have light believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light." Chap. viii. verse 12, he calls himself the light of the world. "Then spake Jesus again unto them, saying, I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." Christ is called the light of the gospel covenant, or new Jerusalem, which St. Paul calls Jerusalem that is above. See Isaiah lx. 1. "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." Rev. xxi. 22, 23. "And I saw no temple therein; for the Lord God almighty, and the Lamb are the temple of it. And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof."

Perhaps there is no representation given of Christ which more evidently discovers his power to save mankind, than in those scriptures which speak of him in the character of light. Man is represented as alienated from God thro' ignorance. This being the case, the knowledge of the truth would reconcile him to God. The object of Christ's mission is to reconcile all things to his Father. Whatsoever maketh manifest is light. When Christ shall have manifested the true character of the Father to mankind, universal reconciliation will be the consequence. Jesus says, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free;" by which we see that it was only necessary for them to know the truth, in order to obtain their freedom; which shows their bondage was the effects of their ignorance. Jesus is called the faithful and true witness. The use of a witness is to make known the truth and certainty of a fact, not to be the author of the fact to which he witnesses. Christ is a witness to mankind of the Father's love, as has been observed, in a quotation from Rom. v. 8. "But God commendeth his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us." Christ is not the cause of God's loving mankind, but the evidence to us that God is love towards us. The mercy and grace, according to which we are saved and called, was given unto us in Christ Jesus before the world began, but was made manifest by the appearing of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. The action of light in the natural world is not to create objects for us to see, but to manifest those objects of which we are ignorant, or which are hid from us by reason of darkness. 'The things of the kingdom of God were hid from the wise and prudent, as Jesus says in Mat. xi. 25. 'And the power to reveal the Father to mankind he acknowledges in himself, in the 27th verse.... "All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him."

The things which were hid from the wise and prudent, did as actually exist, as if they had been made known to them; if this were not the case, they would not have been revealed unto babes. In a word, all the glorious truths of the everlasting gospel have had their establishment in God, in all past eternity, and the whole system of the ministry of the gospel is designed to bring those things to light, to reveal them to mankind, by which the reconciliation of the unreconciled, blind, and ignorant children of our everlasting Father in heaven, may and will be effected.

2d. We may notice the ministers of the word of Christ partaking of and reflecting his light of the world. This is the character in which our text views them.

As is observed in the notes, Christ gave to his disciples the words which the Father gave unto him, and sent them into the world as the Father sent him into the world. The Father sent Christ into the world to be the light of the world; Christ sent his apostles into the world to be a light also to the world, by communicating the same words to the world at large, as the Father had communicated to him, and he to them. In communicating these words, the minister of Christ is a light to the people; but if he change these words, add to them, or diminish them, he becomes darkness. When, on account of Christ speaking the words of life, many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him, Jesus said unto the twelve, Will ye also go away? "Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go?... Thou hast the words of eternal life." In the context, Jesus informs his disciples that the words which he spake to them were spirit and life; see St. John vi. 63, &c. Here we have a very plain account of the words which the Father gave to Christ, and which Christ also gave to his apostles to preach to the world of mankind. They are the words of eternal life; they are spirit and they are life. In preaching the words of eternal life, the true minister of Jesus Christ is a light to the world. In preaching the words of spirit and life, the true minister of Christ is a light to mankind.

It may be well to notice contrary words, in order to see the contrast. The opposite of eternal life is eternal death. The opposite of spirit and life is flesh and death. The words of eternal death we have heard from the lips of a ministry which, having lost the salt of the covenant of God, possess no longer the savor of the word, and therefore have changed the words of eternal life, for words more consistent with the darkness and alienation of their minds.

As has been observed, the action of light is to make manifest things which do exist, and the duty of a witness is to testify of things which are. Thus the character of light, and the character of a witness is the same. It has been observed, that Christ was not the cause of God's love to us, but the witness to manifest, or commend that love to us; and it may be proper to notice likewise, as has been observed, that the mercy and grace, according to which we are called, was given unto us in Christ Jesus before the world began, but was made manifest by the appearing of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; who hath abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. As it is evident that the work of the Saviour was to make known, to the world of mankind, the good things which were proposed in the eternal counsel of God's good pleasure, we ought not to suppose that those good things were granted us as favors purchased, by Christ, of the Father. Nor is it the work of the true gospel ministry to initiate mankind into any scheme by which they may secure to themselves the love, favor or mercy of God; or whereby they may obtain an heirship with the sons of God.... But the labor of the true ministry is to bear witness of those things which their eyes have seen, their ears have heard, and their hands have handled of the word of life. When the preacher forgets Christ, and preaches, exhorts and warns the people to secure an interest in Christ; and sets forth the awful consequences of neglect, he is very far from being a faithful and true witness. For the spirit itself, beareth witness with our spirits that we are the children of God, and if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ.

When the devout Ananias was sent to Saul when blind at Damascus, he stood by him and said, "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know his will, and see that just one, and shouldest hear the voice of his mouth. For thou shalt be his witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard." And this testimony agrees with the words spoken by the Lord himself to Saul when he met him in the way, "I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness, both of these things which thou hast seen, & of those things in the which I will appear unto thee."

In bearing the testimony of Jesus to the world of mankind, Paul had nothing to do but to bear witness of the things which he had seen, and those in which his divine master would appear unto him.

The Saviour of sinners never instructed Saul the persecutor, how to obtain an interest in his love, but he revealed the love of the Father in his soul, by his quickening spirit, and sent him to bear witness to sinners of the love and mercy of God towards them. Thus he testifies: "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief."

The true ministry in which the apostles were the light of the world, may be learned from the account which St. Paul gave to the Corinthians in the following words: "And all things are of God who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them." In the true ministry of the gospel in which the servants of Christ are the light of the world, there is no imputation of sin to the world. It holds up to view the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world; it is a testimony of him, who says, "I came not to judge the world, but to save the world;" it is determined to "know nothing save Christ and him crucified." 3dly. The necessity of this light shining clearly, and the impropriety of its being obscured, are considerations which ever ought to lie with weight on the minds of those who are called by the grace of God, to bear witness to the truth as it is in Jesus.

1st. The infinite importance of the things to be made manifest by this light, and to be testified of by the faithful witnesses, is of consequence in a due consideration of this subject. These things are divine realities; they comprehend the love of an infinitely wise and merciful God; his divine purpose which he purposed in himself concerning the final reconciliation of all things to himself, and the means by which he will finally effect it.

2d. The darkness, ignorance and consequent alienation of mankind from God, calls aloud for the light to be placed in a conspicuous place, that all may see. The misery of mankind in consequence of not knowing the truth, calls aloud for the true witness to be faithful in his testimony.

Mankind, deceived, led by carnal mindedness, and alienated from God, are represented as being in the prison house, from which they are to be delivered by the true and faithful testimony of the faithful and true witness, as expressed by the prophet; "I the Lord have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thine hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant to the people, for a light of the Gentiles; to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house." And in this is exemplified the truth of that scripture which saith, "A true witness delivereth souls."

Though we have great reason to rejoice, that there are any who are willing, by the help of divine grace, to bear that true testimony by which souls are delivered, yet we have reason to regret that the number is much greater, who give a contrary testimony, which is too successful in blinding the minds of those who are already too much in the dark. And many there are, it is to be feared, who have the words of eternal life put into their mouths, yet are fond of making a poor excuse to palliate their neglect in not letting their light shine before men.

May he who walketh among the golden candlesticks, make his angels spirits, and his ministers flames of fire.

THE DEVIL AND SATAN.

That such were the religious opinions of the people where Job lived, cannot well be doubted. This fact we should think indisputable to whatever result it may lead. Ahraman or Arimanius, the evil principle deified, was the evil god of the people. The only objection which will be stated against this is—"That Job lived at too early a period for the opinions advanced in this quotation." But in answer, I would remark first, that Job's day was not too early for Sabianism or the worship of idols, for this existed in Abraham's day; and when Israel entered Canaan the worship of idols prevailed among the inhabitants. Why then should his day be too early for the Magian religion? Priedeux, speaks of Sabianism, as opposite to Magianism, but does not intimate that the former was of a more ancient date. On the contrary, we shall see in the next Section, that when Zoroaster arose and revived the Magian religion he revived that, which for "many ages" had been the established religion of Persia. In this account satan is not represented as a new or extraordinary being, which had never been heard of before. It is taken for granted that the people where the scenes of the book are laid, were familiar with such a being; and the opinions expressed concerning him. This account which appears strange to us, they needed no explanation of, any more than people among us do, when any man preaches about the devil.

But what shows such opinions prevailed where Job lived, are the facts and circumstances mentioned in the account itself. These we shall notice presently. Here I would only say, that it is evident satan is introduced as an evil being, and it is generally contended that he was the author of all Job's afflictions. This perfectly agrees to the opinions of the Magians, as stated by Prideaux. Besides, previous Scripture usage of the term satan, forbids us thinking, that the sacred writers recognized either an evil god or a fallen angel under this name. Where, let me ask, do any of them intimate, that an evil being, such as the Persian evil god or the Christian's devil, existed as a rival to Jehovah? To what else then could the writer refer, but to such heathen opinions? If such a being as the Christian's devil existed, how is it accounted for, that he remained so quiet until the days of Job? Job appears to have been the first man he ever troubled, from the creation of the world. Noah, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with many others were good men, and rich men, but he never attempted to injure them in their property, or smite them with a single boil in their whole lifetime. From any thing which appears to the contrary, they had no fear of such a being; nor knew of his existence. Had satan just fallen from heaven, in the days of Job, and begun his depredations on mankind? Admitting this true, how is it that as Job was the first, so he was the last man he ever so tormented? The case of the woman, whom he is said to have bound eighteen years, is no exception to this, as we shall show, Section 5..... Let it be accounted for then, why satan had such a particular hatred against Job, above all other men before or since. It is easily perceived, that these things are rationally accounted for, on the presumption, that in this account there is a reference to the evil god of the people among whom Job lived. Allowing this, the account is just what might be expected. The character given to satan, answers to that of their god, whom they believed to be the author and director of all evil.

The question, which now comes forward for consideration is—Was this account of satan introduced for the purpose of establishing, or was it introduced to refute such opinions? Let satan here be considered, either the evil principle deified, or the devil of christians, were such opinions intended to be sanctioned by the writer, or does he introduce them, to expose their fallacy, and establish the supremacy of the one living and true God in opposition to them? All I think will agree; that the whole must stand approved or condemned. No middle path can be here taken, for no ground is afforded for it. It is then a matter of no consequence, whether we consider satan in this account the principle of evil deified, or, that he was the Christian's devil. Whether the same or different, I shall proceed to show, by direct and I think, conclusive evidence, that neither of them had any influence in producing Job's afflictions. That they were all sent by the one living and true God, whom he feared and obeyed, is evident:

1st. From Job's own testimony concerning his afflictions. Job's heathen neighbors supposed their evil god Ahraman was the cause of them. Christians believe their satan or devil was the cause of them. But does Job ascribe them to either? No; when one messenger after another is represented as announcing to him the loss of his property and at last the death of his children, he says—"The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord," chap. i. 21. He does not for a moment admit that either Ahraman or the devil had any kind of concern in his afflictions. He no more admits their influence in taking away his property and children, than in the bestowment of them. The giving and taking them away are alike ascribed to Jehovah. Similar were his views and feelings, when afflicted with sore boils. His wife desired him to curse God and die. But he says to her—"Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What! shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" Job ii. 9, 10. Does this look like acknowledging the Persian evil god or the Christian's devil? Notwithstanding the popular opinions, that Ahraman was the cause of all evil, the severe bodily pain he suffered, and the taunts of his wife, he holds fast his integrity in the true God. Now, permit me to ask, if Job had believed, that either Ahraman or the devil brought his afflictions upon him, why did he ascribe them all to the true God without reservation? And why did he not correct his wife's mistake by telling her, that Ahraman or the devil ought to be cursed? But Job had no faith in either, and hence he told her, that she spoke as one of the foolish or heathen women speaketh. Job allowed of but one God, and it is evident, that his adversity and prosperity are both alike ascribed to him. See chap. xiii, 10—12. and i. 21.

CONSCIENCE.

On looking over the columns of the Farmer's Advocate and Steuben Advertiser, of the 11th inst. my attention was attracted to an article over the signature of A. B. on the subject of CONSCIENCE. The novelty of the article as well as the ability of its author, entitles it to more notice than we are able to give to it; and our readers must pardon us for the brevity of what follows:—

Our author defines conscience to be, "the principle or faculty of the mind, which discerns between right and wrong." Or rather, a correct knowledge of things, feelings and circumstances, approving what is right, and condemning what is wrong." After giving us the foregoing definition, he assumes the proposition that "when conviction is produced in the minds of men, conscience is the principle, or faculty, which receives the operation," and says, that "the doctrine of a perfect conscience, will appear evident from the following considerations:" and states them thus: First; from the writings of wise men: Secondly; from the light of Scripture; and, Thirdly; from its necessity. We shall briefly notice each of the foregoing arguments.

First. What does A. B. wish to have us understand by a "perfect conscience?" If he mean any thing, it must be this, viz. that mankind have an inherent, perfect knowledge of right and wrong; or to use his own language, "a correct knowledge of things, feelings, and circumstances." This perfect or correct knowledge of things, according to the doctrine of "A. B." enables man to approve of what is right, and to condemn what is wrong. And farther; this knowledge, faculty, or if the reader please, conscience, CORRECTLY approves and disapproves; for if it be perfect, it must necessarily be infallible in its decisions!

Having ascertained what A. B. means by a perfect conscience, we may now proceed to notice his arguments in support of the proposition that mankind are possessed of it. He first refers to the writings of wise men, and quotes from Mr. Emmons' sermon on regeneration. We will admit, for the sake of argument, that Mr. Emmons is good authority; but would ask what does his testimony do towards substantiating the proposition of A. B.? Mr. Emmons says, "that God commonly awakens the consciences of men, before he effectually convicts them;" but the "eminent divine," does not say any thing about a perfect conscience, nor that God commonly awakens the perfect conscience of a man before he converts him. That man has a conscience, no one doubts; but the question is, has man a perfect conscience? A. B. also quotes from his latin dictionary, to as little effect as in the preceding instance: for even that says nothing about a "perfect conscience." Pope is resorted to, with a similar want of success; for he says nothing to support the theory of our author.... He is left, therefore, to say as follows: "When conscience acts at all, it acts in opposition to the other faculties of the mind, which are depraved," &c. Now if A. B. is rightly understood, he means that all the other faculties of the mind are depraved, except the faculty of conscience which he contends is perfect. Will he or some other person be so kind as to give us some authority for such an assertion? We confess ourselves ignorant of any evidence of such a proposition.

Secondly. Our author says, "I believe this fact from the light of scripture." He quotes Paul, who speaks of a pure conscience, and thinks that since God requires us to be holy as He is holy, and requires no more than that we should live up to the dictates of a good conscience, it is clear the conscience is perfect. Feeling no desire to multiply words on the subject, we leave this proposition with the conclusion, and pass to see how it agrees with what follows. He says, appears evident from its necessity. We can do no less than give the paragraph entire. It follows:

Thirdly. This truth (that the conscience is perfect,)

"Mankind are endowed with faculties, which constitute them accountable beings; and for what thing soever they are accountable, they possess the means which justifies that requirement. We are under obligation to worship God, and we have the bible to inform us of this duty. The heathen, without the bible, are under the same obligation. And now I would ask, why they are accountable for violating the commands of God? They are destitute of the volume of divine inspiration; they have no evidence of the existence of a God, but what they gather from the dim light of nature; and they have no external guide to direct them in the path of virtue and happiness. And yet, they must use the same means as we, for the possession of heaven or perish forever! I am sensible no one can render this consistent without finding in their breasts an inward principle—a perfect conscience, which condemns them when they do wrong, and approves their conduct when they do right. With such a guide, although their wicked works subdue its office, they may grovel in ignorance and heathenish darkness, and yet be speechless at the bar of God. Without it they are left upon the raging billows of time without a pilot or an oar, commanded to reach the haven of eternal rest, and yet liable to be hurled by the tempest of depravity into the gulf of perdition."

On this we remark, first, there is no doubt that man is accountable; and that we who have the Bible in our hands are especially accountable to its requirements. But does it follow from this, that all men are accountable to the requirements of the law contained in that holy book, or that any will be damned for not obeying such law when they had no opportunity of becoming acquainted with it? How came it to pass that the heathen are under the same obligation that christians are? Let us go back and take the definition of conscience as given by A. B. He says it is "the principle or faculty of the mind which discerns between right and wrong; or rather a correct knowledge of things, feelings, and circumstances," &c. Now let it be asked, do the heathens have a correct knowledge of the law of God as recorded in the scriptures? of the gospel as proclaimed by the angels, preached by God to Abraham, or believed by the "pure in faith?" If they have, what benefit will they derive from the preaching of Missionaries? If they have not the law, why damn them for not believing it? Paul said, Rom. iii. 20. "by the law is the knowledge of sin;" and if the heathen knows not the law, how can they, by that "principle or faculty of the mind" which A. B. calls conscience, determine by that standard what is good or evil? Again, it is said by the same apostle, "that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law;" and from all the circumstances of the case, we cannot discover that justice requires that any should be punished for violating a law about which they could know nothing. What then becomes of A. B.'s assertion, that "the heathen without the bible, are under the same obligation" that others are, who have it in their hands? The premises of A. B. being false, his conclusions are not to be regarded as correct; yet we feel constrained to notice them, that the reader may see their absurdity.

After admitting that they, (the heathen,) are left without the scriptures—without any other guide than the "dim light of nature," yet "they must use the same means as we, for the possession of heaven, or PERISH FOREVER?" Dim as the light of nature may be, the heathen may felicitate themselves on never having been more absurd in their conclusions than our author. A. B. seems to have taken tradition for fact, and built his theory upon a sandy foundation. In trying to find an excuse for God to damn the heathen, taking it for granted as matter of course, that he will do so, he frankly acknowledges, that unless they have in their breasts an inward principle—a perfect conscience, which condemns them when they do wrong, &c. God cannot justly condemn them for ever.

We conclude this article with a remark on the peculiar expressions contained in the latter clause of the above quotation from the essay of A. B. He thinks that if the heathen have a perfect conscience for a guide, although their wicked works subvert its office, they may grovel in ignorance and heathenish darkness and yet be speechless at the "bar of God." We would thank our author if he would inform us, either through the medium of the Farmer's Advocate, or this paper, where the bar of God is, and when the poor heathen, who are to be damned for not knowing Christ and using the means that we are required to use, are to be speechless before it? And if he please to tell us, we should be glad to know, what source of information we can apply to, to obtain some just conceptions of the danger of the heathen being "hurled by the tempest of depravity into the gulf of perdition." And that he may not be idle, we beg leave to ask him a few very plain and simple questions. If man have a perfect conscience, must he not be possessed of an innate knowledge of things, circumstances, &c.? If any such principles are innate, why do men disagree on every conceivable point of morality and religion? If man have a perfect conscience, and it be not innate, at what age does he come into possession of it; and do idiots possess the same perfect conscience? Lastly: will A. B. have the goodness to let the public know, what evidence he has that the heathen will "perish forever," even should they not do as we are commanded to do? We should be happy to hear from A. B. when convenient.

A SHORT SERMON

FROM A LONG CONTROVERTED TEXT.

For I say unto you, that except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.—Mat. v. 20.

The above text is frequently pressed into the service of believers in the endless misery of the wicked, to prove that some will be shut out from the presence of God forever. My object is, to show the impropriety of such an application of this portion of truth; and to lead the reader into the kingdom of heaven by a way not sufficiently known to some of those who pretend to extraordinary knowledge of divine things.

Our first enquiry will be, what is the kingdom of heaven into which those addressed could not enter without righteousness superior to that of the scribes and pharisees.

It is supposed by those who use this text for the purpose above mentioned, that the kingdom of heaven is a state of happiness, which is to be enjoyed only in another mode of existence; but to prove the error of such an opinion we have only to consult the scriptures. The gospel dispensation which was to succeed that of Moses and the law, and over which Christ was to reign until all his enemies should be subdued to God, is frequently, and we may say, almost uniformly, represented by the phrase "kingdom of heaven," or "kingdom of God." That this kingdom was to be set up on earth within a short time from the period when our text was delivered, is abundantly evident from the scriptures. The foregoing facts will be illustrated by a few quotations. See Mat. iii. 2. "Repent ye for the kingdom of heaven is at hand!" Mat. v. 3. "Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is [not shall be] the kingdom of heaven." Mat. xi. 12. "And from the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." In the parables spoken by our Saviour, he generally commenced by using a similar phraseology, plainly indicating that he spoke of something which should take place here on earth. "The kingdom of heaven is likened unto" this or that, &c. Mat. xxiii. 13. Addressing the scribes and pharisees, it is said, "wo unto you scribes and pharisees, hypocrites; for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men; for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in." This form of expression unquestionably denotes something which they were then doing. They were then shutting up the kingdom of heaven by their unbelief; and they were then, by their consummate hypocrisy, preventing others from submitting themselves to the reign of Christ.

The kingdom of God is a phrase synonymous with the one just noticed. See Mat. xii. 28. "But if I cast out devils by the spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you." See also Luke x. 9, 11, and xi. 20, where similar language is used. Mat. xxi. 31. Our Lord speaking of the blindness, perversity and pride of the Jews, said to them, "the publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of God before you." And verse 43. "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. Luke xvii. 20, 21. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation, neither shall they say lo! here, or lo! there, for the kingdom of God is within you."

From the foregoing quotations it is evident, that the kingdom of heaven, or of God, is a state of enjoyment here, and not in another world as many have supposed. This kingdom was likened unto ten virgins, five wise and five foolish; and no one will be so extravagant as to suppose that heaven will be darkened by the want of oil, or disturbed by the folly of those who neglect to procure it when a good opportunity presents. And to confess the truth, I am ignorant of any passage in the bible that proves the common doctrine, or the generally received opinion of this subject.

Having ascertained what and where the kingdom of heaven is, we are now led to inquire into the meaning of our Saviour when speaking of the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees.

If we consult the New Testament, we shall find that the earth never sustained a denomination of religionists, who were more strict in their discipline, or more exact in their observance of the externals of religion, than the scribes and pharisees. Their feasts, their fasts, their holy days and sabbaths, were observed with the most scrupulous exactness. Such was their attachment to, and veneration of those institutions, that even Jesus himself did not escape their censure. They rebuked him for plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath, and condemned him for doing good on a similar occasion. In appearance they were eminently religious.—They not only attended to all the ceremonies then in vogue, but they paid tithes of all they possessed; they fasted twice a week; and although they were somewhat unfortunate in procuring converts, yet they actually compassed sea and land to make one proselyte; they made long prayers, even in the corners of the streets; and for aught we know, they were as pious as the generality of christians in our own time. But it is declared to be necessary that we have righteousness that exceeds that of the scribes and pharisees; and we will now attempt to understand the duty required.

That righteousness which is necessary to prepare us for the kingdom of heaven, consists in humility, and a disposition to keep the commandments of God.—Righteousness does not consist in saying, "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out demons;" nor in trumpeting forth our charity; nor in being unwilling to go to heaven if all men are to be saved. Much of that pretended piety which is professed in the world bears a very near resemblance to the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees of old; and is the opposite of true humility, or that becoming resignation to the will of heaven, required of us in the gospel of God. True humility leads its possessor to throw himself at the feet of Jesus, humbly desiring to be fed with the crumbs that are given to the dogs. Resignation, is that which leads us to endure the ills of life with composure, and yield with fortitude to the privations and trials to which we are exposed, or are called to endure. If we are truly humble, when it pleases God to grant us health, we shall improve it in praising him for the blessing: If he cause grief for a season, it will remind us of his love: If he give us friends to smooth the rugged journey of life, we shall be glad; if he take them from us, we shall not mourn as those who have no hope: Should he give us children we shall bless him; if he take them from us, we shall say "the Lord gave, and the Lord taketh away, and blessed be the name of the Lord." And should the Almighty in the dispensation of his impartial grace, finally reconcile all things to himself: should he fulfil his gracious promises in saving all men from sin, we shall not be disposed to say "if every body goes to heaven we desire not to be saved." Such, with their concomitants, are the essentials of righteousness. The difference between this kind of righteousness and that of the scribes and pharisees, will be apparent on a careful comparison. On the one hand hypocrisy and parade are discovered; the proud pretender, with supercilious contempt, speaks forth the arrogance of his soul, saying "stand by thyself, I am higher than thou." His proud soul scorns to come down to the level of humanity, but dwells on "duties he has done." On the other hand, we may behold the sinner smiting on his breast, crying God be merciful. The pharisee congratulates himself on the righteousness of his faith, of his devotion, of his daily walk and conversation, and urges his unhallowed claim upon divine favor; the humble man dare not entertain the hope of grace, unless all others are included in the same covenant of mercy that ensures his own salvation.

APPLICATION.

Our subject affords a striking illustration of the doctrine of divine benevolence, and the frame of mind essential to its reception. It is, if I mistake not, a fact too evident to need proof, that it requires no humility to prepare us to believe the doctrine of a partial salvation. To believe that we shall be saved, and our neighbours lost, is perfectly congenial with the spirit of the pharisee. If our Saviour had taught the doctrine of endless misery as it is now generally believed, the scribes and pharisees were well qualified to enter his kingdom and enlist in his service. Yea they would have shut out all others beside those of their own faith, and barred the gates of the holy city against all unwelcome intruders. The heart of man, while corroded with pride and arrogance, can receive the doctrine of a partial salvation without reluctance. The language of pride is, and ever has been, "I am the favorite of heaven—my neighbor is the child of Hell!"

On the other hand no man can persuade himself, or be persuaded of the fact, that his neighbors and enemies will be saved as well as himself, until he becomes humble and of a contrite heart. The most perfect humility and self-abasement are necessary to prepare the heart for the reception of truth. Impartial love is a stranger to that heart which is unwilling that all should be saved; and humility is not to be found among those who rejoice in the anticipation of another's endless woe.

Hence we learn, that before we can enjoy the hope that maketh not ashamed, we must become like little children; not anxious to be greatest in the kingdom of God, but willing to receive the "gift of grace," in common with our fellow men. If an angel should announce to the whole world, that "all men shall be saved and come unto a knowledge of the truth," not one would believe the heavenly message until he had found by self-examination, that he was the "chief of sinners." Heaven has so ordered the affairs of his grace, that his kingdom is not to be entered by the haughty scribe or boasting pharisee. Blessed are the meek, the humble, the truly penitent, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven,—yea, theirs are the joys of believing that "all the nations of the earth shall remember and turn to the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him."

THE END OF THE MATTER.

Previous to and at the time of issuing the first number of this volume of the Advocate, we made an explicit avowal of the plan we had fixed upon, and the course we had marked out for ourselves. The public have been duly apprised of what we designed to do; but it would seem that some are yet uninformed as to what we design not to do. Some have censured us for the independent ground we have taken, and are perhaps somewhat apprehensive of the result. And now, that there may be no misconceptions hereafter, and that we may not be subjected to the inconvenience of saying any thing farther on the subject, we give our readers the following statement of facts.

We SHALL NOT admit any thing into our columns that favors scepticism or infidelity, unless for the express purpose of refuting it. This paper is designed to support the religion of Jesus Christ, to illustrate his precepts and those of his primitive followers, and to inculcate the genuine doctrines of the Bible. Whoever, therefore, expects that we shall do otherwise, will be disappointed.

We SHALL NOT turn to the right hand nor to the left, to compromise with the prejudices, follies, or errors of prefer-ing christians; nor shall we refrain from speaking what we believe to be truth, whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear. Whatever may be the consequence to ourselves, we believe it to be a duty paramount to all others, to express the honest sentiments of our hearts. Believing thus, it would be criminal in us to refrain. We are no less determined to keep our own hearts open to conviction than we are to speak what we believe; and if our friends or foes desire to set us right, they must meet us on the ground of sincerity, and assail us with argument rather than complaints.

We SHALL NOT hold our peace while we behold our own brethren in the fault; but shall ever be as ready to administer timely reproof, as to speak of the advancement of our cause. Hence those among us who desire to hear the cry of "peace, peace, when there is no peace," will probably fall out by the way.

We SHALL NOT meddle with personalities to gratify the whims of any being on earth, but shall only resort to such a remedy, when persons become identified with error and obstinately adhere to it.

We SHALL NOT "fail nor be discouraged" in our attempts to excite a laudable and praiseworthy zeal amongst universalists; to aid our ministering brethren in the cause to which their faculties of body and mind are devoted; to mark out an honest and upright course for all who have the faith; and to accompany our faithful fellow-believers in the march of improvement, until truth, honesty, and virtue, shall triumph over the groveling schemes of priest-craft and error—yea, until a countless multitude of sincere universalists, shall, without molestation, unite their voices in anthems of purest praise and thanksgiving to ALMIGHTY LOVE.

We SHALL NOT add any thing farther on this subject, leaving it to our friends and patrons to decide, whether we shall be sustained in an open and manly course, or shall pursue a contrary one. Believing that our resolution will be approbated by every honest universalist, we shall "thank God and take courage," trusting in the Omnipotent Ruler of the universe for aid, and to the approval of a good conscience for the desired reward.

EXCOMMUNICATION.

The following, as will be seen, is the second letter of Mrs. Curtis, and was written in reply to one from the Church, at Nine Mile Creek, citing her to appear before them. The writer, as we are informed, did not appear, but her husband, as in duty bound, became the bearer of the letter, and read it to the church. The reader must decide on its merits; but the careful observer will see in it, enough to refute the notion of endless burnings, and silence the complaints against her holy faith. She did not enter into metaphysical speculations, nor appeal to the opinions of fallible men. Her refuge was God and his testimony. Her hopes were founded on the rock, and will abide when flesh and heart shall fail.

LETTER II.

To the Presbyterian Church at Nine Mile Creek, Marcellus.

You have cited me to appear at the Meeting house, this 21st day of March, to answer to a charge brought before the church against me for not believing the doctrine of endless misery, and for believing the doctrine of universal salvation. It is not convenient for me to attend, for I have a sick grand-child under my care; but brethren, I am ready to give a reason of the hope that is in me, and pray God that I may do it with meekness and fear. My belief is founded on the immutable promises of God, which I find in the Holy Bible; and

I think it proper to state a few out of the many which I rely upon. The first is the promise that the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head. No power is given to the serpent higher than the heel. Does this look like the greater part of mankind being made eternally miserable? I think it does not. It is said "look unto me and be ye saved all the ends of the earth for I am God, and beside me there is none else; I have sworn by myself; the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return; that unto me every knee shall bow and every tongue shall swear, surely shall say in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." In the seed of Abraham "shall all the nations, kindreds and families of the earth be blessed;" therefore say to them that are of a fearful heart, "be strong, fear not; behold your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompence, he will come and save you. And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed and all flesh see it together; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death! O death, I will be thy plagues, O grave I will be thy destruction, repentance shall be hid from mine eyes." And the apostle, speaking of Christ, says, he shall destroy death and him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver those who, thro' fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage. It is said by the prophet, in this mountain (Zion) shall the Lord of hosts destroy the face of covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations; that he will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth, for the Lord hath spoken it. God retaineth not anger for ever, because he delighteth in mercy. He doth not afflict or grieve the children of men willingly, but for their profit, that they may be partakers of his holiness. And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you, whom the heaven must receive until the time of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets ever since the world began. This is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth; for there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time.

Now, if Christ gave his life a ransom for all, how can he see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, if all are not saved? And if he tasted death for every man, shall not all be benefitted by his resurrection? God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them.

It is said, he that believeth not shall be damned. Now, brethren, have you not all been in unbelief? And were you not in a state of damnation at that time? And how did you extricate yourselves from that dreadful state? Was it not the work of the holy spirit; was it not all of grace? Then why not believe that God's tender mercies are over all his works, that he is no respecter of persons? or what have you done more than others, that you should say, "stand by thyself, come not near me, I am holier than thou?" Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is anti-christ that denieth the Father and the Son; and have I denied the being or power of either? No, brethren, but I acknowledge their power, their love, and their goodness; and that their will is equal to their power and goodness. I acknowledge that we have all one Father; that one God hath created us, and that his tender mercies are over all his works. Here, then, is the foundation of my belief. Let brotherly love continue. Yours, &c.

EDITHA CURTIS.

N. B. When I had done writing the above letter, I took the Bible, and opened to the LXXI Psalm and read it. The whole of it is so applicable to my present feelings, except the 10—13 verses, that I desire you all to read it attentively.

"PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

[From Ballou's Notes on the Parables.]

PARABLE V.

"And if thy right hand offend thee, (or cause thee to offend which perhaps is more just) pluck it out and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. And if thy right hand offend thee, (or cause thee to offend,) cut it off and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell."

MAT. V. 29, 30.

It is evident that Christ spake these words by way of a parable; for literally speaking, the loss of an eye or a hand would make no difference in a moral or religious sense.

Some have understood that by a right eye, or a right hand was meant those particular sins to which men were most prone or violently attached. Others suppose, that particular friends and connexions in life, who, being unfriendly to the religion of Christ, might lead us astray, or cause us to offend against the glorious cause of the Redeemer, were to be understood by right eye or hand; and as there is nothing in either explanation which can immediately tend to any gross corruption, I need not be very particular on this part of the subject; though perhaps the latter explanation would better comport with the like passage in St. Mark, where the person is represented as maimed in consequence of parting with a hand, as parting with our friends causes the feelings of maimedness more than parting with our sins does. Perhaps we should do well to decide in favor of the latter explanation.

We pass to take notice of the hell noted in the text. The word hell is, undoubtedly, variously used in scripture, but always means misery and trouble when used in a moral sense; in which sense it is evidently used in the above passage. David, in the 18th Psalm, 5th verse, says, the sorrows of hell compassed me about. Psalm lxxxv. 13. "Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell." If we consider David here speaking of himself, it brings to mind that awful iniquity of which he was guilty, and the crime for which he condemned himself before Nathan the prophet.—And what quill can describe the anguish of a soul lying under the guilt of a crime of as

No wonder David spake so highly of the goodness of the Lord in granting him a gracious remission of his sins, and a release from the bondage of iniquity and hell of guilt. But if we understand those words of David in a still further light, and apply them to Christ, we find him "a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief;" and it would be still more difficult to describe the sorrows of his heart, when his soul was made an offering for sin. The dreadful perplexities into which sin so often brings us would seem a sufficient inducement to raise an everlasting hatred in our minds towards it; but perhaps we are never brought to hate sin as we ought to, until we have some knowledge of its atonement by Christ. But he, who bore our sins in his own body on the tree, knew perfectly well the consequence of sin, and therefore was able to give proper warnings and admonitions against it; and as we lack wisdom in almost all things, it would be happy for us to attend to those divine monitions given by the great lover of sinners. But it is with the most of men, as with the child, they dread not the fire until they feel its anguish-giving power.

But before we dismiss this parable, we will take particular notice of its corresponding passage in St. Mark; more particularly of that fire of which it is said it shall never go out.—This fire is the same, no doubt, as described in notes on former parables; perhaps the same fire is alluded to in Deuteronomy xxxii. 22.—"For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell;" &c. Here observe, this fire was to burn unto the lowest hell, which teaches us that sublime truth of the agency of the Divine Spirit in reproving the world of sin, and cleansing it from all iniquity by the blood of the cross. And when we are right respecting this fire, the conclusion will fully evince. Observe Mark ix. 40. "For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Remember that we are exhorted to offer our bodies a living sacrifice to God, which is our reasonable service; but this cannot be done until we are salted with fire. Again, in verse 50, Christ says, "Salt is good; but if the salt have lost its saltiness, wherewith will you season it?" that is the sacrifice. But we are not to suppose that this divine fire can change in itself, but that it may be quenched in us; and therefore we are exhorted not to quench the Spirit. And Christ closes, by exhorting his disciples to have salt in themselves, (which salt is that fire which can never be quenched;) and to have peace one with another. Here, undoubtedly, we see the end of the holy fire on the altar of sacrifice used in the priesthood of the law.

Because it is said in Mark ix. that the fire, into which the subject should be cast, never shall be quenched, the passage has been generally applied to the support of the doctrine of future, eternal, unmerciful punishment. And indeed, all such like passages must be applied to that use, or that doctrine must lose the credit which has, for a long time, perhaps too implicitly been given to it.

To show that such doctrine has no natural connexion with the text and context, we may notice the following particulars.

1st. Those to whom the words of the parable were spoken.

2d. The character of the speaker, as he stood in relation to those to whom he spake; and

3d. The nature and manifest design of the fire which is never quenched.

1st. According to the connexion of the text where it is found in the 5th of Matthew, Jesus spake these words to those whom he calls in the 13th verse "the salt of the earth" and in the 14th "the light of the world." According to the connexion in the 9th of Mark, these words were spoken by Christ to his disciples, as may be seen by reading from the 31st verse to the end of the chapter.

2d. The character in which Jesus stood, in relation to his disciples may be learned by the following scriptures. St. John xv. 12, &c.—"This is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you. Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth; but I have called you friends, for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known to you." See also chap. xiii. 34. "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another." From these scriptures we learn that Jesus acknowledged himself to be a friend to his disciples, who loved them, and was ready to lay down his life for them. The strength of his love to his disciples is also expressed in the 9th verse of the 15th of John; "As the Father hath loved me, so I have loved you."

3dly. The nature and manifest design of the fire which is never to be quenched, we learn, as has been observed in the notes, by observing that Jesus says, in the 49th verse of the 9th of Mark, "For every one shall be salted with fire and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt." This salt, which is the fire which never shall be quenched, is the same, no doubt represented, as has been noticed, by the directions given in Lev. ii. 13, the manifest design of this fire is to save, by its purifying qualities the subject on which it operates. Now if we can find any natural connexion between the three particulars, here brought to view, and the future, eternal, unmerciful punishment of those disciples and acknowledged friends of Jesus Christ, then the common opinion of this scripture stands on the evidence of the text. But the erroneousness of such an opinion is so palpable, that it requires no argument to make it more so.

The objector, possessing an unaccountable attachment to the opinion generally entertained of the text, will say—Although these words were spoken to the disciples of Christ, they ought to be applied to men in general. To this I agree, but not to the exclusion of the disciples. There surely would be no propriety in saying, that though Christ spake the words of our parable to his disciples, he did not mean that they should take either the direction or the warning to themselves. In the connexion of the text in Matthew v. Christ says to his disciples, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, ye shall in no case enter the kingdom of heaven." It surely would not be correct to say that Christ did not mean that his disciples should not enter the kingdom of heaven except their righteousness should exceed that of the scribes and pharisees. The truth is plain enough. The disciples of Christ, as well as every body else, must have a better righteousness than that of the scribes and pharisees, in order to enter the kingdom of heaven; and the disciples as well as every body else, were exposed to be cast into that refining fire, which never shall be quenched.—Therefore, if any of the human race ever were exposed to endless, unmerciful punishment, as proved, or intended by our parable, the disciples most surely were thus exposed. It is then reasonable for us to query, to see what friendship that must be which would exercise itself in inflicting endless, unmerciful punishment? If this be friendship what is enmity? If it be argued that the subject deserves this unmerciful punishment, and that it is inflicted by justice, though directly contrary to the benevolent principle of friendship, it is acknowledged that the friendship of Christ is directly opposed to justice. According to the scriptures Christ was so great a friend to all mankind as to lay down his life for them, and he is said to be the same yesterday, to day and for ever.—How then can he become unmerciful to those very sinners whom he loves, and for whom he died? The propriety of the notes on this parable, and their relation to the whole connexion is easy to be seen; for any punishment which is calculated to purge and cleanse mankind from sin, is perfectly consistent with the love and friendship which our Saviour has manifested for mankind. David was afflicted with the pains and sorrows of hell, and acknowledged that it was good for him that he was afflicted. The goodness of God to mankind is no less evident in the chastisements with which he corrects his children, than in the smiles of his providence; for the Lord will not cast off forever, but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.

CONTROVERSIAL.

[From Balfour's Inquiry.]

THE DEVIL AND SATAN.

2d. The speech of Job's wife, and his reply to her, shows, that neither Ahraman nor the devil was the cause of his afflictions. She no doubt heard what he said, chap. i. 21. Upon seeing him still persisting in his integrity under his affliction of the boils she was provoked at him, and in taunting language says to him—"Dost thou still retain thine integrity?" Curse God and die." On the word rendered to curse, Parkhurst thus writes: "The Lexicons have absurdly, and contrary to the authority of the ancient versions given to this verb the sense of cursing in the six following passages:—1 Kings, xxi. 10, 13. Job i. 5, 11. And ii. 5, 9. As to the two first the Seventy render Be-rek, in both, by eulogeo, and so the Vulgate, by benedico, to bless. And though Jezebel was herself an abominable idolatress, yet as the law of Moses still continued in force, she seems to have been wicked enough to have destroyed Naboth upon the false accusation of blessing the heathen aleim and Moloch, which subjected him to death, by Deut. xiii. 6, & xvii 2, 7. Job's fear, chap. i. 5, was, lest his sons should have blessed the false aleim; and verse 11, he says ought to be rendered—"And indeed stretch forth thy hand now, and touch all that he hath, surely he hath blessed thee to thy face," i. e. hypocritically; the verb being used in a past tense. The Seventy render it, truly he will bless thee to thy face. And the Vulgate—unless he hath blessed thee to thy face. Comp. verses 5, 7. And 1 Kings xx. 23. Satan brings the same charge of hypocrisy against Job, chap. ii. 5, which the Seventy, Theodotian and Vulgate render in the same manner. And at verse 9, his wife says to him, dost thou yet retain thy integrity, thy regard for the true God, blessing the aleim and dying, or even to death?"—Thus far Parkhurst, whose remarks shed additional light on this account. They agree with the usage of the word, which is rendered to bless, in other texts: they also accord, with the charge of hypocrisy, which is brought against Job by his friends throughout the book. But what deserves particular notice, these remarks show, that Job lived among a people who had a false aleim or God, and a contrast, if not a contest between this god and Jehovah is set forth in the account. The false god, is spoken of as one, and not many, and what god could this be but Ahraman? For the Persians had only two, their good god and their evil god. That a contrast, is set forth betwixt the false god and the true, is evident from Job's fear, chap. i. 5, lest his children should have blessed the false aleim or god, instead of cursing the true God as in the common version. It is also plain from the speech of his wife, who, instead of desiring Job to curse the true God, expresses her surprise, that he should continue to bless him though at the point of death in suffering from his hands. It is apparent, that she believed in Ahraman, and entertained the opinions concerning him as stated above by Prideaux. She was displeased with her husband, for continuing to trust in the true God at the gates of death, and even blessing him for his afflictions. In desiring him to renounce his confidence in the true God, did she mean that he should become an atheist, or live without any God? No; she impliedly wished him to trust in Ahraman the evil god, the author of all evil, and the cause of his afflictions. Job had despised him, and continued to trust in the true God to the last. She therefore wished him to abandon this confidence, and trust in the evil god, the true author of his afflictions. By doing so, he would become his friend, remove his afflictions, or terminate them by death.

3d. That this account of satan, is introduced to be condemned, and not sanctioned, appears from the reasonings of Job and his friends throughout the whole book. Job's friends, like himself, did not believe in Ahraman, for they maintain, that Jehovah, on account of his hypocrisy and wickedness, had sent such afflictions upon him. But I ask, does any one of them ever intimate, that satan, whether Persian god or Christian devil, had produced his afflictions? No; they are to a man agreed, that they were the doings of Jehovah, nor do they insinuate, that he used satan as a tool in producing them. As a specimen of their sentiments on this subject, let the reader consult chap. iv. 9. and v. 17, 18, and viii. 3, 4. Job defends himself against the charge of hypocrisy and wickedness brought by his friends. See as examples chap. vi. 4, 5. vii. 20, 21. ix. 16—18. x. 2. xvi. 11—15, and 19, 21. We may then appeal to every candid man, whether Job's friends, would have been silent about satan producing his afflictions, if they believed so. And had they believed satan, or Ahraman the author of all evil, would they have ascribed his afflictions to Jehovah? Besides; had Job or his friends believed, that Jehovah used satan as an instrument in inflicting them, why is nothing said about it, either in their charge or his defence? In repelling their accusations, would Job have failed to urge that his afflictions arose from satan's great enmity against him, had he but suspected that this was true. All know, that people are not very scrupulous now in blaming the devil. Nothing could have been easier or more natural, than for Job to repel the charges against him by saying, that satan hated him and had thus afflicted him. Can any man then believe, that this account was introduced to establish the existence of such an evil being, yet this be contradicted by Job and his friends throughout the book? If true, why not rather go on to confirm such a doctrine. — Is it objected—"if false why introduce it at all?" I answer; for the very purpose of refuting such an opinion, and for establishing the unity and supremacy of the one living and true God. It is well known, that false gods are often introduced in Scripture, in contrast with the true, for the very purpose of exposing their absurdity. But I ask, is any false god ever allowed to be able to do good or evil? No;—they are challenged to do either, to prove that they are gods. It is admitted by every intelligent man, that in the after part of the Old Testament, and in the New, there are allusions to the evil principle deified, or the evil god of the Persians. And to darkness as the symbol of this god. See a specimen of these, and how the sacred writers expose such a doctrine, Isai. xlv. 5—7. 2 Cor. vi. 15, x. 3. and xi. 13. Eph. vi. 10.

4th. Job's afflictions are referred to, James v. 11. and his patience under them, is set forth as an example to us, but are not ascribed to satan but to Jehovah. Indeed no sacred writer, these two chapters excepted, say or insinuate that Ahraman or satan had any influence in producing them. But I have a right to demand, why no sacred writer has done this, if they believed as most people do now that satan was the author of Job's afflictions? If they had the same view of those two chapters as most people now have, is it possible that they would have been silent on such a subject?

5th. However prone the Jews were to idolatry, and the superstitions of the nations around them, it was a truth obviously taught in their Scriptures, that their God was good, and that he had no evil being as a rival to him. So far from giving any countenance to an evil being called Ahraman, Satan, Devil, or by any other name, all witchcraft, necromancy, or appeals to any other being or power stand condemned, and the Jews were solemnly charged to have no concern with them. Jehovah, and he alone, is declared to be the creator, preserver, and ruler of all things, and all beings in the universe. Life and death, sickness and health, prosperity and adversity, are all ascribed to him. See Gen. i. 1. Dan. iv. 35. 1 Sam.

ii. 6, 7. Isai. xlv. 7. Amos iii. 6. Micah i. 12. Psalm xxxiii. 13—15. Prov. xvi. 4, 9. and xxi. 30. The idea of an evil being, which Christians call the devil and satan, and other nations have designated by a variety of names found no place in the Jewish Scriptures. That the Jews learnt such opinions from the heathen, we shall see in the next Section. In concluding our remarks on this account of satan in the book of Job, let us compare what is said in it, with the above quotation from Prideaux; and we shall see all that has been advanced strongly confirmed. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

INTEMPERANCE.

Much has been said and written against the sin of Intemperance; but until it is abolished, the pen of every friend of mankind should be aimed at its destruction. So long as men continue to indulge in the use of ardent spirits to excess, it remains the duty of the philanthropist, the moralist, and especially the christian, to endeavor to exhibit the odiousness of the crime, the destruction to which it leads, and the means necessary to be used to effect a radical cure.

We have not the vanity to suppose that any thing new can be said or written against the practice under consideration; but possibly some one may read these observations and thereby be awakened to a sense of the danger that attends an indulgence of a propensity so pre-eminently debasing and abhorrent to every heart of sensibility; and if one, who has been guilty of the sin, should be saved from ruin and disgrace by a perusal of what follows, we shall be amply repaid for the attempt.

To say that intemperance is a beastly sin, would be doing injustice to the animal creation; for the brutes that perish, though inferior to man in many respects, are generally satisfied when their real wants are supplied; whereas intemperate persons are not satisfied unless they have more than they need to supply the wants of nature. Many valuable lessons on temperance may be learned from the animal creation. They teach us, by their examples, the expediency of eating and drinking no more than is for our good; while frequently, rational beings, or at least, those who pretend to be rational, become riotous amidst the bounteous provisions of Providence, and are guilty of inebriation without the pretence of an excuse for the crime. In reality, an intoxicated person is the most loathsome and disgusting spectacle that can be presented to the eye of the sober observer; and any thing that approximates towards drunkenness is disgusting in proportion to the resemblance it bears to such an unnatural condition. The drunkard, how odious; how despicable; how intolerable!

The ruin to which intemperance invariably leads, renders the crime more dreadful and inexcusable. There are many iniquities to which men are led by propensities that appear to be inherent in the earthly nature of mortals; and the moralist or the christian is in duty bound to take into consideration all that can palliate or excuse them. But intemperance bears nb resemblance to any of those sins which answer to that description; for God, it is believed, never disgraced the work of his hands by implanting in the nature of man, a propensity to drunkenness. It is an unnatural, and if I may so speak, an unbeastly sin, acquired by habit, and perpetuated by an indulgence in that which reason, as well as revelation, condemns.

Every cause has its effect; and hence follows as a certain consequence of an apparently harmless beginning, an artificial thirst, and at length an ungovernable—perhaps an incurable desire for the poisonous draught. But the more dreadful result, is the ruin of all that is amiable, commendable or virtuous in the victim of the destroying angel, intemperance.

It may be a question with the moralist, whether a depravity and degradation of the intellectual faculties of men be the cause or the consequence of intemperance; but the fact that both are intimately connected in the person of the drunkard, admits of no controversy. Who, it may be asked, ever knew a confirmed drunkard in possession of the more endearing qualifications of humanity? Or who can point us to the man of acute sensibility, who is at the same time a drunkard? The tender emotions of friendship, of affection, of kindness, are absent from the heart of him whose limbs are benumbed by an habitual use of the cup; and while the tear of pity may be dropped at his deplorable condition, he is not to be considered a friend, nor honored with our confidence or respect.

The physical, as well as the intellectual, powers, are at first impaired by inebriation, and at length entirely destroyed. He, who but a few days since, was possessed of a hale constitution, well qualified for the active and useful duties of life, may, to-day be found a weak, tottering, helpless, and loathsome being! His bloated countenance, palsied limbs, and reeling carcase, are but miserable representatives of what he once was, and exhibit to the calm beholder, a contrast, at once disgusting, dreadful and appalling. To this may be added the ruin of his estate, the loss of his reputation, and the distress of his family, which complete the outlines of a hell, more fearful than the Sheol of ancient times or the Gehenna of the Jews. To this state of mental, physical, and moral destruction, thousands are traveling, apparently unconscious of the fact that every step adds to the uncertainty of a reformation or a return to temperance and happiness.

The foregoing remarks are enough to excite a desire in the breast of every friend of man to find out a remedy for the evil. The anguish of widowed mothers, the cries of helpless children, the tears of the lonely orphan, call loudly upon every moral member of community, to make one powerful, mighty effort, to stop the progress of a sin so universally prevalent, and so undeniably alarming. We do not expect that any thing we can do, will be effectual: our sphere is limited, and our very strength is weakness; but we would, so far as our readers have confidence in our friendship, appeal to their reason and better judgment in behalf of the cause of temperance, believing that a majority will pay a suitable attention to our suggestions. It is to our brethren in the faith once delivered to the saints, that we make the appeal—to those who believe in a doctrine, the pre-eminent excellence of which is beginning to be appreciated by an innumerable multitude of rational and intelligent persons.

The road to temperance, is a straight and narrow one, yet wide enough for every human being to travel in. If there appears to be any thing paradoxical in this statement, it may be easily explained. The reason why the road is narrow and yet wide enough for every human being, is, because each one is required to walk in it for himself. Reformation or perseverance in improvement, like charity, begins at home; or in other words, every man must reform himself. In order that this may be done, we would recommend a very simple, safe, and infallible remedy for intemperance, which we advise every reader to use for himself. It is like the grace of God, to be had "without money, and without price," or at any rate, can be obtained by the poor as well as the rich; and the only obstacle that can prevent a cure, is the want of a resolution to follow the directions. The remedy is this:—Let each one for himself, immediately form the noble resolution, to ABANDON, ENTIRELY, THE USE OF ARDENT SPIRITS; and after the resolution is adopted, let each one firmly ADHERE TO IT FOREVER.

It is possible that our prescription may be, for a few days, attended with unpleasant feelings, a loss of appetite, and a slight depression of spirits; but many certificates could be produced to show conclusively, that a few weeks will end the pain and restore the patient to health and happiness. Indeed, instances have been known, in which the peace of families, of neighborhoods, and of whole communities, has been restored, in a short time, by an application of the foregoing remedy. And we doubt not, that should all our universalist brethren set the example, there would soon be an apparent improvement in the moral condition of our country. We would, therefore, press the matter home upon the consciences of all who profess to believe in a God of LOVE, exhorting, nay, entreating each one to make the experiment. A truly noble and praiseworthy undertaking is before us: let us then, one and all, as individuals, and as a body of professing christians, distinguish ourselves by "temperance in all things," and by thus setting before our accusers an example worthy of being imitated by all, secure peace to ourselves and our families. May Heaven enable you all to form and keep the holy resolution. One effort, one resolve of the mind, will secure a victory; and he who makes the attempt will be successful.

APOLOGY.

¶ We owe an apology to our patrons for delays in issuing our papers. Owing to the peculiar severity of the weather, our paper maker has been unable to furnish us as we could desire. Nothing that human exertions could do has been wanting on our part, to have this paper promptly executed and delivered; but the elements have been arrayed against us. We trust our friends will be ready to overlook the delays which have been unavoidable; while on our part we renew our pledge that no pains shall be spared to meet the expectations of our friends. We intend to have our papers in the mails the evening previous to the day of publication. Our subscribers are also informed, that where the 1st number of this volume may not have come to hand, it can be supplied by informing the Post Master, Buffalo:

IMPORTANT TO OUR PATRONS.

Owing to an unexpected augmentation of the number of subscribers for this paper, and in view of the prospect of a still greater increase, we have concluded to make the following proposals to our patrons, viz.

Those subscribers living at a distance who have not found it convenient to pay in advance, according to the original proposal, shall be entitled to the fifth volume, by sending One dollar and fifty cents to Julius Guiteau, Esq. P. M. Buffalo, N. Y. on or before the fifteenth of February inst. We grant this farther indulgence, with a view to accommodate our patrons and save them expense.

Subscribers in the village of Black Rock, who have not paid in advance, can, by paying one dollar and fifty cents, either to the editors, or to S. H. Salisbury, before the middle of this month, entitle themselves to the same privilege.

Our patrons in this village, are informed, that the carrier, will present their bills with the sixth number, and if paid at that time no more than one dollar and fifty cents will be required; otherwise, the original terms, of the paper, as published in the imprint, will be adhered to.

The above notice is not designed to interfere with any special agreements made with our agents, or others, but is given for the purposes above stated.

Our subscribers may save expense in postage by having their papers sent DOUBLE. Where two subscribers live near each other, they can have both papers sent on one sheet, and cut them apart after they are received, which will save the postage on one number each week. Those who desire to avail themselves of this privilege can do so by giving seasonable notice. "A penny saved," &c.

MISCELLANY.

In the following remarks of the Recorder, of N. Y. there is much to admire. The inestimable privileges of our happy country are delicately hinted at in his address to the culprits, and could not fail, we should think, of making a deep and lasting impression on the minds of those unfortunate foreigners who had been tried and found guilty of an offence against those laws, the benefits of which might have been enjoyed by them as well as others. Like the law of God, those of our country are enacted solely with a view to secure the happiness of every subject, and render it impossible to be happy in transgression.—EDITORS.

John M'Donnough, William M'Elroy, John Gurrell, Edward Ward, Edward Quire, John Brown, Owen Carty, John Grone, and Patrick Waters were put to the bar. The Recorder addressed them as follows:—"You have been convicted of a riot and assault and battery.—You present a spectacle of wonder and astonishment to the Court. We are informed that none of you are natives of our country; that you have come among us in search of liberty and freedom of conscience and person. Here you enjoy that freedom which is our birthright, and equally with our own citizens, the benefits of our laws and institutions. If you are reclaimed by any foreign government, we will not only refuse to deliver you up, but even go to war in your defence. As to what you honestly earn, no man can take it from you, and the fruits of your industry are secured to you, and your families. By the law of the land alone can your earnings be taken from you, and that law you have broken. By that law, in addition to the protection afforded you both in person and property, you are entitled to worship the Almighty in what way your conscience dictates. What more you would wish it is impossible to conceive. One would naturally suppose, that with the enjoyment of such advantages, instead of breaking the laws and creating disquiet among the citizens of your adopted country, you would be among the first to support and sustain them. In this country, we never have occasion to use the military power, because, in the great body of the people, there is always a willingness to preserve quiet and quell disorder. In a country where unequal laws exist—where one man is rolling in luxury on the hard earnings of his brother—where one may worship God and another may not, except in a prescribed, limited manner, such disorders are not surprising; but here, where the laws are impartial—where every man possesses a just and unalienable right of freedom—a right enjoyed in its most sacred extent, such conduct as that of which you have been guilty is really astonishing."

After some few more remarks to the same effect, the Recorder proceeded to sentence all but Brown and M'Elroy to three years confinement in the penitentiary. Brown and M'Elroy, in consideration of their families, were discharged, on recognizances of two hundred and fifty dollars to keep the peace for one year.—M'Gee, the watchman, is still dangerously and doubtfully ill; and the Recorder stated that should death ensue, they would yet be tried for their lives.

EXTRACT.

"Nay, so blind is opinion-zeal, that some good Christian Pastors will not scruple to tell you, they could find no joy in their own state, no strength or comfort in their labors of love towards their flocks, but because they know, and are assured from St. Paul, that God never had, nor ever will have mercy on all men; but an unknown multitude of them, are, through all ages of the world, inevitably decreed by God to an eternal fire, and damnation of hell; and an unknown number of them to an irresistible salvation.

Wonder not then, if the inquisition has its pious defenders; for Inquisition cruelty, nay every barbarity that must have an end, is mere mercy, if compared with this doctrine. And to be in love with it—to draw sweet comfort from it, and wish it God-speed, is a love that absolutely forbids the loving (of) our neighbor as ourselves, and makes the wish that all men might be saved no less than a rebellion against God.

It is a love with which the cursed hater of men, would willingly unite, and take comfort; for could he know from St. Paul, that millions and millions of mankind are created and doomed to be his eternal slaves, he might be as content with this doctrine, as some good preachers are; and cease going about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour, as knowing that his kingdom was so sufficiently provided for, without any labor of his own.

Oh, the sweetness of God's election, cries out the ravished Preacher!—Oh, the sweetness of God's reprobation, might the hellish-satan well say, could he believe that God had made him a free-gift of such myriads, and myriads of men of all nations, tongues and languages, from the beginning to the end of the world, and reserved so small a number for himself!

This is the blessed fruit of the imputation doctrine. What a complaint and condemnation is there made in scripture of those who sacrificed their sons and daughters to devils? And yet this reprobation doctrine, represents God as sacrificing myriads of his own creatures, made in his own image, to an everlasting hell. There is not an absurdity of heathenish faith and religion, but what is less shocking than this doctrine; and yet so blindly are some zealous doctors of the gospel bigotted to it, as to set it forth as the glorious manifestation of the supreme sovereignty of God. My friends let any old woman preach to you, rather than these doctors!"—Letters to Wm. Law, L. 3. P. 57.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Holland Purchase Convention at Buffalo.—On Wednesday next the 6th inst. a Convention from such towns on the Holland Purchase as may have thought proper to attend to the request of the late meeting at Lockport, will be held at Rathbun's Eagle Tavern, Buffalo, to take into consideration the situation of the settlers generally who reside upon the Holland Purchase. The embarrassed state of many of the settlers on this fruitful tract of country, would need an explanation to those without the purchase; which can be easily known and readily given, to any who will take the trouble to examine into the relations between the settlers and the Holland Company. Every town ought to be represented by the best talents it can command.

The sufferings of the Greeks, in defending themselves against the superior force of their cruel and ferocious tormentors, seems once more to expand the hearts of many of our countrymen. Very considerable sums in money, clothing and provisions, have already been received by the Greek Committee in New York.

Ineffectual attempts have been made in Massachusetts and Maine, to elect Senators in Congress. The two houses in each state not agreeing.

A most distressing fire occurred last week in the city of Alexandria, district of Columbia. More than 50 houses were destroyed, and property to more than $150,000 was consumed. Congress, acting in their territorial character over that district have made a donation of $20,000 to the sufferers.

Affecting Circumstance.—On the 1st ult. the dwelling house of Mr. Isaac Serine, Hector, Tompkins co. was burnt to the ground; two of his children perished in the flames. Mr. Serine and his wife were spending the evening at a certain neighbor's, and had left six small children who had gone to bed. One of whom, a boy of about 12 years of age, was awakened by the smoke which filled the house; he immediately got up and proceeded to an adjoining room, and succeeded in getting out of the house three of his little brothers and one sister. He then returned to the room he had slept in, where he had left a little brother about three years old, in the bed he had occupied, to take him out; but the flames had made great progress; the bed and clothes were all on fire, and he struggled with the all-devouring element to rescue his brother to no purpose, until himself was burned to such a degree that his skin peeled off. It was a cold and boisterous night, and he, entirely naked, proceeded to the nearest neighbor's house, the blood marking every footstep. He survived only until next morning. This is another awful warning to parents who leave small children alone.

The Theatre.—The N. Y. Advocate states that 10,000 dollars are expended a week at the theatres in that city. This does not include slings, juleps, coffee, pies, &c. Thus in six months more than $60,000 will be expended at the theatres in one city, and thousands of youth will be ruined. "Vice, in every form lives and moves, and has its being, in the purlieus of a theatre."

Accident.—The Montreal Courant of December 26, says—On Thursday last, five Indian females, belonging to the Caughnawaga tribe, embarked in a canoe at La-hine, for the purpose of crossing the river, and joining their families. It is supposed that the current was so very strong as not to allow the women to bear up against it with their paddles, and that they were drifted down the river, as the canoe was afterwards found at the foot of the Lachine rapids, with its bottom upwards. A gentleman who was at the Indian village on Monday, informs us that nothing has been heard of those unfortunate passengers since their embarkation, there is consequently no doubt entertained of their having been upset in the rapids, and drowned.

A few days ago the house of Mr. Robert Anderson, at St. Catharine's, about twelve miles from Niagara was burnt down. The fire commenced while the family were asleep, and before they could be removed, Mrs. Anderson and one of her children perished in the flames.

Waste of Time.—"It has been discovered," says President Lindsley, in an address lately published, "It has been discovered at length, what indeed was always sufficiently obvious, that a boy need not be kept at school eight or ten years, to learn to read his primer, write his name, cipher to the rule of three, and to hate books and learning for the rest of his life. It has been discovered that boys may in three or four years be taught a hundred fold more, by skilful teachers in a skilful way, than their fathers ever dreamed of learning at all. This is the grandest discovery of our age. It will do more to meliorate the moral, physical, and political condition of mankind generally, than all other means ever yet devised."

MARRIED.—In Clarence on the 18th ult. by J. Wiltse, Esq. Mr. Charles Utley, to Miss Elizabeth Hunt, all of that town.

In Erie, on the 24th ult. by the same, Mr. Joel Gallup, of Clarence, to Miss Sarah Hunt, of the former place.

At Black Rock, by the Rev. Mr. Fillmore, Mr. Charles H. Saxton, to Miss Elizabeth M. Lester.

OBITUARY.

DIED—At Pembroke, on Thursday, 25th ult. Doct. JAMES EVERETT SEAVER, in the 40th year of his age.—If any thing should be urged against the custom of recording in ordinary cases, the virtues of the dead, an excuse may be found for this notice, in the character and pre-eminent excellence of the lamented Dr. J. E. Seaver. It is unnecessary, and would be unbecoming in us, to attempt to add any thing to the worth of such a man; for his integrity, his moral uprightness, his superior intellectual endowments, as well as his amiable and conciliating deportment through life, will live without our aid, in the remembrance of all who knew him, as long as virtue, religion and morality, shall be venerated or cherished in the hearts of mankind.

Doct. James E. Seaver, was the eldest son of Mr. William Seaver, by his first wife. His truly excellent mother was the only daughter of Mr. Andrew Everett, and sister of the late Mr. Linus Everett, who died at Niagara Falls July 19, 1825. The subject of this notice was born at Middleborough, Mass. on the 15th of October, 1797. During his infancy his parents emigrated to Vermont, and afterwards removed to Hebron, N. Y. where he studied his profession with Dr. Darrow. Soon after his marriage, he removed to Pembroke and commenced the practice of medicine; but was soon compelled to abandon it on account of a chronic rheumatism, which brought on other complaints and terminated his earthly existence. He was uniformly upright in all his dealings, sincere in all his professions, and exemplary in his walk and conversation. His integrity was unimpeachable. He was an honest man.

His early religious principles were Calvinistic; but from reading the scriptures and investigating the important subject, he became a Universalist. He was an able advocate of the doctrine of a full, free and universal salvation of the whole world, for many years. He was not only a devout professor of the doctrine, but he lived according to its requirements. His faith was firm, and his hope unchanging. His arguments in support of his principles were characterized by sincerity and clearness; and though not always productive of the desired effect, were nevertheless well calculated to produce conviction in the intelligent mind. He possessed a vigorous and discriminating mind, which enabled him to detect and expose the follies of mankind, and to discover the intrinsic worth of men and things. He judged not from outward appearances, but formed opinions from facts. In the full exercise of reason he beheld the approach of death with composure, and left the world without regret. He realized in the trying hour, the efficacy of his faith, and has left an example of the comforts to be derived from a well grounded hope in the goodness and impartial love of our heavenly Father.

His funeral discourse was pronounced, in compliance with his request expressed a short time previous to his death, by the senior editor of this paper, before a very numerous, attentive, and highly respectable auditory, who attended to pay their last tribute of respect to a worthy man and useful citizen. Thus has terminated the earthly career of one whose loss we sincerely deplore, but whose "pains and woes, and griefs, and fears," as we humbly trust, are forever o'er. These remarks are made by one who was honored with his confidence and esteem, and who can never forget his virtues and intellectual worth, while reason holds an empire in the mind, or friendship dwells within his breast.

In this village on the 21st ult. Mrs. Mary, consort of Mr. Elisha Delano, in the 61st year of her age. She had been a firm believer in the salvation of all men for about 40 years, and proved by her example while living, and resignation while dying, that her faith was as an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast. She has left behind her, to mourn her loss, a husband and seven children, with whom all can sympathize, who knew her worth.

At sea, Lieut. H. Dulany, of the U. S. Navy.

At Lockport, Mr. John Tucker, merchant, aged 26.

THE STILL SMALL VOICE.

The Whirlwind pass'd by in the pride of its might,
And the dark cliffs of Horeb were shook with affright;
It shriek'd in the forest, it peal'd in the air,
But the prophet moved not, for the Lord was not there.

Then hard on the wind came the earthquake's wide shock;
And reel'd the whole mountains, and shook every rock;
The sons of the mountains grew pale in despair,
But the prophet was silent, the Lord was not there.

Bright blaz'd o'er the mountain a column of fire,
And the beasts of the forests in terror retire;
But the wreath of the flames as they curl'd in the air,
Were unseen by the prophet, the Lord was not there.

Then a voice through the gloom, softly murmuring stole;
It breath'd inspiration, it thrill'd thro' the soul;
It was heard in no thunder, was seen in no glare,
But it spoke to the heart, for Jehovah was there.

HUMAN LIFE.

I stood by the towers of Ardenveile,
And the bells rang out a joyous peal,
Loudly and merrily rang they then,
O'er field and valley, and sylvan glen;
And each cheek look'd bright as the blush of the morn;
And each voice sounded gay as the forester's horn,
And each heart was glad—for an heiress was born.

I stood by those time-worn towers again,
And prancing forth came a gallant train;
There was a priest in his robes of white,
And there was a maiden lovely and bright,
And a gallant knight rode by her side,
And the shouts of joy sounded far and wide—
For the heiress was Rudolph De Courcy's bride.

And again by those portals proud did I stand,
And again came forth a gallant band—
And I saw that same priest, but sad was his pace,
And I saw that same Knight, but he shrouded his face!
And I saw not that maiden in beauty's bloom,
But a shroud and a bier, and a sable plume—
For the heiress was borne to her forefather's tomb.

And such is human life at best—
A mother's—a lover's—the green earth's breast—
A wreath that is form'd of flowrets three,
Primrose, and myrtle, and rosemary—
A hopeful, a joyful, a sorrowful slave—
A launch, a voyage, a whelming wave,
The cradle, the bridal bed, and the grave.

PARABLE VI.

"Enter ye in at the strait gate; for wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction; and many there be which go in thereat: Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be which find it." Mat. vii. 13, 14.

This parable is frequently used to support the most disgusting and unseemly point in the doctrine of endless misery. It is thought or pretended, that it proves the notion, that but a very few of the human family will be saved, while thousands will go down to eternal ruin and hopeless despair! It has not only been said that such is its meaning, and such the fact taught us by it; but it has been mixed in with the devotions of christians and sung in the congregations of the faithful for time out of mind. We meet with the abhorrent sentiment even in our psalm books, and in our collections of sacred music. Dr. Watts, has the text thus paraphrased:

"Broad is the road, that leads to death,
And thousands walk together there;
But wisdom shews a narrow path,
With here and there a traveller."

Now the mind cannot conceive an idea more appalling than that usually associated with those words. We can advert to the early impressions of our childhood, and recollect what were then our emotions on reading or hearing them pronounced. Imagination would at once survey the countless throng of the unconverted, travelling onwards to an awful hell, where were waiting a host of infernals, ready to inflict immortal pains upon the souls of the reprobated! God, the angry Judge, whose irresistible decrees had brought about the direful result, was imagined to be seated on a throne of "clouds and darkness," assenting to their dreadful doom; and a little company of good, orthodox people, perched on the lofty battlements of heaven, smiling at the irretrievable ruin of their neighbors and friends! Along the narrow road, was "here and there" a solitary individual, climbing the hill of "Difficulty," so quaintly represented by the immortal John Bunyan, with his head "bowed down like a bulrush," and his soul beset with a thousand temptations!..... But blessed be God, those cruel delusions have been eradicated from the mind, and we are now at liberty to investigate the subject for ourselves.

It has long been a mystery to us, how the CALVINISTS can think that the parable under consideration affords any proof of the correctness of their doctrine. They strenuously maintain that the number of the elect is so "certain and definite, that it can neither be increased or diminished;" and of course the number of the reprobated is equally certain. If this be true, we should like to be informed of any propriety in our Saviour's exhortation, "enter ye in at the strait gate." Did he, as a Calvinist, believe that the number of the elect could not be increased? If so, why did he play upon the words, by exhorting them thus? Or if he, as God, knew that a certain definite number were, in the councils of eternity, "passed by, and ordained to dishonor and wrath for their sins, to the praise of his vindictive justice," why did he exhort his hearers to turn towards heaven—and, by so doing, violate the determination of the most high?

We are naturally led to inquire, what there is in the text, to uphold the doctrine of endless misery. It will probably appear, on examination, that the only evidence of such doctrine is in that part of the parable, which alludes to destruction. There is certainly nothing else that can be understood to mean any such thing.—Let us then examine the foundation of the common opinion on that part of the text.

"Wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat." The question now is, does the word "destruction" literally signify the future endless misery of those who travel the broad road? This will not be pretended. The word is not used to convey any such idea. Destruction is the state of being destroyed, and conveys no idea of endless continuance of being or existence. But is it not used in the scriptures to express the endless wretchedness of sinners? We answer, no. And in the absence of all proof of the affirmative we shall content ourselves with quoting a few passages illustrative of the scriptural meaning of the word.—See Hosea xiii. 9. "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help." In this instance, nothing more could be intended than that the people of Israel had rendered themselves miserable in time, by this departure from the statutes of the Lord. They were neither eternally damned, nor totally annihilated. Job, x. 5. "Thine hands have made me, and fashioned me round about; yet thou dost destroy me." The afflicted Job, in this passage, refers only to the severe distresses he was caused to endure, and not to endless misery or the pains of another world. These quotations are enough to establish the fact that the word destroy, or destruction, are equivocal; which is all that is required in the present instance. For the word being evidently equivocal, renders it indispensably necessary for the advocates of endless misery, or of annihilation, to prove that in this passage it means what they have said it does, or to admit the truth of our constructions.

But how does the common opinion of this text agree with the great plan of salvation as revealed in the scriptures? Are thousands to be damned and but here and there one who shall be saved? In other words, is that imaginary devil, who is represented as an enemy to God and all righteousness, to people his infernal dominions with millions, while heaven is to be thinly inhabited, or the abode of a few? Has Almighty God given existence to a being over whom he has no control? Has Jesus bled and died almost in vain? Is he who undertook to destroy death and the devil, to be defeated at last, and compelled to have his ears saluted with the boastings of the devil and the screeches of the damned to all eternity? If it can be proved from the bible that MANY shall crowd the gates of Zion, and raise an anthem of eternal joy, the common opinion of the text will be exploded. Let us search the scriptures.

See Isa. xlv. 23, 24. "I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear; Surely shall say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Chap. xxv. 6, 7, 8. "And in this mountain [Zion] shall the Lord of hosts make unto ALL PEOPLE a feast of fat things, a feast of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined: And he will destroy in this mountain the face of covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations: He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off ALL FACES; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it." Chap. liii. 11. "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied; by his knowledge shall my righteous servant JUSTIFY MANY; for he shall bear their iniquities." See also, Rev. vii. 9, 10. "After this I beheld, and, lo! a GREAT MULTITUDE, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; and cried with a loud voice, saying SALVATION TO OUR GOD, which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb!" See also Rev. v. 13, "And every creature which is in heaven and on earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them heard I saying, BLESSING, HONOR, GLORY, and power, unto him that sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." Now, it will be admitted that the foregoing passages refer to the eternal concerns of another world; and we demand, are we in view of such declarations and assurances, to conclude that but "here and there a traveller" will find the way to heaven? A reply in the negative would be preposterous. The character, promises, and oath of Jehovah, forbid that we should understand from the text under consideration any such thing.

It remains, therefore, only to be said, that this parable refers to the condition of the world when our Saviour was on earth, and forcibly illustrates the proneness of mankind to travel, with the multitude, in that road which leads to woe and wretchedness here below. We would, therefore, caution the reader against being deluded with the futile hope of happiness in transgression; and hope to be pardoned for saying, that possibly, many who trust in themselves that they are righteous and despise others, may find that they are travelling the broad and downward road to destruction and misery.—The way of wisdom is truly narrow and strait; but it is strewn with flowers. Alas! how few there be that find it! But O, how joyful the hope, that the time will come when all ransomed creation shall swell the note of eternal gratitude, and cause the arches of heaven to reverberate with the anthems of everlasting praise.

GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."

CXXXVII. PSALM, 1 VERSE.

"By the Rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept when we remembered Zion."

Nothing on earth has been so dear to good men as Zion. Its name is pleasant, and sounds with rapture in the ear of the man of God. The first place where Zion is mentioned, is, I believe, in ii. Samuel, v. 7.—Nevertheless, David took the strong hold of Zion: the same is the city of David.

It is mentioned to this effect in i. Kings, viii. 1.—where it is said, "Then King Solomon assembled the elders of Israel, and all the heads of the tribes, the chief of the fathers of the children of Israel unto king Solomon in Jerusalem, that they might bring up the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of the city of David, which is Zion." Thus Zion originally signified that part of Jerusalem which was taken from the Jebusites, and was styled the city of David or Zion.—In the reign of Solomon, who succeeded David, the Temple was built in this place; so that this Temple with all its legal rites, and all the spiritual good things, which it prefigured, were comprehended under the general name of Zion.

Thus, to this place the tribes of Israel went thrice a year to worship. It is thus paraphrased by Dr Watts:

"To Zion the whole nation came,
"To worship thrice a year."

Thus having shown what is generally meant by Zion, and the original signification of the word, we proceed to shew that Jerusalem, Temple, and Church, are comprehended under the word Zion, as is proved from ii. Kings, xix. 31, and Psalms xi, 6, and ix, 11, and xiv. 7; and Isaiah i. 27, and xi. 3, ix. 14, and above seventy other places.

In farther remarking on this subject, I shall consider, 1. That Zion in its enlarged signification, is very dear to men of piety.

2. The adversity and trouble of Zion, causes such men to weep.

1. That Zion in its enlarged signification is very dear to men of piety.

This was the case with the Jewish Church. Nothing was so dear to the Jews, as the worship of God in his Temple. Although that dispensation was dark compared with the present; yet it was precious and a great manifestation of divine light and love. Here the law was read and explained; here the nation united in prayer; it was the place where prayer was wont to be made; it was the place which God had appointed for his worship; here God revealed his glory and the tokens of his regard to the Jewish nation, and here the solemn vows were made and performed.—Every thing which could render such a dispensation glorious, centered in this Mount Zion where the Temple was built, and where the ark abode. The natural situation of Zion was very beautiful. Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion on the sides of the north. But that which rendered Zion so dear to pious men, was the presence of God, and his ordinances, the Temple and the Ark of his Covenant. Thus we read, cxvii. Psalm, from the 2d; to the 9th verse, inclusive. "Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem. Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compacted together; whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord.—For there are set thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem; they shall prosper that love thee. Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. For my brethren and companions sakes, I will now say, Peace be within thee. Because of the house of the Lord our God I will seek thy good." Thus Zion, Jerusalem or the Church was dear to the pious among the Jews.

The article Zion is applicable likewise to the Christian Churches. This is called Mount Zion the city of the living God. Heb. xii. 22. The Jewish Church may be termed the legal, but the Christian Church the gospel dispensation. The former may be called the type or shadow; the latter the anti-type or substance; consequently, the glory of the christian dispensation must excel that of the law, as much as the substance does the shadow. Hence, if Zion as comprehending the Jewish church and Temple worship, was dear to pious men, much more dear is the Gospel system to men of the same character. The reason is, that that dispensation had no glory compared to that of the gospel which excelleth. Thus pious men among the Jews were waiting for the consolation of Israel, i. e. for the coming of Christ and the blessings of the gospel; and when this was seen by faith, they rejoiced in it as Abraham did; and when they saw its accomplishment in part, as Simeon did, they were ready to depart in peace. In believing, men rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. They go on their way rejoicing. Thus Zion as meaning the Christian church, is dear to its friends.

2. The adversity and trouble of Zion causes such men to weep. Thus, when Jerusalem and the first Temple were in ruins, the pious captives in Babylon wept and hung their harps upon the willows. Thus, when the Christian church has been in adversity, its friends were called to mourning. Christ in his answer to those, who asked him why his disciples did not fast, declared that the children of the bride chamber could not fast while the bridegroom was with them, but said the day should come when the bridegroom should be taken away, and then they should fast; which is saying that though christians will rejoice when the manifestation of Christ is clear; yet in a day of darkness they will mourn. There are three distinct states when the church may be said to be in adversity and trouble.

1. When persecution arises. 2. When life and vigor in religion declines. 3. When false doctrine prevails. As to persecution it will never be a real injury unless we give way to the fear which it excites. I rather view it as a blessing than otherwise, for blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely for Christ's sake! We must always be careful to suffer for righteousness' sake, and then persecution will not injure us.

If we suffer on account of our declensions as to the life and vigor of religion, we have none to blame but ourselves, and against this we must watch and pray. As to the prevalence of false doctrines, we must be very cautious not to embrace them ourselves, and in detecting them in others, uprightness of intention, force of argument and firmness mixed with prudence, are indispensable on our part, if we hope to succeed. Patience, likewise, will be necessary in order to reclaim the erroneous. But are errors to be found in the christian church? Undoubtedly there are. The Romish church, from which the Protestants separated, was corrupted exceedingly not only in doctrine, but in discipline and manners. The Protestants have reformed in many things, but yet retain many popish errors, and every departure from the simplicity which is in Christ; is matter of grief and trouble to all who have their senses exercised to discern the truth.

The errors to be found in the doctrine of the churches in our land are, total depravity of infants; the impurity of sin; the election of some to endless life; and reprobation of the rest of mankind to endless misery and perdition; the doctrine of the infinite atonement of Christ to satisfy divine justice and render God propitious to the elect; the doctrine of means to obtain eternal life; the doctrine that men must be willing to be damned in order to be saved; the doctrine that sin originated in heaven, by which a part of the holy Angels became devils; and lastly, that God was a wrathful being, hating sinners and being changeable. These are the leading errors in the Protestant churches, and the practice to which they lead is as disagreeable as the doctrine. No wonder that the eyes of mankind begin to be opened in reality, to see the absurdity and inconsistency of such doctrines and to weep when they remember Zion: If the Jews in their captivity in Babylon wept when they remembered Jerusalem in her ruins, how much more reason have we to weep when we see our spiritual Jerusalem, our Mount Zion and city of the living God laid in ruins by doctrines so pernicious? I shall only remark at present, (for I intend to examine these false doctrines in future numbers) that the most grievous of all the calamities which ever befel the Church is that which is comprehended under the false notions of God and his revelation.

That all human creatures are born totally polluted with sin; that sin is infinite, and requires an infinite atonement, &c. &c. &c. are doctrines so incompatible with reason and revelation, that they have caused multitudes to triumph in infidelity, while the humble and contrite christian has mourned in secret, hung his harp upon the willows, and by the rivers of adversity and sorrow, has wept when Zion was remembered.

IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

CONGRATULATION.

We are happy in having it in our power to state that our father in the faith, the former editor of this paper, has commenced writing a series of numbers for the Advocate, the first of which appears under the signature of "T. G." in this number. When he retired from the field some months since it was expected that his health and circumstances would be such as to enable him, occasionally at least, to contribute to our columns; but Providence had ordered it otherwise. His protracted silence, however, has only tended to make us thankful for what he will now, if it please Heaven, contribute for the edification of the public.

We should be chargeable with ingratitude if we should refrain from making an ingenuous acknowledgment for the liberal encouragement afforded us by our brethren, which enables us to do something towards alleviating the cares of our aged brother, in return for his useful labors. We take no merit to ourselves in relation to the matter—our PATRONS, have put into our hands the means, & if we are faithful, they will receive the reward.

The experience, biblical knowledge, and candor of brother Gross, ensure to the christian reader an intellectual repast in his productions, which we are anxious to furnish, if any means within our reach enable us to make an honorable return to the donor. The task would indeed be delightful to us, could we strew his path with flowers, and under God be the means of dispelling every cloud that could obscure the brightness and glory of his declining sun.

So long as health and circumstances permit him to furnish for each number, a dissertation on some important subject, we shall appropriate to his use the department under the head of "GOSPEL ADVOCATE;" while that of IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR, will be occupied by ourselves and devoted to the various subjects that may appear to concern the cause of truth. Thus we shall pursue a plan, which will lead us on to the attainment of our object, without exposing us to just censure for not attending to all the various subjects which concern the interests of Zion.

EDITORS.

SOCIETY MEETING.

On another page will be found a notice of the annual meeting of the Universalist Society in this place, to which we would bespeak attention. And we hope to be excused for doing so, as well as for the following observations.

It need not be mentioned that there has been a want of attention in the friends of truth in this place, to the great concerns of the kingdom of Christ; nor shall we attempt to conceal that which is so apparently reprehensible. We take no exceptions to the charge, ourselves; but are willing to bear a part of the censure.

It is apparent, that there has been a neglect on the part of the proper officers in organizing the society.—Had the proper steps been taken, we might, at this time, have had a large and respectable society, under gospel regulations. But no pains has been taken to effect so desirable an object; and believers are scattered like sheep, without a fold or shepherd to protect them.

It is also evident that now is the time to retrieve, by united exertion, what has been lost by former inattention to the subject. The clouds are dispelled—the storm is over and past, and the citizens of Buffalo are beginning to see the fallacy of error. The hour of adversity has tried the friends of truth, and popularity has enlisted in her motley train unworthy professors, whose aid is but a detriment to the cause. It is confidently believed that if the proper steps are now taken, a society of more than one hundred respectable and religious persons can be collected in this town within the term of one month.

It appears highly probable to the writer of this article, that unless something is now done, the cause must inevitably languish and die. The period is an eventful one, and is pregnant with events of no ordinary consequence to universalists and universalism. A zealous co-operation amongst the brethren will secure the object in view; while perhaps the loss of a day may be fatal to our hopes.

With the foregoing facts before us, we would appeal to the candor and good sense of every universalist concerned; yea, to the hearts of every brother or sister in the faith, and ask, WHAT SHALL BE DONE?—Shall we deny ourselves the privilege of worshipping God according to the dictates of our consciences? Shall the friends of Zion be told that we perish under slothfulness? Shall our children be deprived of social religious meetings, or be compelled to hear the pernicious theories of error? Shall we tamely submit to have the finger of scorn pointed at the cause we have professed to love? or shall we have a name to live, while we are dead? Would it not be better to arise in the majesty of truth and do our duty to God and one another?

Since writing the above we have received a communication on the same subject, which supercedes the necessity of what we had intended to suggest for the consideration of our readers in this village. We refer those who feel interested, to the article under the signature of "Jahleel," on page 45.

TO THE EDITORS :

On looking over the last volume of the Advocate I found a notice for the annual meeting of the universalist society in this place, for 1826, which apprised me of the approach of the time for another annual meeting. Being sensible that as yet but very little has been done towards establishing the cause of truth in this village, I here undertake to suggest a plan for the establishing of a society, and society government, in this place.

I have been informed, that there is a society established here according to law, which is the first step towards the object in view. At the next meeting, which I hope will be well attended, there ought to be officers appointed, who will be faithful to discharge the duty imposed upon them; and it is presumed there are some among us who would be willing to do all that could be required of them. After this step has been taken, a committee might be appointed, whose duty it should be to draft bye laws for the government of the society, and report the same to the society, at some meeting at no far distant time. At such meeting, which of course will be an extra one expressly for that purpose, the society might be completely organized and prepared for business. Then let the society appoint a standing committee, whose duty it shall be to ascertain how many, suitably qualified, are desirous to become members, and let the proper steps be taken for their admission. If this or some similar measure should be adopted, I do not doubt that a very respectable society could be collected together in a short time, which would add much to the happiness of all sincere believers.

I have reasons to believe that there are many in this village who feel it to be their duty to come into some regulation like the one above hinted at; and in Black Rock, and other places in this vicinity, I know of a number who would cheerfully unite with us in such an undertaking. Hoping yet to witness the increase and final success of the good cause of eternal love and peace, I am, brethren, yours, &c.

THE MORAL TENDENCY OF THE CALVINISTIC DOCTRINE OF CONVERSION.

If there be any truth or any value in the doctrine, it must carry with itself an unfailling testimony. That is, persons under the arbitrary operations of the Spirit, must have infallible means of knowing the fact, that they may not be deceived by their own imaginations, and be led into a false and dangerous security. An irresistible influence of the Deity is in all respects miraculous, and as such must operate with violence on the established laws of the human constitution, which cannot be mistaken. And yet what has been the test to which appeals have universally been made? Has it not been certain impressions, emotions, feelings, transports, and ecstasies, which are usually the growth of a warm imagination? Has there ever been an instance in which appeals have been made to the understanding? Has any one ever made it appear, that his intellect was enlightened, his judgement improved, or his wisdom increased by the irresistible agency of the divine Spirit? No. How is it then that the Spirit of God always acts upon that quality of our nature, which, of all others is the most fallible, fluctuating and deceptive? The very same effect, and to their fullest extent, which are urged as a proof of divine interposition, are frequently produced by natural causes, and exist where there is no renewal of heart, or reformation of character. Is it credible, that the Supreme Being descends into the heart of men with a miraculous agency of his Spirit, without giving them at the same time light and power to judge between his operations and the deceptions of a heated imagination?

You will say, probably, that such persons as are really the objects of this agency, are never without a conviction, which with them amounts absolute certainty. I am aware this is asserted by many who are sincere, and have a confidence in the reality of their impressions. But in my mind, no stronger proof can be given of the fallaciousness of the doctrine. In the first place, their convictions come through the feelings and the fancy. And then, these persons are by no means always distinguished for more than ordinary purity of morals, or warmth of piety: so that it has been said with too much truth, by a writer more distinguished for his genius than his piety, "if we are told a man is religious, we still ask, what are his morals?" And last of all, these persons often have totally opposite opinions respecting some of the most important articles of christian truth, which they all profess with equal confidence to receive from a divine illumination. But the spirit of God can dictate only truth, and truth is always the same. With what encouragement can we rely on the convictions of those, who with equal sincerity and confidence, make contradictory assertions? When it shall happen that all persons who profess to have immediate aid from above, to free them from sin, and enlighten them with truth, shall be found uniformly more zealous in doing the deeds of piety and love, than other christians of humbler pretensions; and when they shall agree in reporting the truths, which they have received from the instructions of the Spirit, so far at least as to avoid contradictions and inconsistencies, they will exhibit better reasons for believing themselves actuated by the irresistible agency of the Spirit of God.

Again, if a change is thus miraculously wrought, how does it happen that in such a great number of instances the effect soon dies away? Look around among those who have been the subjects of what are commonly called religious revivals, and observe how large a proportion return in a short time to their former condition and habits. The most zealous, confident and ecstatic, will frequently be among the first to sink back to the apathy, from which at one time they imagined themselves to have been raised by the special agency of the Holy Spirit. Will you say that such are not truly converted, or that they resist the spirit? The first is certain, but of the last who is to judge? The person who falls away, is as certain of being under a spiritual influence, as any one who retains this conviction for years, and even through his whole life. But falling away is a proof that he was deceived. Very true; yet if one may be deceived for a month or a day, so may another as long as he lives. Hence it is the very excess of presumption to set up any pretensions, or make any assertions in the case.

Nor ought any one to rely on this kind of influence, till he can prove that the days of miracles have never ceased. Conversion upon calvinistic principles, is as much a miracle, as it would be to stop the sun in its course, or raise the dead to life. But as no proof can be advanced, that miracles have been wrought since the time of the Apostles, even for great purposes, such as promoting the divine dispensations, or the general interests of mankind; where is the humility, modesty, or good sense of any man's pretending, that the Supreme Being has condescended to change the course of nature in his behalf, especially when the same argument, which he uses to convince himself of this fact, is used with equal assurance by others, who are confessedly deceived? * * * *

The tendency of a doctrine is best ascertained by regarding its effects where it has the greatest power of action; and if we trace back the chequered history of the Church, it will present us with little which we could desire to remember respecting the moral code of those sects, which have made the theory of a miraculous conversion a leading point of their belief.

History also affords a dismal picture of the deplorable effects of this doctrine, in the annals of fanaticism. Men have gone mad in the belief that their frenzy was the inward workings of the Spirit of God. Next have come murders and rapines, persecutions and tortures, hatred and malice, and every detestable vice which could disgrace human nature and demoralize society. Keep within the compass of the Reformation, and run through the records of fanaticism from the patricide of Alphonsus Dias, to the piteous delusions, which in recent times have bewildered the followers of Huntingdon, Brothers and Southcott. The madness of Muncer, Stubner and Stork, who kindled a civil war in Germany, sacrificed the lives of many credulous followers, and committed the greatest excesses under the pretence of being actuated by a divine impulse; the wild reveries which broke out in so many shapes of intolerance and cruelty during the reign of the unfortunate Charles, and the existence of the Commonwealth; the ravings of Muggleton and Reeves, who declared it to be the unpardonable sin to reject what they called their spiritual message; the scorning zeal of the Puritans, which was ready to burst out with its consuming fires upon all who did not profess to seek the Lord under the same influence as themselves,—these facts and events with numerous others of a similar nature, have been so many practical illustrations of the doctrine of conversion by an irresistible agency of the divine Spirit.

Now we frankly confess we cannot receive a doctrine as coming from God, not a trace of which we can find in the scriptures, which is so fallacious in the testimony it gives of a divine origin, which is so defective in its practical tendency, and which has actually been made an instrument in bringing down the greatest disorders, evils, and wretchedness upon the church and upon society. The only authority on which it rests, is the testimony of individuals. And in what does this consist? It appeals to certain emotions, feelings, and frames of mind, which may come as readily from rational and mechanical, as from spiritual sources. Speaking of the particulars of this testimony, the eloquent James Foster observes, "They give a handle to every wretched enthusiast to impute his ravings, and follies, and wild starts of imagination, to the spirit of their living God. And thus they consecrate delusion and imposture, and if these be of a licentious and impure tendency, enable them with the more ease to extirpate the natural seeds of virtue, and corrupt the morals." Sparks.

[From the Christian Intelligencer.]

The bleak wind blew wildly; the falling clouds of snow and hail had nearly obscured the pathway, and, overcome with fatigue and cold, Mr. and Mrs. D. gladly availed themselves of the first opportunity that presented to introduce their trembling frames into some human habitation. The house did not, it is true, appear very inviting, though it evidently was once the abode of wealth and grandeur. All, around the shattered dwelling, tho' it spoke of former glory, afforded not a very encouraging hope of good entertainment now. But necessity sometimes makes us thankful for what good fortune would despise, and is frequently the parent of much real advantage. At first Mrs. D. hesitated; but yielding to the advice of her husband, and anxious to comply with the innocent entreaties of their eldest child who seemed to suppose that every house must of course permit the same protection and the same comforts which were enjoyed at home, she perceived his arm, and prepared to accompany him to the door.

There arrived, Mr. D. raised his benumbed hand and gave three distinct knocks. All was silent. No appearance of human beings was discovered, save the astonished voices of a number of children, who suddenly rushed to the windows, nearly darkened with shingles and hats, contending with each other for a spot to place their eyes upon. He knocked a second time but obtained no reply. Mrs. D. nearly discouraged, would have returned to the sleigh: but resolved to enter if possible, Mr. D. knocked again more violently than ever, turning his eyes at the same time towards the peopled window, exclaiming—do let us come in, we are perishing with the cold! “Come in,” exclaimed a female voice in a low and reluctant tone. They pressed open the door and entered.

Every thing within seemed to speak of ruined wealth and ruined happiness. The floors and ceilings, however, together with the few remaining pieces of furniture appeared to be neat—so far as it was possible to make them so—and furnished undoubted evidence of the industry and care of the mother.

They were received by an intelligent looking female, whose eyes seemed to be swollen with tears and whose countenance expressed not a little mortification. She offered each a chair—poor woman, she had but three in the house—and invited them to draw towards the fire, or rather the place where the fire should be. The bare-footed and half-naked children gathered around their little girl, seated as she was upon a block of wood, and as they gazed upon her ornamented garments stood in silent astonishment and despair. In a few minutes Mrs. F. arose, took the coarse woollen blanket from her shoulders, spread it over the few embers that burned on the hearth, conveyed it into an adjoining apartment and returned without it. In the mean time, Mrs. D. whose attention was altogether absorbed by the appearances of poverty and wretchedness around them, gave her husband an expressive look, that could not be misunderstood. It was an appeal to his sympathies. It was not in vain, though it was unnecessary. They felt the miseries of the house, and forgot their own.—The warm tide of compassion flowed freely from their hearts, as they saw worth and innocence suffering. The fatigues which had been endured on their journey, they despised then to make the subject of complaint. So true it is that the evil becomes tolerable when we realize a greater. “I wish,” said Mrs. F. as she returned from the adjoining room, “I wish it were in my power to accommodate you more comfortably. We have just at this time but a little fuel on hand and, as the storm is increasing, we find it necessary to be as prudent as possible. The woodsmen, it is true, frequently pass our house on their way to market, indeed I perceive there is one now coming up the hill, but”—here she hesitated as if reluctant to add what she was on the point of expressing, and ultimately paused. Mrs. D.—for women can often anticipate each other—took the hint; and drawing her work pocket from her side, on which a shower of tears instinctively fell, she took therefrom a handful of change and with an ardour that created a new tie in her husband’s heart, gave it to one of the larger boys saying—“go my dear, meet the woodsman and direct him to bring his load here.” “Oh! no,” said Mrs. F.—“yes, yes,” said Mrs. D. and the boy hastened with joy to meet the woodsman.

This little deed of charity,—a deed, which it were impossible for any benevolent person not to perform at such a time—though it was given with more cheerfulness than it was received, served perhaps to authorize a little more familiarity on the part of the strangers and to permit them to inquire with less hesitancy into the present situation of this family, and the causes which led to their penury.

Accordingly, after the departure of the boy, Mrs. F. having placed upon the fire a sufficiency of the fuel remaining, Mr. D. ventured to introduce a farther conversation with this worthy matron, as follows; we are mutual strangers it is true, Mrs. F. but the apparently reduced state of your circumstances, creates an anxiety in me to be informed of your history. I think I see here a ruined fortune and a broken heart; and you will not take it unkind in me, if I add that, I feel a strong interest in your welfare. Will you inform me whether my impressions are well founded? Mrs. F. was a woman of excellent accomplishments and of fine sensibilities; and when she found that her humiliation was so obvious as to excite the attention, and to engage the sympathies of a stranger, she could no longer suppress her feelings, but gave vent to them in a copious effusion of tears. Her children too, in the artless language of innocence would have cried with her; but they had so often witnessed her weeping that they listened with attention to the conversation without seeming to be sensibly affected by it.

“I have no objection,” said Mrs. F. after she had struggled for some time to compose herself—“I have no objection, sir, to relate to you the simple tale of my misfortunes, especially as I have reason to believe your professions are sincere. My father was a wealthy gentleman in the town of S—. You have perhaps heard of Gen. W—. I was his only child. Having been blessed in his youth with a liberal education, and acquiring in maturer life a respectable property, he was particularly desirous of giving me a good female education, and his interest enabled him to fulfil his intentions. I suppose that I was an object most dear to his heart. The impressions which his paternal kindness have made on my mind can never be erased. Blessed be his memory. He followed my mother, who died in my infancy, peacefully to the tomb about twenty years ago. I was then upon the point of uniting myself in matrimony with a young man of considerable fortune and very respectable literary attainments. Mr. F. was young and engaging. My father was pleased with him, not only on account of his honorable standing in life, but also because he was professedly religious—he having joined the church when about seventeen years of age.

"Not long after the death of my venerated father, I married with Mr. F.; the union of our respective properties amounted to about twenty thousand dollars; a large part of which consisted in the mansion house, &c. in which we now live." A long and heavy groan, like that of a man in great distress, proceeding from an adjoining room, here interrupted the narrative.

Mr. D. hastily inquired the cause of it?..... The poor woman burst into tears, and arising suddenly hastened to the place of distress..... Mrs. F. immediately returned, bringing with her the blanket which a short time before she had carried into that room, and with a deep sigh resumed her seat, and recommenced the narration of her troubles.

Wonderful improvements seem to be making in the art of printing. Mr. Fanshaw, at the Tract Society Office, has two Jackasses employed as pressmen, and they are now laboring in that capacity with great assiduity and success. This we at first thought a great novelty, but we have since been informed that it is by no means uncommon for animals of this kind to be connected with the press. N. Y. Reflector.

We have often wondered at the stupidity of the tracts with which our land is inundated, but never till now have been apprised of the fact that the most stupid of all animals are instrumental in producing them. Eds.

PARABLE VII.

Another parable put he forth unto them, saying; The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field; but while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way. But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. So the servants of the householder came, and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares? He said unto them, an enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou, then, that we go and gather them up? But he said Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest, and in the time of the harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them; but gather the wheat into my barn." Matt. xiii. 24—30.

It is not an undeserved compliment, to say that the labors of Mr. Hosca Ballou, are not surpassed in usefulness, by any productions of the age. But he would be the last to require an implicit acquiescence in all he has said and written. To follow the example he has given us, in the bold and fearless manner in which he has investigated the concerns of religion, will be, no doubt, as acceptable a return for the instruction we have received from him, as can be made; and hence, though our opinion in some instances, and especially in relation to the above parable, does not coincide altogether with his; we would, though it be with diffidence, express our convictions with the utmost freedom. The objections which we have to urge against his remarks on this parable, in his "Notes and illustrations of the parables of the New Testament," are the following.

First; we cannot perceive what particular affinity this parable has to the preceding one of the Sower. It certainly does not follow because of its being in the same chapter, that it is intended to illustrate the same subject. And moreover, our Saviour's words are always to the point, thereby superceding the necessity of a repetition. We may safely conclude, until proof is produced to the contrary, that he never, to the same auditors, uses different metaphors to illustrate the same truth. We do not contend, that Mr. Ballou has strenuously insisted that such was the fact without some plausible reason for doing so; but make these remarks for the purpose of aiding in the consideration of what follows. Secondly. That Christ was represented by the man that sowed good seed in the field, is evident from the explanation given by himself; but we must dissent from the explanation given by Mr. B. of that which was represented by the good seed. Mr. Ballou maintains, that the good seed represents "the word of the kingdom;" but we are entirely at a loss why he could think so. Our Saviour declares that "the good seed are the children of the kingdom;" and it is quite difficult to find any analogy between the children of the kingdom, and "the word of the kingdom."—Thirdly. It is maintained by Mr. B. that "MAN,* to whom the gospel was preached," is the field or is represented "by the field, whose owner is Christ." Here again we are at a loss to determine how such can be the fact. Our Saviour in his explanation, verse 38, says, "the field is the world." Now, even if we admit that "the world" is put for "the posterity of Adam," we cannot see the agreement between the explanation of our Saviour, and that given by Mr. Ballou: For fourthly; Mr. B. says under his fifth particular, that "the introduction of false doctrines into the church, is signified by an enemy's sowing tares among the wheat." Now this parable is acknowledged to be a representation of something relating particularly to the kingdom of heaven; by which we understand, the gospel dispensation, or reign of Christ in the hearts of men; and we would be glad to know if "the world" in either of the scriptural senses of the terms, signify the church, or the kingdom of heaven? We have reason to believe that that part of mankind who are represented by the word "world" have, for the time being, no lot or part in the church. Publicans and harlots may enter into the kingdom of heaven before certain over-righteous persons, but they cannot enter the precincts of Zion, as publicans and harlots; for flesh and blood, or to speak without a metaphor, carnality and lust cannot inherit the kingdom. So that whichever way the subject turns, there seems to be a discrepancy in the explanation given by Mr. Ballou. Fifthly. If the distinction made in the foregoing remarks between the church and the world be correct, it would seem to follow that the appearance of the tares amongst the wheat does not signify that falsehood would be mixed with truth, in the understandings of individual christians who are in reality what they profess to be. We desire the reader to understand, that we do not insist that error does not sometimes exist in the heart of the christian, but, that this parable has no allusion to such a thing.—Honest and good professors are liable to entertain erroneous opinions, and to do wrong, but it does not follow from this concession, that such fact is taught in the parable under consideration. Sixthly. If we admit, with Mr. Ballou, that the “desire of professors of purging false ideas and notions out of the church, is represented by servants asking leave to gather tares from among wheat,” it would seem to lead the servants of Christ to slothfulness and indifference. If such be the correct explanation, it would be advisable we should think, for ministers of the gospel to stand still and observe the signs of the times, rather than follow the example of Mr. B. and his cotemporaries in plucking up the errors of the church. Perhaps the harvest has not yet come, and in our endeavors to destroy the tares, or errors, we may have disobeyed the directions of the great householder! But, seventhly. That it was the will of the Saviour, that false doctrines should be imbibed, until their fruits should come to maturity, is perhaps admissible but we can hardly refrain from asking, did he not manifest in all his preaching, a desire, or if the reader please, a WILL to have all men come unto the knowledge of the truth? It will be admitted on all hands, that after certain of the Jews had obstinately rejected the truth and its most convincing proofs, it was determined that they should be cast out of the kingdom; but it seems to be derogatory to the character of Jesus, to suppose that he willed that they should be obstinate so that they might be discarded!

We have thus noticed the principal objections to be urged against the explanation of the parable as given by Mr. Ballou; and though it is much more easy to point out defects than to furnish a remedy for them, we shall now proceed to give our own views of the subject; desiring at the same time, that our more experienced brethren may correct our mistakes if they discover any, after duly reflecting upon the subject.

† We do not mean that bad persons cannot enter the visible church of Christ; but that such persons cannot inherit or enjoy the blessings of the gospel. If by the kingdom of heaven, we understand the company of those who outwardly profess Christ, it must be conceded that many bad persons belong to it. And if our explanation of the parable should seem to involve a contradiction relative to the church or kingdom of heaven, the difficulty may be removed by consulting the parable of the Ten Virgins, five of whom were wise and five foolish. While, therefore, it may be proper to say that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven, or that the church or kingdom is not “the world, but separate and distinct from it; it may also be understood that bad men are outwardly members of it.

1. By the man who sowed good seed, we understand, as does Mr. B. the son of man, or Jesus Christ. This is abundantly established by our Saviour in his explanation, ver. 37. and is admitted by all.

2. The field in which the seed was sowed, “is the world.” By the term “world” as it is used in the explanation of our Saviour, ver. 38, we understand the great body of those who heard the gospel and professed it. According to Mr. Ballou’s exposition, if we understand him, the world means the heart of a christian in which good and bad seed is suffered to grow until the end of the gospel dispensation; but for various reasons, which will be more apparent in the sequel, a more enlarged construction appears proper and essential. Dr. A. Clarke, whose opinion is entitled to much respect, says, “In general, the world may be termed the field of God; and in particular those who profess to believe in God through Christ; are his field or farm;” and we cannot discover any impropriety in supposing that the multitude of those who professed to be subjects of the heavenly kingdom, were intended by the field. This would agree with the use of the term world in John, xii. 19. “The Pharisees, therefore said among themselves, perceive ye how you prevail nothing? behold, the world is gone after him.” By thus giving it a general, rather than a limited application, we shall avoid many difficulties.

3. “The good seed are the children of the kingdom.” By the children of the kingdom we understand those PERSONS who professed to be followers of Christ, and who lived up to their professions. It was not every one that cried, “Lord, Lord,” that entered into the kingdom of God; but those who knew their Master’s will and performed it, are in scripture denominated children of God, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ; and, as in the explanation of our Saviour, ver. 38, “children of the kingdom.” Mr. Kneeland, whose invaluable “Improved Version of the New Testament” should be in the hands of every christian, seems to be of a similar opinion. He renders the passage thus. “The good seed are the sons of the kingdom.”

4. The tares are the children of the wicked [one.] By omitting the supplied word “one,” the sense might be, that the tares represented the children of apostate and ungodly parents; and there is some plausibility in the idea; but admitting that the word “one” should be added, and there appears to be nothing irreconcilable with scripture or reason. Suppose we should admit that the tares represent children of the devil, there is then nothing so absurd in the construction as has been imagined. Our Saviour said to the Jews, John viii. 44. "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do;" and there is as much impropriety in this declaration of our Lord, as there can be in saying that bad men are characteristically children of the devil. For the devil himself could not be a father unless he had children; and men sometimes act as much like the devil as they can. Men, when under the influence of a spirit of opposition to God and truth are earthly, sensual and devilish, and are as much begotten of the devil to the hope of happiness in sin, as the saints of God are to a lively hope of heaven. It does not follow that because some are children of the devil, he is the Creator of them, any more than it does that Christ is the Supreme Creator because he "hath begotten us again to a lively hope." But,

5. "The enemy that sowed them is the devil." The question arises, who, or what is the devil? Balfour in his "Second Inquiry;" Thompson, on Demonology, and Kneeland, in his Lectures on various subjects connected with these matters, have so effectually exploded the notion of a personal devil, that we hope never again to hear of such an absurdity. The public could as soon be convinced of the truth of Cotton Mather's disquisitions on witch-craft, as of the existence of such a fabled monster as has once been believed in; and hence to contend that the devil or satan, is not such a being, would be useless. "The spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience," is all the devil we know any thing about; and this adversary, or devil, is the enemy that planted the tares among the wheat. If the question should be asked, how did this adversary sow the bad seed among professors of christianity; the following answer may be given. The Jews, as a body, may be considered as the adversary; and by intruding themselves into the multitude of those who professed to follow Christ, and by adhering to many of their traditions and preconceived opinions, as well as by their opposition to the truth, caused many to err. In this way some, and doubtless many, who had been pure in heart at first, finally became corrupted, and were likened unto tares or bastard wheat. A quotation from the remarks of Dr. A. Clarke, may serve to throw much light upon this subject. He says, "when the professors were lukewarm, and the pastors indolent, his enemy came and sowed tares, DEGENERATE WHEAT. The righteous and the wicked are often mingled in the visible church. Every christian society, how pure soever its principles may be, has its bastard wheat—those who bear a resemblance to the good, but whose hearts are not right with God. He who sows this bastard wheat among God's people, is here styled God's enemy; and he may be considered a sower of them, who permits them to be sown and to spring up through his negligence. Wo to the indolent pastors, who permit the souls under their care to be corrupted by error or sin."

"The word zizania, which is here translated tares, and which should rather be translated bastard or degenerate wheat, is found in no Greek writer: even those who have written expressly on botany and agriculture, have neither it, nor any thing like it. It is a Chaldee word, and its meaning must be sought in the Rabbinical writers. In a treatise in the Mishna, called Kelayim, which treats expressly on different kinds of seeds, the word zunin, or zunin, is used for bastard or degenerated wheat; that which was wholly a right seed in the beginning, but afterwards became degenerate—the ear not being so large, nor the grains in such quantity as formerly, nor the corns so good in quality. In Ps. cxliv. 13, the words mizzan al zan, are translated all manner of store; but they properly signify from species to species; might not the Chaldee word zunin, and the Greek word zizania, come from the Psalmist's zanzan, which might have signified a mixture of grain of any kind, and be here used to point out the mixing bastard or degenerate wheat, among good seed wheat? The Persian translator renders it telkh danch, bitter grain, but it seems to signify merely degenerate wheat. This interpretation throws much light on the scope and design of the whole passage." See Dr. A. Clarke, on the place.

It may be proper here to answer a few questions which naturally arise in the mind, and have been agitated by Mr. Ballou. "If tares, in the parable, mean wicked men, what does the text mean by saying that while men slept an enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat and went his way?" And again; "who were those men, that slept while the enemy were sowing tares among the wheat?" Answer, 1. Admitting that tares or bastard wheat signify wicked men, we can see no difficulty in supposing that good men could be asleep even while bad men were awake. And 2. In reply to the question "who were those men who slept at the time this enemy sowed tares among the wheat," we answer, they were good men, i. e. those who were characteristically so. Such men sometimes sleep on their posts; and perhaps the best of men, being fatigued with "much watching," become dull and stupid in the cause which they love and honor. As a farther reply, we might ask, who is the devil that sowed the tares according to Mr. Ballou's interpretation? The answer will probably be, "the spirit which worketh in the children of disobedience." Then we again ask, what did the devil sow? The answer must be, if we are not in error, that he sowed a spirit of opposition and disobedience. Then does it not follow from the premises of Mr. B. that a spirit of opposition and disobedience, sowed in the hearts of men, a spirit of opposition and dispobedience ? or in other words, that the devil sowed himself ?

6. "The harvest is the end of the age."—It is unnecessary to contend at large, that the text does not refer to the end of time, as has been supposed ; for our readers are familiar with the subject, and need not be told that the Greek noun translated "world" in the received text, should be translated age, as above. It remains only to be said, that the end of the period spoken of in the text, is that of the legal or Mosaic dispensation. The separation between the righteous and wicked was then to take place, as set forth in Matt. xxiv, and many other places, which will be noticed hereafter.

7. "The reapers are the angels." At the period above mentioned, the Son of Man was to send forth his messengers, or angels, and they were to gather out of the kingdom of God, or the church of Christ, "all things that offend, and THEM which do iniquity." This unquestionably alludes to the coming of Christ, as spoken of in Matt. xvi. 27, 28, which was to take place during the life-time of some who listened to his discourse. "For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father WITH HIS ANGELS ; and then he shall reward every man according to his works : Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom." As this subject will be considered more at large when the Parable of the sheep and goats is illustrated, we add no more at present on this particular.

8. "And shall cast them into a furnace of fire : there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." To suppose that error and sin are to be cast into a furnace where shall be gnashing of teeth, is rather absurd ; nor is it less so to suppose that this Parable with its explanation as given by our Lord, proves the endless misery of the tares or wicked. Suppose we should admit that the wicked shall be cast into a furnace of fire ; does it follow that they will be fuel for the flames to eternity ? Is the doctrine of "hell fire and brimstone" so clearly taught us in the bible, that whenever we read the word furnace, or fire, we must necessarily conclude that endless misery is intended ? The notion is ridiculous ! We admit, kind reader, that when our Saviour came in his kingdom, as mentioned in Mat. xvi, the wicked were cast into that state of misery represented by the furnace and the wailing mentioned in the text ; but we are without any evidence to support the idea that such punishment was either eternal, or in another mode of being.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

If any thing can establish the authenticity of the scriptures, it is the peculiar applicability of those lessons therein recorded. Whenever the contemplative mind engages in an examination of our Saviour's discourses, it discovers a beauty, a simplicity, a sublimity, unequalled by the productions of man. He who could read the thoughts of the heart, was also able to prescribe the remedy, and afford relief, for every malady. From the parable above considered, we may infer the original purity of man. He comes forth from the plastic hand of his Creator, a pure and spotless being. Like the wheat, he is "good of his kind." But he soon becomes a prey to error and sin. His opening faculties are soon contaminated by pernicious examples ; and by being planted in a sterile soil, or for the want of proper culture, his faculties become fruitless, and too often, like the degenerate plant of a strange vine, he becomes an useless stalk, or a pernicious weed in society. But should an unskilful hand attempt to remove that which appears to be so pernicious, more harm than good might be done. The better course would be to "dig around the root," and endeavor by enriching the soil, to remove the blight and restore the vigor of the plant. This should be the labor of the ministering servants of Christ. Let us then water each thirsty plant with SALVATION, and revive each drooping heart with the dew of divine grace ! He who eradicates an erroneous impression, or saves a soul from moral death, will procure to himself an enviable crown of unfading glory ! But he who sleeps on his post, and suffers the enemy to despoil the fair workmanship of God, may expect that from him shall be taken away that which he seemeth to have.

But a still more important duty devolves upon the minister of the New Covenant. Converts to the truth are daily entering the peaceful Zion of God : multitudes are opening their eyes to behold the beauties of the New Jerusalem, the "mother of us all ;" and when their eyes see the salvation of God, their theme is love, and joy, and peace ! But an enemy is watching for an opportunity to lead astray each new born soul, and seeks for a time to sow among the faithful, those causes of evil which lead to degeneracy and ruin. It hence appears to be the duty of ministers, of individuals, and of societies, to be on their guard, that no wolves in sheep's clothing may be allowed to enter the fold of Christ, to scatter and divide the flock.

EPISTOLARY.

We cheerfully comply with the request of Br. F. E. Howe, of Marcellus, Onondaga co. in giving publicity to the following letter of Mrs. Ferriss. Many widowed hearts have been wounded by clerical cruelty ; and to all such as are called to endure similar trials, we would recommend the practice of that resignation, and the exercise of that confidence in God, which was displayed in the conduct of the excellent authoress of the letter to Mr. Sawyer. How ample the provisions of grace ! Even the lacerated bosom of a female, bereft of a dear and affectionate husband, and distressed by the calumnies of a bigot, can repair to the Father of mercies and find relief ! Go to your God.

ye afflicted sons and daughters of men; and while cruel scribes and pharisees revile you and the dead, He will bless and comfort your souls! RELIGION! fair daughter of heaven—thou art indeed a comforter! We would dwell in thy tabernacles—we would enjoy thy peace-giving presence forever and ever.

A LETTER,

Written by Mrs. Sally Ferriss, after the death of her husband, Mr. Walter Ferriss, a preacher of the Love of God, for many years in Charlotte, Vt. It was addressed to Mr. Isaac Sawyer, a Baptist preacher of Monkton; and was occasioned by some uncharitable expressions, made by Mr. Sawyer, against Mr. Ferriss in particular, and the UNIVERSALISTS at large.

INTRODUCTION.

It was with great reluctance that the writer of the following epistle consented to submit it to the public, as it was unthought of at the time it was written.—However, the pressing solicitude of highly esteemed friends obtained her consent, accompanied with a humble desire that it may be to the honor of true religion.

CHARLOTTE, July 14th, 1826.

REV. SIR:—Be not surprised to receive a letter from one with whom you are so little acquainted. I have wished for some time, to see and converse with you, but not having an opportunity, I could not refrain from writing, especially as I believe I can answer my own mind better on paper than in conversation.

Believe me, when I inform you that I feel no hardness towards your denomination, or any other on earth; for I feel that my God hath no respect of persons: why then should I, who am so unworthy? Therefore, what I now write is with that friendly zeal which every christian believer ought to be possessed of.

I have recently heard of many observations you have made concerning Mr. Ferriss, and all universalists, which I confess, though they did not make me angry, grieved me very much.—Why should you, my brother, be so uncharitable as to say, in public, that all the universalists were a loose people; that, to know what they were, they must be followed home to their families; to advise your society to have no conversation with them: that evil communication corrupts good manners, &c. And afterwards, to say, that when you visited Mr. Ferriss in his sickness you had some charity for him, but that you went home and read your bible, and gave him up for lost? I was surprised to hear this, for I should have thought the bible would have taught you otherwise: I wish I knew where you found any thing in it that forbids charity, for I must confess I never could. It always appeared to me, that mankind in general were too apt to lack in love and charity towards one another, and that this was the only reason there was so much blood spilt in former days. If people had been always taught to love one another, and to view all mankind as brethren, it would have saved thousands from the stake.—What a shame—what a reproach has it cast upon the christian world, that one brother should lead another to fire the faggots, (while they both believe in the same Christ,) and for what?—Why, because he did not believe just as he did in every particular. Is it possible this can be true? Yes, it evidently is; let us then pray for charity, if it will prevent such horrid proceedings.

I believe, brother Sawyer, you would shudder at the tho't of persecution as quick as I should. All I would wish to infer from the above, is to show the cause of persecution, which is the want of charity.

I endeavor to write with candor, when I inform you, that I wish, if it be possible, that you throw by all prejudice so far as to fellowship the Methodist—the Quaker—the Presbyterian—the Churchman—the Universalists, and all other Christian believers, remembering they all believe in the same Jesus that you do: let all those outward forms alone, they have gone according to what light they have received, and you have done no more. Yes, brother Sawyer, I wish you would be more charitable than you hitherto have been; and when you think you see any one in an error, endeavor to bring your mind to the following rules: Let the righteous smite me, it shall be kindness; and let them reprove me, it shall be an excellent oil which shall not break my head. But let not the man who would write, dip his pen in gall, nor he, who would converse, make his tongue as a sharp sword; but let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking be put away from you, with all malice, and be ye kind one to another, even as God for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you. Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering, forbearing one another, and forgiving one another: if any man have a quarrel against any, even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye; and above all things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness, and let the peace of God rule your heart. This is the state of mind that all Christians ought to possess; and, if I am not blinded by partiality, Walter Ferriss possessed it in as great a degree as any person that I ever saw in my life; and whenever I see that disposition in any one, I care not to what society they belong, being fully persuaded they have been touched with a live coal from the altar.

I trust I have a firm and lasting belief, that in the world of spirits, I shall behold all the human family in ONE, when all names shall be done away, and Christ shall be in all; when there shall be no such thing known as sin, but that all hearts shall be bowed in humble reverence to God. And blessed be God who hath given me this hope; it is more to me than all the riches of the east. To have a full belief of meeting my departed husband in another world, to be separated no more; to be confident that not one of my children will be lost; that I shall see my friends happy; and that the great est enemies I have on earth will rejoice with me in heaven in the goodness of God, is more to me than I can find words to express. These are my sentiments, and must I loose your fellowship on that account? I hope not, for certain I am, that I do not feel so much inclination to sin as I did when I believed in a partial God; for I believe now, that God loves all the workmanship of his hands, and it naturally induces me to imitate his example. I had a hope for myself before I had a manifestation of his love for the whole world; and I rejoice in believing that I cannot love God or my fellow creatures too well, and that God hath mercy in store for all his dependant creatures; and therefore, I think the Universal system can have no bad effect on me, or any other person who hath a realizing sense of it. If we see any one who does wrong, we must not lay it to any particular system, but to the frailty of man. If we want to look for a good foundation, we must look to the goodness of God and his promises, and not his creature man, for in that we shall all fail. If we see any one is so vile that we think he cannot be saved, we must think how vile we were ourselves, and where we found mercy, and we shall see that our own works condemn us all. Let us remember, at the same time, the promise of God, where he saith, "Though your sins be as scarlet, I will make them white as snow."

I could write a month on this subject, if I had leisure, but I fear by this time, I shall have wearied your patience, and that you wish me to conclude.

I desire you, Sir, in the spirit of friendship, seriously to consider what I have written, for I really believe it will not have a bad effect upon your mind. Forbear to think hard of my opinion, when I tell you that I firmly believe the time will come, when you will have great joy in believing in the restoration of all mankind, which I dare say is what you never prayed against in your life; and if you pray with the spirit of God I trust you never will.

And that God may grant you comfort while on earth, and happiness hereafter, prays your friend and well wisher, SALLY FERRISS.

IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTEND FOR THE FAITH."

A JUST COMPLAINT.

It is an old saying, and we begin to think a very true one, that "it takes every thing to make a world." We are the more convinced of the truth of this maxim by the conduct of some persons who have heretofore taken the Gospel Advocate. We allude to such as decline receiving the current volume, after it has been sent to them for weeks, and after having been duly apprised of the proper steps to be taken.

ilance could do, to have every former subscriber understand our situation and expectations. Time after time, notice has been given that subscribers would be considered as desiring to have the paper continued, unless seasonable notice was given to the contrary; and yet after all our pains, there have been seven or eight notices of discontinuance after the fourth number of the present volume had been sent on.

We are thankful that universalism is not burthened with more than one in a hundred of such supporters! And if there are any more, among our subscribers who wish to signalize themselves in a similar way, we desire them to send on soon; and we promise them a speedy discontinuance. Post Masters are respectfully requested to inform us of any such delinquencies, as we are about preparing a "Black List," of all such as so wantonly violate all rules of civility and politeness. While on the one hand we intend to extend every reasonable indulgence to our patrons; on the other, we mean that they shall do by us as they would be done by. Our hearts have been comforted by the kindness of our subscribers, generally speaking; and we regret being constrained to utter a single complaint against any individual; but the extent of the establishment, the wide circulation of our paper, as well as duty to our family and the cause of truth, seem to demand, that hereafter, due notice should be taken of those who are criminally negligent. A word to the wise is sufficient; and the foolish shall receive any further attention that may be desired or deserved.

SENTIMENTAL.

"Prompt to improve and to invite,
"We blend instruction with delight."

[From the Christian Intelligencer.]

"My husband at the commencement of his career, was too wealthy. He needed something to excite him to industry, and to confirm his habits of temperance. But his property encouraged indolence, and indolence nursed a host of other evils. He complained, like most others, of the shortness of time as a whole, but was impatient of the length of its parts. Days were too long for him, for he had nothing to accomplish in them. To wear away time, he at length had resource to ardent spirits. This destructive habit gained rapidly upon him. Nights blended with days; witnessed him rioting in excess, and squandering his money at the gaming table. In the meantime our family increased. We have had nine beautiful children; three of them we have followed to the grave, and I have sometimes thought it was in mercy that God took them away, that they might not be left to behold and partake of our present miseries. But it is not necessary for me to be very particular. Suffice it to say, my husband—he to whom my heart's best affections were bound—he who vowed love and kindness and protection toward me—he became an habitual —Oh! must I say it—an habitual drunkard! He squandered his property, until it was all gone! He has abused both me and his children! Yet I may still be permitted to say I love him. He was my early friend, and he is the father of my needy children. Not a day passes over my head, in which I do not bend my knee to that God, whose favors he has abused, to entreat for his reformation and happiness. But his case is undoubtedly hopeless; and I and mine are undone. We are in very want. Many a time have I divided my last small morsel with my darling children, and have heard their cries for bread when it was beyond my power to relieve them! My husband is now in that room in a state of helpless intoxication. It was from him that you heard those groans. He has become a mere beast. He can always succeed, I know not how, in obtaining the intoxicating draught, and when he is in liquor he seeks to pour the whole storm of his resentment on my defenceless head. I have borne the misfortune meekly. I have always rendered kindness for abuse; and perhaps in this I have done wrong. Those however are alone capable of sitting in judgment on me, who have known by experience what it is to be in my situation. We still live in that house it is true, where I once enjoyed a father's protection, and where I hailed the matrimonial day which dawned with such fair prospects of a happy life. But it is no longer ours: and we are permitted to remain in it only by sufferance, by one who has held the poisoned cup to my husband's lips until he has robbed him of the last cent he possessed.

"When I look back to our former glory and contrast it with our present wretchedness, the thought is too painful for me and overcomes all my better powers. I am extremely poor—a family of beloved children are dependant on me, old age is approaching and the future promises nothing but storms and miseries! My only prayer is—that God would provide for my helpless children; and enable me to bend in humble submission to his will, until this life's troubled scene is o'er, and I shall meet with the purified race of man, where sorrowing and sighing can never come!"

All the while Mrs. F. was relating the sad tale of her misfortunes, Mrs. D. was in tears. She was disposed to "weep with those that weep," and in this case she did it freely. But when the narrator spoke of the contrast between her former and her present situation—when she referred to the abuse which she, innocent and affectionate as she was, had received from him who, if it were not for the inebriating bowl, would have rewarded her largely for all her faithfulness—when she mentioned her children, and placed her hand upon their heads, as she invoked the blessing of an Eternal Father upon them, it was too much for her; in the warmth of her compassion she fell upon the neck of the injured woman, exclaiming—God in mercy bind up this broken heart; and pour into this wounded spirit the richest of thine own divine consolations!

Never did a person wish for riches more than these strangers did, when obliged to take their leave of this interesting, but neglected family. Freely would they have restored its lost fortune. But benevolence is sometimes compelled to stop and weep over wounds it cannot heal. They gave them all they had—it was not much; but it was enough to answer the calls of nature at least for the present. The separation was not without pain, for it left wishes unsatisfied on the one hand, and an inability to repay a kindness, which indeed was more than paid by its own exercise on the other.

As they proceeded homeward, Mrs. D. exclaimed—"Let me be thankful that heaven put it in our way to visit that abode of sorrow.—From it let me learn to be more satisfied than ever with the blessings I possess—a home made comfortable and happy by him, the sharer of my affections, who, thank God, has not made shipwreck of his virtue on the accursed rock of intemperance." "And let me return replied, Mr. D. to preach to the world the destructive tendency and wretched consequences of a vice, that sinks the rational man below the irrational brute, and that brings an insupportable load of miseries to the innocent and deserving!"

SHOCKING INFATUATION.

As "editors of papers generally are requested to copy" the following notice of a very extraordinary Elopement, we feel at liberty to give it an insertion.—Although we, as Protestants, feel bound to protest against the errors of the Roman Catholic church, we are far from desiring to cast a stigma upon her institutions on account of the misconduct of Father M'Cormick. But the circumstance brings to mind the impropriety of prohibiting marriage, as is done by the Catholics. Why should those "holy ties" that bind our species together by an institution authorised by God himself, be prohibited by the church of Rome?—Why should a "Father in God" be prohibited from partaking the endearments of the connubial state, while a part of their office is to sanction the rite which secures them to others? He who has studied our nature knows that the institutions of God's appointment are general, and admirably calculated to prevent licentiousness and misery; and that religion which denies us the benefits of them, cannot be discarded too soon, or too speedily meet the destruction that awaits it.

"Inasmuch as the Rev. JOHN M'CORMICK, late Pastor of the Roman Catholic Church of Rochester, has eloped with a young woman, in violation of morality and of the obligations of his sacred office, and of all other ties which good men reverence,

We, the Trustees of the said Church, deem it our duty, and do hereby caution our fellow Christians throughout the world to beware of the said John M'Cormick as of a wolf in sheep's clothing.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

NEW-YORK, February 1.

Another victim to Error.—Yesterday, Mr. J. Hicks, of Orange near Spring street, hung himself, after a second attempt. He tied a rope to a rafter in a stable, fastened it to his neck, and apparently cast himself from a horse on which he stood. He was taken down before life was extinct. He had been exercised in his mind for a length of time, and told the writer several times that he felt an intolerable burden and distress of mind, and said that it would never be better with him.

Great Storm.—The Caledonian Mercury gives an account of the most awfully destructive storm of wind and snow that ever devastated the highlands of Perth and Inverness. The loss of human life is deplorable. It being on a market day and the night succeeding, numbers of poor people from the country perished. Eleven bodies had been dug out of the snow. In some parts of the highlands the snow is drifted to the depth of one hundred feet. The Caledonian stage, between Perth and Inverness, lay buried in the snow. Immense numbers of sheep had perished, and those which still survived, must soon perish for want of sustenance. The loss of shipping on the coast of Scotland was great; in one vessel twenty persons were lost, and in another, the captain and four men. Upwards of ten thousand sheep perished in the snow storms.

In Dunbarton, N. H. perished in the Great Pond, (so called) Mr. Archelans Colby, aged about 60. He was found seven days afterward, standing nearly erect with his head and shoulders frozen into the ice.

At the circuit court, recently held in Seneca county, the case of Mrs. Sweet came on for the murder of her husband, with an axe. After an impartial investigation, the Jury was of opinion that Mrs. Sweet was insane, and she was ordered to be taken care of by her friends.

We are told that when a native of Sumatra beheld a clock, and was made sensible of its use, he said, "the sun is a machine of similar construction."—"But who winds it up?" inquired one of his companions. "Who but Allah?" (God) was the reply.

A certain Mechanic having occasion to boil some cattle's feet, emptied the bones near the court house. A lawyer observing them, inquired of a bystander what they were.—"I believe they are client's bones," replied the wag, "as they appear to be well picked."

The coaches from Leeds to London, travel at an unprecedented rate of speed. They perform the distance of 110 miles in 7 hours and 50 minutes.

Mrs. Brown, New Jersey, an account of whose trial for cruel treatment of a little black girl, was given some days since, has been sentenced to pay a fine of one hundred dollars and imprisoned in the county jail for three months. She is also required to bear the expense of supporting the child, without having it under her control.

THE MOTHER'S GRAVE.

"And that same dew which sometime on the buds—
Was wont to swell like round and orient pearls, Stood now within the pretty infant's eyes
In tears." SHAKESPEARE.

Look, sister sweet, upon that hallow'd stone!

We stand upon a spot of love and fear;

For there is laid a heart, the fondest one,

That ever left its children weeping here!

There sleeps our mother in the silent dust,

By all our sorrow, all our love unmov'd;

Sleeps, till the solemn summons of the just Bids her awake, to meet the God she loved.

I saw her fainting on her bed of pain;

I saw her like the leaves of autumn lie;

I saw her strive to smile, but strive in vain—

And then I—no, I dared not see her die!

Then came the bitter pageant of the grave—

The fearful hearse, the following weeping crowd;

I saw—'twas but one look—the plumage wave,

And longed to slumber with her in her shroud.

Thou King of kings, who on these babes did smile,

And take the little ones upon thy knee,

Guide us through earth, and all its snares, awhile—

Then take us innocent to rest with thee!

Sweet sister, bend no more on earth thine eyes;

No more weep idly on that silent stone;

But fix thy gaze, thy soul, upon the skies—

There shall we go, for there our mother's gone!

DOCTRINAL.

It will be recollected by many of our readers, that a discourse, delivered by Br. W. I. Reese, at W. Bloomfield, in debate with Mr. Millard, a preacher of the Christian Connexion, was published in the fourth volume of the Advocate; and intimations were then given that some further notice would be taken of the debate. Owing to the imperfection of the notes we had taken at the time, we had hoped that some one more competent and better prepared for the task, would have furnished a statement of Mr. Millard's arguments: but we have not yet realized such expectations; nor would it, at this late period, be advisable to enter at large into the merits of the controversy. Mr. Millard pursued the beaten track, in his reply to Br. Reese, and among other things, brought forward the "sin against the holy spirit," in proof of his positions, which, not being connected with the subject in debate, was not anticipated by Br. Reese. It being agitated by Mr. Millard, rendered a subsequent reply not only proper but necessary; and we are happy to present the substance of the discourse, in reply, by Br. Reese on that interesting subject, to our readers. Aside from its being connected with the debate, it contains matter of interest to every enquiring mind. Praise or comment is unnecessary; and, what we have received, we give, kind reader, unto thee.—EDITORS.

TO THE READER.

The following remarks, though forwarded late, were occasioned by the debate between Mr. Millard and myself, on the 29th Sept. 1826; on which occasion my opponent quoted the text which will be seen below, to which I had not then an opportunity to reply, in consequence of previous arrangements. In my remarks on this subject, I have attempted to refute the general views entertained of it without regard to any particular sect of believers. How far I have succeeded in this, and also, to establish correct views of the passage, the public must judge.

EXPOSITION OF MAT. XII. 31, 32.

"Wherefore I say, unto you, all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men; but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, shall not be forgiven unto men; and whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come."—COMMON VERSION.

"Wherefore I assure you, all sin and blasphemy will be forgiven to men, but the blasphemy against the spirit will not be forgiven to men: and whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it will be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Spirit, it will not be forgiven him, neither in this nor in the coming age."—KNEELAND'S TRANSLATION.

When we look into the creeds and writings of our opponents, and compare their arguments there with their views of this subject, we find their sentiments to depose against themselves. For it is there said, that the sin of which my text speaks, is sin against the light of divine truth. Mr. Russel says, that, in order to commit the sin against the Holy Spirit, there must be "LIGHT in the head, and malice in the heart." All sin against the light then, is sin against the Holy Spirit. Hence, no one, destitute of this blest light can commit this sin. If this sin have no forgiveness in time nor in eternity, as says modern orthodoxy, (and all other sins will be forgiven on the grounds, even of the common notions of forgiveness,) and this sin came by sinning against light given us by the Almighty, and this could not have been without our being brought to the light by him, could I not, with propriety, pray God to keep us from the light or the knowledge of the truth? Is not this calculated to confirm people in delusion, and make them fear this dangerous light, lest they should resist it, and thereby involve themselves in endless ruin? Is it at all to be wondered at, that orthodoxy for several years past, has been so unsuccessful? Was there ever a more suitable system of mock theology to lull the wicked in their wickedness than this? For, observe, it is an undeniable truth, according to the text, that "all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men." This, to say the least, in the light of modern theology, must include all the sins of the unregenerated part of mankind, who have never sinned against the Holy Spirit; and it is useless for such teachers to attempt to save their sinking system from this conclusion.—How then must their unregenerate understand this? (for surely all are capable of understanding the above conclusion.) The answer to this question is obvious: The wicked will infer, (and it is the only just inference that can be drawn from the orthodox views of forgiveness,) that all their sins will be forgiven them so as not to be punished at all!! Whereas, if they should become converted and enlightened; and commit sin in such state, which they must according to the same theory, they are never to have forgiveness, but render themselves liable to endless damnation !! Hence, such persons will choose to remain unenlightened as more safe than the opposite ; and no one will question the wisdom of such choice, if the premises I am examining be correct !!

All will readily perceive, from the vulgar views of sin, forgiveness, and endless misery drawn from the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, that all infants, idiots, and heathen,—in short all the unregenerate, will be saved if they die in such state, or in ignorance, but not otherwise. Every enlightened person, whether Jew or Gentile, must give up all hope of salvation, “For there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good and sinneth not.”—Eccl. vii. 20. Of course, all the elect will be endlessly condemned, but the non-elect not being enlightened, and, therefore, never having committed the sin against the Holy Spirit, will be saved !! And what gives lustre to this system is, there is no change after death !! This is turning the world upside down with a witness. This is peopling hell with saints and heaven with sinners; and, shocking as it may seem, THERE WILL BE NO CHANGE AFTER DEATH !

It is truly a matter of astonishment, that those sages whose premises result in such direful consequences to every regenerate person, are still engaged, with enthusiastick zeal to enlighten the sottish and benighted heathen ! Surely, instead of there being “salvation inscribed on every dollar” given to promote the missionary scheme, the case is otherwise. For if I have not exaggerated the subject, and I believe I have not, every attempt on this ground to save the heathen, is only to fit those unsuspecting mortals for remodelless wo !! Let pretended soul-savers look at this and change their course. But, in order to fully meet and refute this system, I need only observe,

1. The Holy Spirit was given to guide us into all truth and not fit us to abuse its divine influence, nor seal us over to inevitable despair.

2. The doctrine of endless misery can never be supported by analogy or scripture ; for it supposes an effect without an adequate cause. As no stream can rise above its fountain, so no effect can superabound its cause. The doctrine of infinite demerit has driven many to despair and suicide, and well it might, when fully believed. For when we are persuaded of the absurd idea, that one is “infinitely guilty,” and have any just notion of infinity, the inference will be, nay, must be, that in order to repent of such guilt, an act more than infinite must be performed, which is out of the power of Deity himself. On this ground, repentance is impossible ! And it is an abuse of sound sense and sober reason to exhort “infinitely guilty” creatures to “cease to do evil, and learn to do well.”

3. But the text, with its parallel, Mark iii. 28, teaches us that “all sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewithsoever they shall blaspheme.” This expression is evidently without limitation, and, therefore, admits of no exception. “All sins—and blasphemies wherewithsoever—all manner of sin and blasphemy,” must include every sin, not excepting the sin against the Holy Spirit. I am aware, that the usual mode of quoting this text is, that all sins shall be forgiven, except the sin against the Holy Spirit. There is however, no exception in the case. The word “but” in the text, is not equivalent to “except ;” for in that case, it would govern the noun “blasphemy” as an objective ; whereas, it is the nominative to the verb shall be forgiven, qualified by the particle “not.” Let the text be fairly understood, and the notion under consideration will be given up.

4. What still further confirms this, is the parenthetical reading in the text in Matthew. And I have often wondered how all our translators, both ancient and modern, have overlooked it. I will arrange the text in this way ; and as every one knows that a parenthesis does not alter the sense of a passage, no one will suspect a disposition in the writer to turn the subject aside from our Lord’s meaning.—“Wherefore, I say unto you, all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men, but the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit shall not be forgiven unto men ; (and whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him ; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him,) neither in this world, neither in the world to come.” Here, in the common version, the Greek words “aute en touto to aioni, aute en to mellonti,” are unwarrantably translated “neither in this world, neither in the world to come.” Dr. Campbell, “neither in this state,” &c. Dr. A. Clarke, on the place, says, “Though I follow the common translation, yet I am fully satisfied, that the meaning of the words is neither in this dispensation (viz. the Jewish,) nor in that which is to come, (viz. the Christian,) Olam ha-bo, the world to come, is a constant phrase for the times of the Messiah, by the Jewish writers.”

By observing the parenthesis in the text, it will be perceived, that the meaning of our Lord is fully expressed in the language which precedes and follows it, and is as plainly qualified and limited ; thus, “Wherefore I say unto you, all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men, but the blasphemy against the Holy, shall not be forgiven unto men—neither in this dispensation, (viz. the Jewish) or in that which is to come, (viz. the Christian.)” The parenthetical reading which intervenes is explanatory of the difference between speaking against a messenger or his message. For undoubtedly, the “Holy Spirit” mentioned in the text, is the same as the "spirit (or doctrine) of God." 1. John, iv. 1, 2. "Beloved, believe not every spirit, (or doctrine) but try the spirits (or doctrines) whether they are of God: because many false prophets have gone out into the world," [i. e. to teach false doctrines.]—"Hereby know ye the spirit of God; every spirit (or doctrine) that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God." Every one knows, that one may speak against a messenger, yet partake of all the benefits of his message. The parenthetical reading is qualified by the last clause of the text, and may be paraphrased thus: "If you speak against me, who am the bearer of the tidings of peace and good will, this will not be considered a barrier to your believing my doctrine which teaches the forgiveness of sins; but if you continue to deride and blaspheme the very message I bring you, so as to give it no attention except to abuse it, while this your dispensation lasts, soon my disciples will bear the same "spirit of truth," to the Gentiles, whom you, in your partial views abhor, and to whom nothing can unite you but the "ministry of reconciliation," and thereby you will lose the opportunity of realizing a forgiveness of sins in this age, and also in that which is to follow. You have ascribed my power of working miracles to Beelzebub, and treated my "words" with scorn, which are both "SPIRIT and life."—John vi. 63.

5. In bringing this article to a close, it may be well to consider the nature of forgiveness, in relation to those characters who were not to be forgiven in the time above specified by our Lord. When it is understood that "blindness in part, happened to Israel, it will be perceived, that our subject must have a national, and not merely an individual application. For many of the Jews in their own age, and also in that of the Gentiles, became converts to Christianity; but as a nation, they still reject the gospel of Christ. But is this an objection to their finally realizing forgiveness and salvation? To this I shall now attend.

A Being, who is of "one mind, without variability or shadow of turning, loves the world and commands his love to sinners," must forever possess a forgiving disposition towards his offending offspring. Hence, forgiveness ever dwells in the bosom of the "Father of the spirits of all flesh." I know, "the disputers of this age" have amalgamated literal and moral forgiveness in one mass, but the compound is such that it may easily be analyzed. As no one can perceive how an unchanging God can act with a forgiving disposition towards his creatures at one time, and at another act directly and positively contrary, one would think that this alone would show, that if there be any such thing as moral forgiveness, it must be consistent with the conduct of the Deity, in chastising his children for their good. As every one, whose head is capable of containing a philosophical idea, knows that, as the mind of a good earthly parent is more powerfully directed to the reformation of his offending child, than to the immediate cause which gave occasion to the stripes, he, in the very act of chastising, forgives the offender, and it cannot be otherwise; though a reformation may not be produced the first week nor the week to come. This holds in regard to the forgiveness of God. Isa. xl. 2. "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is PARDONED; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins." See, also, Ps. xcix. 8. and numbers xiv. 17, 23. The most that can be said, then, is, that, though "forgiveness is ever with God," the state of the Jews has been and still is such, that they have not, as a people, experienced the pardoning love of the Almighty. But the Deliverer is yet to come out of Zion, and turn away ungodliness from Jacob. "For the Lord will not cast off forever, but, though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men." Sam. iii. 31, 33.

INFANTILE DEPRAVITY.

It is the general opinion of the christian world, that infants are born with natures which are sinful, and that they received this sinful nature from Adam; or in other words, "that all mankind descending from Adam by ordinary generation sinned in him and fell with him in his first transgression." This sinful nature of infants is termed original sin, by Divines and others.

This is a point of so much importance, and is so interwoven with the introduction of sin by the first man and woman, that no man can have a correct idea of the system of divinity, who in this point, is incorrect.

Sin, according to St. Paul, is the transgression of the Law. Again, where there is no law there is no transgression. Although a law may exist, and be in force respecting beings who are capable of the knowledge of it; yet beings incapable of knowing the Law, are in fact, without Law, and if without Law they are without transgression. Now if infants are incapable of knowing the Law, they are, consequently, without law; the conclusion is, they are without sin or transgression. The death of the body has been, and still is considered as the consequence of sin, and as infants die, the argument is, they must be sinful. The fallacy of this argument appears in the supposition that the death of the body is the consequence of sin. This is not the case. Man's body being formed of the dust of the ground, and the breath of life within him being the air which he inhales; he must, of course, be subject to decomposition or death. When the several elements composing his body are separated or decomposed, which is liable to be the case from many obstructions within the body and from innumerable dangers without the body, then the body dies, and inactivity and death in every part of it are visible.

In short, the laws of gravitation, and those of material bodies universally must cease their operation; otherwise human and inhuman creatures formed of matter must be subject to the variety of pains, distresses and death itself. Therefore, considering what matter is and what its laws must of necessity be; it is impossible that a human creature formed of the dust should ever have been immortal. If man had never sinned, his body would have been as mortal as it now is, and he would have been equally subject to pain, distress and death. Hence it is utterly unphilosophical to impute immortality, (even in a state of innocence,) to any human body. The arrow, which by piercing the heart would put an end to our natural life, would equally, in his state of innocence, have put a period to Adam's life. The rock from a mountain, which would have crushed us, would equally have crushed Adam to death. Thus the death of infants is no proof of their sinfulness.

It is generally supposed that St. Paul meant infants when he said, Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses even over them, who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression. Rom. v. 14. There are but a few texts by which Christians have been led into the belief of Infantile depravity. The li. Ps. and 5 verse, has been pressed into this service. Behold I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me. I shall only observe on this, that the mistake in the explanation of this text consists in imputing the sin of conception to the child, which belonged solely to the mother. St. Paul says, As in Adam all die. This must be understood of the earthly nature, for Adam signifies earthly. In that nature all, both old and young, die. Hence infants, who have not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, are subject to pain, distress and death equally with Adults, and no other reason can be given for it, only that the creature was made subject to this variety in his formation. Hence it follows likewise, that men descending from Adam by ordinary generation did not sin in him nor fall with him in his first transgression. His descendants only inherit the same earthly nature with Adam, which is subject to the same variety of sin and imperfection when they become capable of it. The brute creation, likewise, are subject to death, but not as a consequence of their sin, but as the natural and necessary consequence of being formed of matter. It may then be inquired why all men do sin, when they come to years of understanding? Ans. They were formed of matter, with all the liabilities attached to matter; with all the passions and appetites necessary for an earthly man, which, though complete and sinless in themselves, are liable in their operation, to be indulged to excess and towards unlawful and forbidden objects. Indeed, the existence of a law and the knowledge of the law are necessary to the commission of sin; for without law, or if there were a law and yet man had no knowledge of it, in either of these cases, with all the liabilities attached to an earthly body, man could not commit sin.

The force of all that has been said goes to prove, that as infants can have no knowledge of any law, so neither can they sin against any law. That they are sinners by nature, (meaning their state of destitution of any knowledge and their inactivity,) is an absurdity. For what is sin? Is it a dead inactive principle, as some suppose who term it the sin of nature? No; no such thing.

In the sacred writings we have no account of sin excepting those volitions, words or actions, by which a known law is transgressed. Now can infants be guilty in any of these senses? Can they discern between their right hand and their left? Have they the knowledge of good or evil? Have they the knowledge of, or are they amenable to any law? In what sense then, can they be sinful? It will be said, perhaps, that they have naturally an evil propensity inclining them to sin. This can mean nothing more nor less than what they have called the sin of nature, which we have already refuted; the truth is, we can conceive of no sin without taking into view a law and the knowledge of that law, and then of an action or volition by which that law is transgressed.

REMARKS.

This subject, I am convinced, if men would candidly consider it would satisfy their minds respecting the introduction of moral evil or sin, and the continuance of it among all generations to the present time. There is no necessity of supposing that a distinct being from man should be the tempter of man, for man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lusts and enticed.

Thus when the forbidden fruit appeared pleasant to the eyes of our mother, she judging that it was a tree to be desired to make one wise, eats of the same and so was drawn away by her own lusts. Misjudging of her interest, she acted contrary to that, which she knew to be her duty, and thus brought guilt on herself. This guilt, which is always accompanied with fear and torment, was the death of which she had been forewarned and which she died on the day of transgression. This was the case with Adam. They both discovered guilt. They were guilty & consequently wretched. Now we can go no where to find why they transgressed, only to themselves; they were made subject to this vanity by their formation. The assembly of Divines say, that no mere man since the fall is able perfectly to keep the commandments of God; it appears by the foregoing account, that Adam and Eve were unable to keep the law perfectly before the fall. Thus with Adam's posterity they are as innocent, and as free from sin when born, as Adam was before he transgressed, and it is not to any taint of sin derived from Adam, that all his children sin when they come to years of understanding; but to their formation like him, in which they are subject to the same vanity. Adam's innocence did not secure him from sin; so neither does the innocence of his posterity free them from sin.

There is one plausible objection against this doctrine, it is this; that if infants are innocent and free from sin, they cannot be saved by grace. Ans. Is it not grace, by which Adults are kept from many sins? Is it not restraining grace? The sins from which Adults are restrained, are sins of which they were never or guilty; yet they are saved from them by restraining grace. So infants are innocent to be sure; yet are they not by death, prevented from sins, which they would have committed if they had lived! Certainly. Then here is preventing grace, and they are saved by that. Add to this their resurrection in Christ, (for infants equally with adults are subjects of the resurrection;) and it will appear that their salvation is by grace. All are gathered together in one, even in Christ in the resurrection.

Having, as I think, sufficiently shown that infants are not polluted with sin; that descending from Adam by ordinary generation, they did not sin in him nor fall with him in his first transgression; I will now take notice of one consequence, which must follow, if the doctrine of infantile depravity be true. It is a consequence almost universally unnoticed by writers in support of such depravity, and seems to be passed by, either without thought on the subject, or because, in its nature, it is unanswerable. The consequence to which I allude, is this; if infants descended from Adam, are born sinful and morally defiled, will it not follow that this was the case with the infant Jesus? He was the seed of Abraham and of David according to the flesh; why then not polluted and sinful as other infants?—How shockingly would this thought strike the mind, and how contrary to the declarations concerning him! Was it not said to Mary, that that holy thing which should be born of her, should be called the Son of God? Was he not holy, harmless, &c. Was not he without sin? How could this be when he was born of a woman, made of a woman, and made under the law; I say, how would he be sinless, when all other infants are polluted and defiled with sin? Being the seed of the woman, why was he not tainted with sin, as all other infants are said to be? In short, I appeal to the justice and wisdom of the fathers and brethren of the christian church, whether the doctrine of the depravity of infants, will not involve a difficulty which neither the wisdom of man in one case, nor the art nor sophistry of man in another, can ever explain to the satisfaction of a candid mind.

IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR.

INCREASE OF LIGHT.

To all who desire to have truth prevail, it is gratifying to hear of its advancement. Those who delight to pore over the remnants of theological darkness, and content themselves under the preaching of those whose interest leads them to sing the praises of popular error, know very little of the true condition of our country in a religious point of view. Truth, in ten thousand ways, is sapping the very foundation of error. The North is giving up, and the South keeps not back: the revivifying rays of gospel light are shining in the East, and the West is already illuminated by its effulgent beams. Truly, they that sat in darkness have seen a great light.

A letter bearing date, Chillicothe, O. Feb. 3, 1827, gives us the following description of the moral condition of that place and the region round about. “The prospect in this country is truly gladdening to the hearts of all the friends of Gospel Liberty. The great I AM speeds the good work. Thousands who have long bowed the knee to Baal, and who have sat in darkness and the region of the shadow of death, may now say ‘light has sprung up!’ they now are enquiring the way to Zion, having their faces thitherward. The rapid progress that liberal and rational christianity is making in this part of God’s heritage, is truly astonishing. ‘It is the Lord’s doing, and marvellous in our eyes.’ I met a day or two since with an aged man, whose locks were blossoming for the tomb, who has lately been delivered from the grievous bondage of error and superstition into the glorious liberty of that truth which maketh free. ‘Ah,’ said he, the tears trickling down his furrowed cheeks, ‘I have long neglected this great salvation: I have long worshipped them which are no Gods; but now, blessed be the true God, the scales have left mine eyes: I shall now depart in peace; for mine eyes have seen the salvation of God.’ Such language bursts forth wherever I go. Multitudes have tasted and seen that the Lord is good unto all, and that his tender mercies are over all his works! May God grant that the good work may go on until an emancipated Universe shall shout hallelujah to our God.”

The above is but one instance among a thousand of a similar description, which might be noticed. The wilderness blossoms like the rose; and truth, with rapid strides, is travelling onward to the grand consummation. The aged, are receiving into their hearts the balm of Gilead: the middle aged, are seeking, and finding the truth: the young are beginning to ponder the wonderful mercy of God; and the time will soon arrive when;

Infant voices shall proclaim
The honors of Immanuel’s name.”

An aged and highly respected brother residing about two hundred miles east of this place, in view of the increase of light, exhorts us to “blow the jubilee trumpet to earth’s remotest bounds;” and had we the ability, the soul-saving theme of eternal love should soon be substituted throughout the widely extended heritage of God, for the tormenting jargon of wo, misery, and death! As it is, we feel thankful to the great God of the universe; and would, with thousands of happy believers begin now the anthem of heaven here on earth, by saying “glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will towards men.”

AN APPEAL TO THE WHOLE WORLD.

FOR MORE THAN FOUR YEARS, a weekly religious paper, entitled the GOSPEL ADVOCATE, has been published in the village of Buffalo, N. Y; which has earnestly contended for the doctrine of a free and UNIVERSAL SALVATION OF ALL MANKIND. Unlike the publications of other denominations, its columns have at all times been open to receive the arguments of those who maintain the doctrine of a vindictive God and endless hell; and they have at length found that “their strength is to sit still.” The enemies of the Advocate have resorted to denunciations rather than to argument; they have said that its sentiments are pernicious, but have failed to substantiate their assertions by proof; they have tried to prevent its circulation, but have failed! They have adopted the language of Gam-alici, and said of us, "refrain from these men and let them alone; for if this counsel, or this work, be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God ye cannot overthrow it; and the fact that it yet stands, is, according to the declarations of its enemies, an evidence that our work is 'of God!'"

From a very small beginning the patronage of the Gospel Advocate has increased, until now THREE THOUSAND COPIES ARE PUBLISHED EVERY WEEK!! And with these facts before us we solemnly appeal to the WHOLE WORLD in its behalf! We call upon our learned opponents to enter our columns and convince the public, if they can, that our sentiments are either erroneous or pernicious: We call upon all who are willing to investigate the everlasting concerns of time and eternity, to give our arguments a candid investigation: We call upon the friends of religion, of every name and denomination, wheresoever scattered abroad in the earth, to aid us in the important work of investigation which is going on: And we do most solemnly pledge ourselves before the Owner of Creation, to keep our minds open to conviction, and our hands prepared to publish to the world, whatever appears as truth.

We fearlessly assume the position, that the dogma of an endless hell with its concomitants, is PERNICIOUS in the most extensive and unqualified sense of the word; that so far from restraining the untutored passions of mankind, it tends to blunt the tender sensibilities of our nature, remove far away the evil-day, and lead to sin and misery the children of men, by promising an escape on easy conditions, from the consequences of sin; that it is neither good to live by, nor to die by; THAT THE WHOLE SCHEME OF ENDLESS TORTURE is in direct opposition to enlightened reason, at variance with all the natural and moral perfections of God, abhorrent to the best feelings and principles of humanity; and condemned by the scriptures of divine truth. And we pledge ourselves to the public, that whenever our opponents will enter our columns, and attempt to confute us with argument or scripture testimony, either to sustain the foregoing premises, or acknowledge ourselves in the fault! We do, therefore, with undiminished confidence in God and a liberal public, invite all, without any reference to names or parties, to give us a patient hearing before they decide for or against the cause we have espoused.

MISCELLANY.

"Prompt to improve and to invite,
"We blend instruction with delight."

[From the Herald of Salvation.]

EXPERIENCE.

The scriptures are as destitute of terms, by which the modern notions of christian experience are expressed, as the first converts to christianity appear to have been, of the sensations, and emotions which it produces. As evidence, we urge the various recorded instances, from the moment when Peter addressed the multitude on the day of Pentecost, to that of Paul to the Jews of Rome, and which closes the Apostolic history. During this whole period, in which several instances of conversion are very circumstantially related, nothing resembling a modern experience once occurs.—The Jews exclaim—"Men and brethren, what shall we do?" of others it is said—the Lord opened their hearts: the jailor under the apprehension that on the opening of the prison doors, the prisoners had escaped, and knowing the consequences to himself, felt all the terrors of his situation; and in the midst of astonishment on hearing the assurance given by the apostles, "came trembling, and fell down before Saul and Silas, and said, Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" The alarm exhibited in this instance, seems not to have arisen so much from religious considerations, as from the apprehensions of the consequences of having suffered the prisoners to escape. These fears, operating with a possible superstitious veneration of the apostles, (which was certainly more than once manifested towards them,) might work effectually the appeal which was made to them.

Another, and perhaps the most perfect scripture example of conversion, is that of Saul of Tarsus. A bright light shone about him: he heard a voice, and he fell to the ground; he inquired what he should do, and received such instructions as governed his whole after-life. But the effect thus produced, rested entirely upon the evidence of divine truth, furnished at the time of the revelation; and not upon any other exercise of mind whatever. And indeed, as the attainment of gospel truth, is the object of conversion: that state of mind which is least encumbered by the influence of passion, must be the most proper and best; and this was evidently enjoyed by the first christian converts, as the truth was received by them with understanding, and with power.

But in this our day, the course of experience antecedent to and connected with conversion, is every way terrible. Those who survive it, and join the church in consequence, generally do so before they can render one consistent reason for it, or give a sober account of the evidence by which they now believe. Many sink under the burden of their woes, into absolute despair—terminating in the most hopeless and irremediable mental derangement, or suicide. Nor is it matter of surprise that these dreadful effects are so common, when the means, and measures for producing them are taken into consideration. Some fanatic whose bosom is an exuberant furnace of awakening fire, commences the work: the pulpit becomes the sanctuary of madness, whence anathemas and imprecations only befitting demons, are thundered forth: the schools, instead of places of elementary learning, are converted into metaphysical nurseries, where the tender mind is tortured with the application of every threat and denunciation which the ample resources of superstition can furnish: the domestic sanctuary is invaded: the secret concerns of families are inquired into, and husbands, and fathers, wives, sons, and daughters assailed with denunciations of the heaviest penalties at the disposal of Almighty wrath.

The consequence is, that minds whose sensibilities are the most acute, sink down into a "moping melancholy." They become oppressed with the strongest and most distressing convictions of sin: they feel great grief and compunction for their wickedness, and awful apprehensions of the impending wrath of God. In one word, guilt and horror haunt their minds, heaven frowns above them, and hell yawns beneath to receive them. After a longer or shorter endurance of these almost intolerable sufferings, the clouds disperse—their load of guilt and woe, is instantaneously removed—their agonizing tortures cease; and a holy calm—a deep devotional composure—a fervent, animating and benignant love succeeds. The God of whose mercy they had despaired, is now seen smiling in sweet complacency upon them—the heaven which had been shrouded in darkness, is now presented in open vision, and displays its unfading glories—and the voice which but lately had only been heard in sighs, and groans, and lamentations, now breaks forth in songs of triumph, and is attuned to chaunt the praises of the living God—to offer its petitions on his altar, and to call down benedictions on sinful man.

But in all this, we only behold the rage of passion, and the triumph of fear—an exercise every way dissimilar to the calm, inquiring, and convincing process, which wrought effectually to the conversion of the primitive christians. S.

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.

A clergyman, in this vicinity, not long since, in comment on II Peter iii. 7, after explaining that the passage referred to a last and final judgment, and giving a lucid picture of his infernal majesty, closed by saying, that “if you take a sinner from hell, after having been scorching and singeing there for a thousand years, and put him in a stove where they burn Lehigh coal, he would freeze to death in a moment.”—Christian Telescope.

Religious Sympathy.—One of the delightful fruits of christianity is the pious friendship it forms. “As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man.” This intimate communion of Christianity it is joyous to witness, especially in young persons. Where formal religion prevails—where there exists a shyness about conversing on these topics, it is not uncharitable, we trust, to infer, that vital piety is almost a stranger to the heart. “They that feared the Lord spake often one to another,” prophesied Malachi.

Books.—You complain, my Lucilius, that where you are there is a mighty scarcity of books. You should consider it not the multiplicity, but the goodness of that commodity which you ought to regard; perusing a number of books it is true gives pleasure; but 'tis a fixed and certain reading that affords benefit; for whosoever resolves to arrive at any particular place, pursues his journey thro' one, not various roads, for that would be not travel but to wander.—Seneca.

THE MORGAN AFFAIR.

We have not till within a few days been apprised that our readers were any of them dissatisfied with our silence upon the subject of the outrage committed upon the person of Capt. Wm. Morgan: and we are persuaded that but a very few are disposed to censure us on that account. It is true that we have said nothing on the subject; not because we are destitute of feeling, nor because we approve of the transaction in any sense of the word; but because we have felt it to be a duty to observe a studied silence.

Our reasons for so doing are the following: It is known to many of our brethren, that the genior Editor of this paper belongs to the masonick institution, and while there exists so great a degree of excitement, any thing we could say would probably be considered as an attempt to justify or palliate the offence committed by some of the fraternity. Another reason why silence is justifiable, is because we know nothing about the matter: and it would be criminal to hazard a conjecture on so important a subject. If all who have taken an active part in the business, would confine themselves to facts, we do believe that the perpetrators of the deed would be brought to justice sooner than they can be while mere conjectures are sought after with so much avidity, and published to the world with so ready a hand. It is true that the violence offered and inflicted upon the ill-fated Morgan, is highly criminal: it is true that the wife of Capt. Morgan is in a distressed condition: it is true that every feeling & honest heart, while mourning over her, feels indignant, and justly so, towards those who have deprived her of a husband's protection. But it is no less true that others, whose hearts are no less susceptible, and whose feelings are no less worthy of commiseration, are called to endure, in consequence of unfounded conjectures, pangs no less acute than those of Mrs. Morgan. We could call the name of an individual in this village, whose widowed heart has been made to bleed afresh by the insinuations which have been sent abroad by those who are ostensibly engaged in healing the rupture already made by the disgraceful outrage.

On looking over the whole transaction from beginning to end, we find little to applaud and much to condemn.—We shall therefore leave it, to be attended to by those who are set as the guardians of our civil rights. For ourselves, we know that our hands are unpolluted with the affair; and we stand ready to do all in our power to bring the offenders to justice: we do ardently pray, that we, together with many others belonging to the fraternity, who are equally innocent, may not be proscribed until guilt shall be laid at our door. We do hope that justice may yet have its demand; but pray God that indiscriminate censure may not hereafter be heaped upon all those who are known to have entered the precincts of a lodge, or are so unfortunate as to have received a share of public indignation on that account and no other. May moderation and prudence characterize the proceedings of the community: and may Heaven speedily restore peace to those from whom it has been taken by a concatenation of evils which we truly deplore.—EDITORS GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

THE LIST OF AGENTS,

Mentioned in our last, is necessarily deferred this week.

Raleigh.—It was said by Sir Walter Raleigh when some of his friends lamented his confinement under a sentence of death, which he knew not how soon he might suffer, “that the world itself was only a larger prison, out of which some were every day selected for execution.”—The Adventurer.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Greek Fund.—We understand that the fund in the hands of the Greek committee in this city, is between 9 and 10,000, and it is calculated, will be increased to 15,000 dollars. A vessel will shortly be despatched with flour and provisions, and another sent as soon afterwards as convenient. The committee intend making application to the Legislature for a handsome donation in money; and Mr. Bradish has kindly consented to go to Albany to promote the application by his feeling and forcible representation of the state of things as viewed by himself in Greece. Mr. Miller of Vermont, who has also recently returned from that country, has been written to by the committee with a request that he will go out as agent in charge of the remittances.—N. Y. Statesman.

The Merrimack chain bridge, which fell on the 7th instant, had been built about 15 years, and had a span of 220 feet. It is stated in the Newburyport Herald that hundreds and hundreds of individuals have visited its ruins, which present a sad and melancholy appearance—crushed and broken timbers suspended by the massy chains, which hang lazily from the pyramidal abutments, while the beholder instinctively shrinks back with terror at the reflection of the situation of the two human beings who were precipitated into the abyss beneath. The preservation of these men is almost miraculous. Although hurled down forty feet amid chashing and falling timber, entangled with their cattle, they felt without receiving the least injury, and attained the shore, after being for nearly half an hour immersed in water, chilled to the freezing point. Mr. Jackson is far advanced in years, and suffered somewhat from the exposure to the cold. Mr. Charlton escaped unhurt.

We learn from the Ballston Spa Gazette, that a number of gentlemen of that village have been engaged in boring for water on Mr. Disbrow's plan. When they had penetrated to the depth of 80 feet, they found Mineral Water surcharged with carbonic acid gas, which contained all the mineral properties of the fountains in the village, and rose freely—a gallon a minute. The company penetrated 170 feet, and are now in a magnesian calcareous slate rock, but have at present desisted, on account of the weather. At the depth of 80 feet, the water contained 280 grains of salt to the gallon, and the water is said to bear a nearer affinity to the Washington Fountain, (which has disappeared,) than any other spring in that region, and to contain as great if not a greater quantity of fixed air or gas, than that of the Washington Fountain.

NOTICE.—Mr. Everett expects to visit Auburn; and with leave of divine Providence, to attend Divine Service, on the first Sabbath in March next, at that place.

OBITUARY.

DIED.—In Erie, Mrs. Eliza Terry, wife of Dr. J. H. Terry, and daughter of Col. Jas. Cronk, aged about 22.

In Gerry, Chautauque co. Major Samuel Sinclear, aged about 65, an officer of the revolution.

In Philadelphia, Victor Dupont, Esq. of Brandywine, a director of the U. S. Bank.

In Cambridge, Ms. Major Loring Austin, aged 36, late of the U. S. Army, and Aid to Gen. Brown, in the battles of Chippewa, Lundy's lane, and the sortie from Fort Erie.

THE RESTORATION.

BARUCH, CHAPTER V.

Put off, O fair Salem! thy garments of mourning.

The robe which in days of affliction was thine;

Again is thy strength and thy splendor returning,

Again the pure light of thine altars shall shine.

For a garment around thee,

Be righteousness worn;

Let the gemm'd crown of glory

Thy temples adorn.

Arise, O fair city! the brightness of heaven.

Shall scatter the gloom that envelopes thy name;

To crown all thy honors to thee shall be given

Mild spurring peace, and unchangeable fame.

The beams of thy glory

Shall lighten the earth,

And men of all nations

Shall bow to thy worth.

Arise! look around! see thy sons without number,

Enraptur'd, draw near from the east and the west!

In thy blissful retreat, shall the worn spirit slumber,

The mourner rejoice, and the weary find rest.

From hate and oppression

Thy sons shall return;

In the land of the stranger

No longer to mourn.

Each hill shall sink low in the vale it frown'd over,

And level the path of thy children shall be;

Safe shall they pass, for the arm of Jehovah

Shall screen them from harm as they hasten to thee—

To the home of their fathers,

The weary shall come,

And the foe shall no longer

Compel them to roam.

DIVINE SERVICE,

Will be attended at the School House, Dist. No. 2, in this village, next Sabbath, (to-morrow,) at the usual hours.

MARRIED.—In Portland, Chautauque co. by Ernest Mullett, Esq. Mr. Walter Page of Forestville, to Miss Mary Dunn, of the former place.

In Black Rock, by Mr. Fillmore, Mr. Peter Sharp, to Miss Cynthia Dean.

On the 7th inst. by Mr. Wyckoff, Mr. Wm. L. Beebe, merchant of Syracuse, to Miss Mary Douglass, of Marcellus.

The GOSPEL ADVOCATE, and IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR, is published by an Association of Gentlemen, at $1.50, in advance; $2.00 if paid within six months; and $2.50, if not paid before the expiration of the year.

REFLECTIONS ON THE HAPPINESS OF HEAVEN.

Heaven is considered by all the various denominations of christians, as a place of complete and perfect happiness, where nothing ever enters to hurt or annoy the inhabitants of it. But how can it be a place of complete happiness, if the doctrines which are taught be true, viz. that a part, and even the greatest part, of mankind will be fixed in a place of endless and inconceivable misery and torment: burning and roasting in a lake of fire and liquid brimstone; and this too in the presence of those in heaven: husbands and wives; parents and children; brothers and sisters; the most near and dear connections, there to be separated; some to be rolling and tumbling on the waves and billows of this boisterous and burning lake—while those in heaven will be looking on, and beholding the sight unmoved and undisturbed! But there is a sentiment more horrid and barbarous still, which is held by some; that the happiness of those in heaven will be enhanced by beholding their nearest friends and others of their fellow creatures in torment, suffering the flames of eternal fire! Mr. Edwards says, that the sight of hell-torments will exalt the happiness of the saints forever! J. Spalding says, that the redeemed in heaven, will look down and see their own nearest kindred in hell, under all the bitter agonies of death, and stand unmoved at the sight; they maintain perfect calmness and undisturbed joy: they hear the judge pronounce the awful sentence; they see all the wicked sink down to hell; and hell moving with devouring flames to meet them; a sight infinitely more dreadful than the sinking of worlds. And I have read of one author, that went so far as to assert that if the fire of hell should ever go out, the light of heaven would no longer shine; and that every degree of misery, the damned in hell should endure, the happiness of the righteous in heaven, will be encreased millions of millions of degrees! and that the continuance of torment while God exists, is necessary to the government of the universe, and may be needful to preserve the saints in heaven from falling!! But I shudder, and the blood chills in my veins, the ink in my pen almost coagulates, while I write the doleful tale! Thought cannot conceive—language cannot utter—the baseness and vileness of this sentiment! It is contrary to all we know of God; it is opposed to that pure and undefiled religion, which Christ taught his disciples to live in the practice of; it is contrary to the dictates of humanity, and to that immortal passion of love and sympathy, which the God of nature has implanted in the breast of every rational being, and to that light which lighteth every man which cometh into the world, which is the light of love; and this immortal principle of love and sympathy, we may see operating at times in every man. Though in us it is but a drop, yet in God it is an inexhaustible fountain, and we receive it from him; for the apostle John gives this exhortation:—"Love one another, for love is of God;"..... therefore, since it is of God, it will never end, but will endure, as long as God exists. And thus the Apostle Paul reasons on this subject; "Now abideth faith, hope, charity, (which is love,) but the greatest of these is charity;"—faith and hope will fail, but "charity never faileth." Therefore it must be, as I have said, an immortal principle, and they that love here will love eternally. And since some men will be in the possession of this godlike passion of love thro' the endless ages of eternity, it is impossible for them to be happy in heaven, while they behold any of their friends, or any of the human family suffering in torment, through the wasteless ages of eternity. What should we say of a man in this world, should we see him stand and behold his friend or any of the human family, suffering in torment; and not manifest any tokens of love and sympathy towards his suffering brother; but instead of seeking to relieve him, should rejoice at the poor man's calamity? Such conduct would be condemned by every good and virtuous man. Or what should we say of a mother, who should rejoice and be glad while her child was suffering the most excruciating pain and distress? We should say at once, that such a mother was a monster! But if this doctrine be true, no doubt there will be such monsters in heaven! The scriptures abound with commands, to pity, commiserate, and seek to relieve those in distress; to weep with them that weep; to mourn with them that mourn; but never rejoice at the sufferings of others: for he who is glad at calamity, shall surely be punished. Goodness, mercy, and love, are a sure token of a virtuous mind; and the more virtuous a man is the more kind and tender will he feel towards those that suffer; for true virtue never did, nor never will extinguish tender feelings, neither in this world, nor in the world to come; therefore, if there be virtue in heaven, those that are there must, instead of rejoicing, be sensibly affected, by beholding the sufferings of their friends and fellow creatures. Consequently, their happiness will not be perfect and complete. Christ who was the greatest pattern of goodness and virtue that ever existed on this earth, has set us an example worthy of imitation. When he went to see Mary and Martha, at the death of their brother; when he beheld the Jews with the sisters of Lazarus, weeping and bewailing his death; what was his conduct on this occasion? Did he rejoice over them that suffered pain? Was he glad at beholding their wo? No, verily, his pure soul was filled with sorrow and grief; and his tender and sympathetic feelings, rose, till tears gushed from his weeping eyes. 'Jesus wept.' Can we suppose that he who was perfect without spot and blameless, should thus weep over the sufferings of men in this world, and yet teach his followers to rejoice, or countenance them in rejoicing at the sufferings of their fellow men in another world? The idea is inadmissible. It is needless to enumerate the many passages that command us to pity and relieve, if possible, those that suffer. The book of God abounds with such commands, and every attentive reader must see it. And can we suppose, that those commands to pity and love, will all be done away or reversed in another world? And when men come into the kingdom of love, that they will be transformed into a worse than savage temper? The thought is abhorrent to every conception that we can have of the kingdom of heaven. Those commands to love will never be done away, but will endure through the ceaseless ages of eternity; and love never leads men to rejoice, at the sufferings of others. We have no intimation given in the scriptures, that men will rejoice in heaven at the sufferings of others..... But the contrary is set forth, in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, though some will not allow it to be a parable, but a reality, and that Abraham was in heaven and the rich man in hell; but be that as it may, we find in the friendly intercourse that was carried on between Abraham and the rich man, that when he requested Abraham to send Lazarus to him, with his finger wet with water to cool his tongue in the flame in which he was tormented, Abraham told him that "between us and you there is a great gulf fixed, so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, who would come from thence." So it appears that those who were with Abraham, instead of rejoicing at this man's sufferings rather pitied and commiserated him; and would have gone to his relief, had it not have been for this impassable gulf. If it be true, that men will rejoice in heaven at the sufferings of others, and their happiness enhanced by it, it must be a heaven different from the one that Peter was looking for. He says, "we according to his promise, look for a new heaven, and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." If righteousness dwells in heaven, then those that are there, will not rejoice, nor have their happiness increased, by beholding the sufferings of others. Righteousness, is the same in heaven, as on the earth. God is righteous and will eternally remain so; and his commands to do righteousness, will be of the same duration; and it is not just and right, to rejoice at the sufferings of our fellow creatures in this world, and I cannot think that it will be considered just and right, to rejoice and be glad at their sufferings in another world. We read that there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth; but I do not find that there is, or even will be joy in heaven over even one sinner that repenteth not! If this hypothesis which I am examining, be true, and the happiness of those in heaven will be enhanced by beholding the sufferings of others, then the more there are in torments the greater their happiness will be.— If those that believe in this heart-chilling doctrine, consult their own greatest happiness, they must pray for the damnation of all men except themselves. If there is such a heaven as this, I am confident that no good and virtuous man will ever desire to be admitted into it. But this is a heaven of human invention, and not of God's providing; for the heaven that God has prepared is a place of complete and perfect happiness, where nothing can be seen to mar the joy of the redeemed. For the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together. To see is to enjoy; and if all flesh see and enjoy the glory of God, there will be no objects of misery to enhance the happiness of those in heaven! Indeed, it is impossible for those in heaven to have their happiness enhanced by beholding the misery of their fellow creatures, while they are in the possession of the god-like passion of love. And this they will possess through the wasteless ages of eternity. For love is an emanation from the nature of God, and will endure as long as he exists; and it will pervade the whole empire of God, and every heart will be warmed with this heaven-born principle. Therefore, they cannot rejoice at the sufferings of others; for it is contrary to the nature of love, and the express word of God, to rejoice at calamity! If the scriptures are true, the time will come, when all tears will be wiped from all faces, & there will be no more crying, pain, sickness, sorrows, nor death. If this be true, where will the objects of misery be found, to enhance the happiness of those in heaven? It may truly be said of those who imbibe this sentiment, as Christ said to his disciples at a certain time: "they know not what manner of spirit they are of." God, in the scriptures disapproves, of our rejoicing at the sufferings of others in this world; and it is not reasonable to suppose, that what he has disapproved of in this world, will be approved of in another. The idea, that men will rejoice in another world, at the torment of others, and thereby their happiness will be increased, never came from the God of love, but arose from some other source! It ought therefore to be discarded and sent into eternal oblivion and forgetfulness; and consigned over to the shades of darkness, from whence it came!

COMFORTS OF AGE.

[From the Herald of Salvation.]

No time of life, seems so particularly to need comfort as old age. Its enjoyment of the things of sight and sense, are fast passing away; and a vast untried existence is about to be entered upon.

There are two, and but two sources of real, and substantial comfort left to this period—and these are derived from the retrospect of the past, and the contemplation of the future. Even the comforts derived from these, are extremely different in their nature, as well as proceeding from sources widely differing from each other. The one springs from human actions and designs—the other from the knowledge of the divine purpose and grace.

The comfort derived from the retrospect of life, embraces the consideration of a great variety of particulars. A certain mode of thinking on any given occasion, will be recollected with the greatest pleasure. Perhaps it was an instance of self-collection or presence of mind in some peculiar emergency. It may have been an instance of right and wrong, and on the determination of which a good share of personal reputation was suspended, and where nearly every thing depended upon a right choice. How sweet will be the recollection in such a case—that the mind had been so pruned, and directed, and cultivated, and impressed with maxims of truth and virtue, that a right choice was made. And it may be that general evenness of temper and feeling, which aided a well instructed mind, in determining wisely, and prudently, and virtuously, in all the windings of events, and through all the cross purposes of a life of activity and enterprise.—There can be no doubt, that every action depends on some peculiar temper and state of mind. But while it is highly pleasurable to reflect on the mental exercises which have inspired a virtuous course, it is more immediately comforting to reflect on those actions, which while they have shed a glory over the silver locks of age—have also spread among men, the blessings of benevolence and peace.

This was that species of comfortable retrospect, so feelingly described by Paul—"I have fought a good fight—I have finished my course—I have kept the faith;" and this will be the high privilege of virtuous old age in every region, and in every period of time.

But while the retrospection of a life well spent, imparts a peace which no changes of circumstance can effect, or render nugatory—it is far from being the only comfort left to old age. The certainty of a near approach to that season of life, when the sufferings and the joys of time will become alike the subjects of indifference, is often attended with that kind of illumination which sheds a holy radiance over the land of darkness, and the shadow of death.—This is one of those seasons in which christianity is doubly dear. For by christianity alone, is "life and immortality brought to light." And the grey headed will bear witness, that as the sun of life goes down, and death draws near, that it is then, the gospel doctrine of a future life imparts strength, and fortitude, and resignation,—stays and supports them, and enables them to meet the destiny of all mortality with cheerfulness and joy.

In the midst of pains—they have the assurance that "pain shall cease"—In sorrow, they behold the coming day when "tears shall be wiped from all faces"—In the moment of agony and dissolution—they cry—a few more struggles and afflictions, and all these mortal scenes shall pass away—and in the ardency of hope they exclaim—"I know that my redeemer liveth—and because he lives we shall live also,—and death shall be no more—thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." ## GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

SIN NOT INFINITE.

There are some reasons for the infinity of sin, which have a plausible appearance, but they would not so appear if those reasons were more fully examined. To say that sin is infinite because it is committed against an infinite God, is a plausible argument; but when this is said, we have only made a beginning in the argument; for although God be infinite, and although sin be committed against God, yet man, whose understanding is very limited, can have but limited conceptions of that which is infinite. How small a portion is heard of him, (God) even the thunder of his power no man can understand. Who, by searching, can find out God or the Almighty unto perfection? Certainly no one can do it. The infinite greatness or glory of God is that of which no man can conceive.—The extent of our understandings must be the extent of our sinning power; and as the former is very limited so must the latter be. Hence, though God be infinite, and sin be committed against him by man, yet man's sin in this case is no greater than his views of God are.

The argument is exactly the same in relation to the law of God. This law is said to be infinite. Granting that it is infinite, still how great a portion of this infinite law does man understand? Ans. It is but a very ry small portion of it. That, which he knows, is but as a shadow of the great reality. His knowledge is very limited and finite; so is his sin when he counteracts this law. The greater our knowledge of God and his law, the greater our sin in its violation. Thus gospel sinners are guilty in an higher degree, than the heathen can be; the reason is, they know more or have greater light. To make this still plainer, if possible, we will begin with the human creature, who has no knowledge of God's law, (whether this creature be an infant or an idiot.) We have proved in the treatise on infantile depravity, that such human beings cannot commit sin; that they are without law, and consequently, without transgression. Now we will suppose that a person possessing one degree of knowledge only; his sin (if he transgresses the law) will have one degree of aggravation only; he who has two degrees of knowledge will (in case of delinquency) have two degrees of aggravation, and so on; the sin and aggravation of this person increasing in proportion as his knowledge increases. Now, (according to this rule) we must suppose that a person is possessed of infinite knowledge, where we impute to him infinite sin. But such knowledge is found only with God; of this infinite knowledge the highest angel falls infinitely short.

Thus man's sin cannot, with justice, be called infinite. But here it will be necessary to explain what we must understand by degrees of sin, or what those mean who say it is infinite. Do they mean that it is infinite in magnitude so as to fill immensity? I question whether any stickler for the infinity of sin would be willing to acknowledge this. Do they mean by its infinity that it equals or exceeds the immensity of divine love or grace? I think that they will not contend for this, because where sin has abounded, let it be where it may, or in whomsoever it may, or to whatsoever degree; where sin abounded, grace has much more abounded. Now how can any person say of sin, that it is infinite, when in every place, and in the children of men it is much more exceeded by grace? Do they mean by the infinity of sin, its endless duration? This cannot be supported, because we are expressly informed that sin is to be ended, and transgression finished and everlasting righteousness introduced. Indeed all the declarations of the reconciliation of every creature in heaven and earth, and the genuflection or bending of every knee, and the banishment of sin, pain and sorrows; when there shall be no more sin, sorrow nor crying, and when all things shall become new; I say all these declarations, with a vast variety of others not recited, convince me, and ought, I think, to convince every person, that sin will not be endless in its duration.

Do they mean by the infinity of sin, that he who commits sin, deserves and will be punished with endless misery, making infinity in the case of punishment to consist in infinite duration? I know that I now am speaking of the consequence of sin, and not of sin itself; but they have compelled me to this measure, by bringing punishment infinite or endless in duration, as a proof that sin itself is infinite. This must fall I am well persuaded, with their other refuges. If the doctrine of endless punishment, or that which is infinite in duration be true, there must be some foundation for it, obvious to the understanding and incontrovertible in its testimony. It is a point of doctrine of such importance to our present tranquility, and is so contrary to that from which every creature would desire to be delivered, that a candid examination of it, so far as the present subject renders it necessary, seems to be our duty. Our opponents say, that sin is proved to be infinite, because it is followed by a punishment infinite in duration. I ask, in the first place, whether God ever threatened such a punishment? If he has threatened endless punishment for sin, whether it can be dispensed with consistently with truth? If there be such a positive threatening, the dispensing with which is prohibited by truth, where can grace or the gospel have any seat? If there be such a threatening against sin, and truth holds her ground, will not the consequence be the inevitable, endless misery of all who have sinned? If such be the circumstance attending these queries, and if the result must be the inevitable, certain and endless damnation of all sinners without exception; it is a deception to talk of grace, it is misrepresenting God to talk of his love; it is changing his truth into a lie, to talk of his forgiveness, and it is contradicting our own pretended belief in such a threatening, when we say that we hope in his mercy. I contend, that God never made such a threatening to Adam or any of his posterity, at any time or age of the world. The pretension, that Christ suffered that, which was adequate to the threatened vengeance avails nothing. If there be such a threatening, it was against man as sinful, not against Christ who was innocent? and if endless misery was threatened against Adam if he transgressed, and so against his posterity sinning in him and falling with him in his first transgression; there is no way revealed to us how man can escape endless misery, and the Almighty remain true to his word. Therefore as I believe that God is truth, that all his ways are perfect and that it is he in whom there is not a shadow of change; a being who cannot lie nor deny himself; so it appears that no such threatening was ever made.

That which is termed a threatening, is no threatening as I understand it; it was a pre-monition or warning to Adam not to eat of a certain fruit, the consequence of which would be disagreeable. A father warns his child against the fire; if, says he, you put your hand into the fire you will be burned. This is no threatening. So God says to Adam, if you eat of the tree which I have forbidden, ye shall die; this was no threatening; but the death took place immediately on that very day. This was not the death of the body, nor eternal death or endless misery; but it was the death of guilt, of shame and fear. God did not threaten Adam with guilt and shame, but showed him that they would follow as a consequence of transgression.

The promise immediately made, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, shews that no threatening of eternal death was meant or intended. Here, and at this time, if ever endless misery was to be threatened, we ought to expect it; but so far from it, that instead of the threatening of endless misery, there is the proclamation of eternal peace.—Here was the beginning of sin, and here was the begining of the manifestation of eternal, unchangeable love. True it was, that Adam brought guilt and a train of temporal evils upon himself by his transgression, but not temporal nor eternal death. I find no where in the bible a threatening of endless misery, and if there were, grace or mercy would be rendered impossible, unless God denied himself. I then say, that sin is not proved to be infinite from a punishment infinite in duration, either threatened or inflicted, for no such thing is or can be proved, but the contrary is undeniable.

We grant, notwithstanding, that God threatens man with temporal calamities, such as the destruction of cities, of persons, with drought, famine, pestilence, &c. &c. (which are brought about by natural causes) but never threatened endless misery. Thus we have considered sin and find it not to be infinite in magnitude so as to fill immensity; it does not equal or exceed the immensity of divine grace, for grace superabounds it: It is not infinite by continuing to an endless duration, for it will be finished or destroyed: It is not infinite, by being followed with a punishment infinite in duration.

REMARKS.

Sin, as an infinite will, I doubt not has been so considered from a sense which many have had of the plague of their own hearts and the consequent sense of their great unworthiness; being incomprehensible to themselves, they have called it infinite. Some have inconsiderately termed it infinite from the incalculable evils which have marked its progress in the world, and millions have thought it to be infinite, because they have been taught that sin, the devil and hell, or misery, would remain to an infinite duration.

The Romish Clergy have always preached the infinitude of sin and the consequent infinite duration of its punishment. This policy is apparent, and the effects are notorious. All the world have believed it, and have wondered after this beastly doctrine. Most men seem to be inclined to magnify evil beyond its bounds or proper limits, (for it has bounds set to it) and to reduce goodness and mercy to limits, when it is evident they have none. Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. Sin is not lessened from its just demerit by being considered finite, but appears in all its native deformity and ugliness as an evil exceedingly great and dreadful: but the truth is glorious, that God is above it, does control it, and will, eventually destroy it. This wrath of man shall work his praise, the remainder he will restrain. Good will be brought out of this evil; light out of this darkness; order out of this confusion, and songs of joy and victory from every human tongue will, in God's temple, be sung for redeeming grace.

"YOUNG MEN'S TRACT SOCIETY."

A friend has kindly forwarded to us a sheet of letter paper, on one side of which is printed a "Constitution of a Tract Society, auxiliary to the Young Men's Tract Society of the village of Buffalo." From the appearance of the sheet we conclude it is designed to send forth, as a Circular, to all and singular who can be persuaded to become tributaries to the young men's "Mother Society," in this village.

We have given the reader a description of the external appearance of the aforesaid constitution; and now we shall undertake to set forth the intrinsic, internal and obvious value of it; and its bearing upon matters and things in general.

Who the members of the "Young Men's Tract Society of the village of Buffalo," are, we know not; and therefore we cannot be justly charged with dealing in personalities while writing on the subject. Nor have we ever known that such a society existed, until the "constitution," under examination was put into our hands. Neither do we believe, that a society of that name, has ever been known to the citizens of this village generally. Hence, we have a right to conclude that the pompous display of the "constitution" of an "auxiliary society," is designed to dupe community, by making people at a distance believe that "some great thing" is in operation here, and thereby induce them to become auxiliary to a certain something which exists only in the imagination, or is made up of a very few at most; and is in danger of receiving its death blow from its own obscurity. The fact is, since the Legislature of this state laid their hands on Mr. Yates and his tracts, it has been quite difficult to obtain vent for the simple fabrications which were about to be forced upon us by a tool of the clergy; and therefore it has become necessary to resort to other means to palm them off upon the publick. We do not mean to bestow unqualified censure upon the young gentlemen who have caused the "constitution" to be printed; they have a perfect right to their own opinions, and we have an undoubted right to express ours. In the exercise of this right, we shall briefly notice the more important and interesting parts of the said constitution.

"ARTICLE I. This Society shall be called 'The Auxiliary Tract Society of . . .'; the object of which shall be to promote the interest of Evangelical Religion and sound morality in this vicinity, by the circulation of Religious Tracts; and to aid the American Tract Society, instituted at New-York, in 1825, in extending its operations in destitute parts of the United States, and other countries."

The promotion of Evangelical Religion and sound morality is certainly to be desired above all things; but mankind disagree very much in their opinions of what evangelical religion is. Some suppose it consists in being engaged in begging money to pay for tracts, and to educate "evangelical" ministers, &c.; but an eminent apostle was of the opinion that pure and undefiled religion consisted in visiting the widows and fatherless in their afflictions, &c. Perhaps the young gentlemen are disposed to comply with the apostle's directions, and are about to visit the "widow and fatherless" to obtain a portion of their earnings with which "to aid the American Tract Society." But we can hardly believe that the inspired penman had reference to a tract society when he recorded his opinion of pure and undefiled religion. If we mistake not, there is a wide difference between begging money of the poor to educate indolent priests, and visiting the poor with a view to alleviate their distresses! We have nothing to say against societies, whose object is to help the poor; but it is impossible to find any thing to commend in associations designed to "aid the AMERICAN (a great name by the by) Tract Society!" But we are told that the object of this Society shall be to promote "evangelical religion, and sound morality;" and we are bound to believe such to be the fact until proof to the contrary can be found. This, however, is presented in the 7th article of the "constitution," from which we extract the following: "They shall fill their own vacancies, and enact their own By-Laws; shall encourage the circulation of the American Tract Magazine and the Christian Almanack," &c.

Here we have the "evangelical religion and sound morality" of this society, expressed in language too plain to be misunderstood. What is it? It is not the religion which consists in doing deeds of kindness and mercy to the poor, the suffering widow, the fatherless child, or the lonely orphan; not the religion of God, of Christ, or of the apostles; but that kind of religion which consists in encouraging "the circulation of the American Tract Magazine and the CHRISTIAN ALMANACK!!!" This is religion and sound morality with a vengeance! And do the young men of Buffalo suppose that they will find fools enough in the adjacent towns to render them any great service in imposing this kind of religion upon community? If they do, we are woefully mistaken. Those young gentlemen who know what it is to wield the axe, and hold the plough, will never give their money to aid these dandy speculators. They know better than to stand still and permit the Buffalo Tract Society to cram a christian Almanack down their throats and call it "religion and sound morality!"

But this Christian Almanack deserves a little more attention. The one for 1826, has been noticed by a correspondent, in the 4th vol. of this paper, (and as the sale of the thing was somewhat retarded by an exposure of a certain story therein contained, we suppose the Tract Society intend circulating those remaining on hand,) to which we desire the attention of the reader. The story was related by Dr. Milnor of New-York, and amounts to this:—That some tract pedlar near Philadelphia, threw a tract into a garden, which was picked up by a woman, (who supposed it was brought there by some supernatural means,) and read it, and at length she became greatly alarmed, and at last died in consequence of reading the tract! This foolish tale is to be found in the Christian Almanack, which is to be encouraged by the societies auxiliary to the young men's tract society of Buffalo, the members of which promise to aid the interests of evangelical religion, and sound morality, &c. Now the truth is the narrator of the foolish story, Dr. Milnor, was called, upon to clear his skirts of the charge of lying, but failed to do so; pains were taken to write to Philadelphia to find out whether any such circumstance ever transpired in that vicinity; and after all it turned out to be a palpable FALSEHOOD!

We have neither time nor inclination to enter into particulars; but shall conclude with a few general remarks

Societies whose object it is to do good, are worthy of encouragement; and they will receive the necessary aid from the religious and moral part of community. But those associations which are designed to perpetuate the falling schemes of the day, and extend the circulation of error and falsehood, cannot be discarded too soon. That tract societies of the kind proposed, cannot do good, is as evident as it is that the tracts circulated by such societies, are frequently fictitious, and often false. We could enumerate many which have been issued by the American Tract society, and others of the kind, which are filled with simple stories too evidently "made up of the whole cloth," to be believed, and too palpably false to require a refutation. These things, (for they deserve no better name,) are put into the hands of children, and cannot fail of implanting in their tender minds the most pernicious ideas imaginable. Let such as make those tracts confine themselves to facts, and we have nothing to say against them; but so long as they persist in palming off upon community, fiction, under the garb of "evangelical religion and sound morality," so long we feel it to be a duty to raise our hands against these proceedings.

Another thing which deserves animadversion, is the means resorted to, to circulate these tracts. The poor and destitute are often laid under contribution to defray the expenses of such societies, which are sometimes extravagant and therefore unwarrantable. If those who make these tracts are influenced by good motives, let them expend their 'heaps of shining dust' in paying the expense. Dr. Spring, of New York, we are informed, although he is paid about $3,500 a year for preaching, refused to pay $10 which his aged mother had subscribed for some purpose of this kind..... And we learn from observation and facts, that those who move the great machine of orthodoxy, are the last to give of their substance to pay the expense..... Take this Buffalo society for an example. It is instituted to aid the National Society and receives in return tracts by the quantity. But from what source does this society obtain the means of aiding the great National establishment! Ans. From its auxiliaries. This we learn from the 3d Art. of the Constitution. It says; "One fourth part of the annual receipts of the society (i. e. the auxiliary) deducting the necessary incidental expenses, shall be transmitted to the treasury of the young men's tract society of the village of Buffalo."—Thus, then, the auxiliary societies bear the burthen, and the National society will (probably) take care of the cash!

We conclude, by requesting all our young friends who are resorted to for aid in buying christian almanacks, &c. for their neighbors, to save their money to purchase useful books for themselves; or if they have any to spare, to expend it in doing good to suffering widows and fatherless children. E.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

[From the Vermont Chronicle.]

"She has finished her education," said my friend. Finished her education! said I—just as though a young lady's education was a stocking, or rather a bonnet, and now it was to be placed in the band-box, to be displayed to visitors, and worn only on set occasions. Mr. Editor, I protest against the doing up, and finishing off a young lady's education with her teens—just at that time, when she begins, if she ever does begin, to think. A young man has just acquired at one-and-twenty, the elements of education, and is prepared to study advantageously according to his own discretion; but a young lady has done—finished—the circle of her sciences is complete; and she is ready for any station in life, that may be thrown in her way. Now, why, in the name of common sense, may not a woman think; and if she may think; why may she not study, and acquire profitable food for thought.

There is a lady, of whom I have some knowledge, that "finished her education," by leaving peculiarly good advantages at an early age.—She is now a wife and mother of six children. She plays well upon the Piano—sings sweetly—dances elegantly—is very polite, &c. &c. &c. but her husband must, and actually does, put all the children to bed, and takes the care of them through the night; and as for her table—the bread is execrable, to one that has ever visited his grand-mother's pantry; and her coffee—O! her coffee! it would cost her head, if the very scent of it reached the Grand Turk's palace—and yet the lady has a "finished education."

PARABLE AGAINST PERSECUTION.

1. "And it came to pass, after these things, that Abraham sat in the door of his tent, about the going down of the sun.

2. And behold, a man bent with age, coming from the way of the wilderness, leaning on a staff.

3. And Abraham rose and met him, and said unto him, Turn in, I pray thee, and wash thy feet, and tarry all night; and thou shalt arise early in the morning, and go on thy way.

4. And the man said nay, for I will abide under this tree.

5. But Abraham pressed him greatly; so he went into the tent; and Abraham baked unleavened bread and they did eat.

6. And Abraham saw the man blessed not God, he said unto him, wherefore dost thou not worship the most high God, Creator of heaven and earth?

7. And the man answered and said, I do not worship thy God, neither do I call upon his name: for I have made to myself a god which abideth always in my house, and provideth me with all things.

8. And Abraham's zeal was kindled against the man, and he rose, and fell upon him, and drove him forth with blows into the wilderness.

9. And God called unto Abraham, saying, Abraham where is the stranger?

10. And Abraham answered and said, Lord, he would not worship thee, neither would he call upon thy name, therefore have I driven him out from before my face into the wilderness.

11. And God said, have I borne with him these hundred and ninety and eight years, and nourished him, and clothed him, notwithstanding his rebellion against me, and couldst not thou, who art thyself a sinner, bear with him one night?

12. And Abraham said, Let not the anger of my Lord wax hot against his servant; lo, I have sinned, forgive me, I pray thee.

13. And Abraham arose, and went forth into the wilderness, and diligently sought for the man, and found him, and returned with him to the tent; and when he had entreated him kindly, he sent him away on the morrow with gifts.

14. And God spake again unto Abraham, saying, For this thy sin thy seed shall be afflicted four hundred years in a strange land.

15. But for thy repentance, will I deliver them, and they shall come forth with power, and with gladness of heart, and with much substance."—Dr. Franklin.

The baptismal admonition of the Hindoo, is as impressive to the bystanders, as it is beautiful. "Little babe...thou entered the world weeping, while all around you smiled; contrive so to live that you may depart in smiles, while all around you weep."

PROSCRIBED PATRIOTS.

An orthodox Deacon gave it as his opinion that neither Washington nor Franklin were saved! I have no evidence, said this staunch admirer of John Calvin, that either of them ever experienced the special irresistible grace of God!! Probably this Deacon was not alone in this orthodox opinion. These illustrious men, if alive, would set their faces against modern crusaders. If Washington and Franklin were sent to Tartarus, who then can be saved? Our Calvinistic brethren are requested to inform us of the fate of lords North, Howe, and Cornwallis? The latter lord may claim some kindred with our crusaders as he was a friend of Missions. He led an army of red coated whiskered Missionaries into Hindostan!!

PRACTICAL.

[From the Wilmington Liberalist.]

PRAYER.

Prayer, as an act of spiritual devotion, being as it were, a personal communication between man and his Maker, it becomes highly necessary, that it be founded in correct principles, offered with pure motives, and accompanied with right views respecting ourselves, and that Exalted Being, to whom our aspirations are addressed. Prayer, to be acceptable to him, must be the language of the heart; language of honest sincerity. All other, however elaborate, however zealous, however excellent, exalted and sublime, in manner, form, idea or style, is but a show of words, a mere mummerly, a solemn mockery, a round of "lip service," in which the heart has no concern, and is at best, but an insult to the Divine Being. Prayer may be offered to God from honest intentions and good motives, and yet, having nothing else to recommend it, be justly considered as a mere visionary phantom, an idle dream, a combination of nonsense. It therefore becomes absolutely necessary that prayer be an exercise, not only of the heart, but of the understanding also. That a man should not only be honest and sincere in his devotions, but that he should also mould his feelings and desires, into such a form, as to correspond with the attributes of his Heavenly Parent. Thus, in praying, he should hold up holy hands, without wrath and doubting. He should pray in faith; for "whatsoever is not of faith, is sin." He should pray and give thanks to God, for all; for he will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth." And finally, to set aside all exclusively selfish feelings, and to express his confidence in God, to prevent being biased by notions repugnant to the character and disposition of Deity, or from manifesting hostility to his government, there should run through the whole exercise, not in word only, but in deed and truth, a spirit like that, which dictated the pious ejaculation of the soul, "nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done."—Thus expressing, and not only expressing, but feeling that confidence in him, that will enable the soul to acquiesce heartily in his government and to rejoice in his goodness, under all the dispensations of his providence.

This exercise flows from a sincere heart and a rational understanding. It is regulated by Love to God, as a being of Power, Wisdom, and Goodness; Benevolence and Love to all mankind, and a consistent desire for our own interest and happiness. The confidence and reliance, we thus place in God, the filial affection we thus exercise towards him, we never could extend to an avowed enemy nor a tyrant. As far then, as it respects ourselves, we love him, worship him, and trust him, as our friend and benefactor; and as we are bound to love others as we do ourselves, as we are bound, and if benevolent, feel inclined to render others as happy as ourselves, and as God is the common parent of all others, as well as of ourselves, we have no right to entrust them in the hands of an enemy nor a tyrant; and when we mention them in our prayers and thanksgiving, should speak of them, as we do of ourselves; as the subjects of his love and favor. This, and only this, can be the prayer of faith, as it respects others; for we are commanded to "pray and give thanks for all;" we are commanded to "lift up holy hands," which we cannot do without love to God and all mankind, for all of them we should pray, and our prayers thus offered to God, must or should be "without wrath and doubting," which cannot be done, unless we possess, and believe that God possesses, love and friendship for all.—For, we always doubt the favour and protection of an enemy or tyrant. Prayer, different from this, is not of faith; and, "whatsoever is not of faith is sin." Hence the necessity of prayer being offered from the understanding as well as from sincerity.

Prayer should ever correspond, in all cases, with the will of God, as a being of Infinite goodness; from a firm conviction that he is infinitely better qualified to regulate, rule and govern, in accordance with that immaculate and glorious standard, than we are to dictate to him. The only right we have to pray for the salvation of all men, is because he has declared such to be his will. And, as he "is not willing any should perish," we cannot, without an affront to the dignity of his throne and sceptre, suggest in our prayers, the tho't that one will be damned. For, in so doing, we virtually declare, either, that he is an enemy or a tyrant, while his word and his works declare him good, merciful and friendly to all, or, secondly, that he has not the power to do all his pleasure, or, thirdly, that he will be so far overcome by the opposition of evil, as to permit that to take place, which he is unwilling should be. Either of these, is an indignity which no true worshipper should ever permit himself to offer. Yet, a vast proportion of the prayers, publicly, and vocally offered up, are of this description. We undertake to tell him that, notwithstanding his will for the salvation of all, his unwillingness for the loss of any, his declaration that his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure; we are certain some, we are fearful most will be lost. We go into a long narrative of circumstances; we inform him of the sinfulness and depravity of man;—we express a thousand fears as to the future safety of our fellow mortals; lest he might be forgetful of his promises, we remind him of them; and we inform him, that although many have been, and probably many more will be lost, notwithstanding all the pains he has taken to prevent it, in conformity with his avowed will, that all shall be saved, yet we will undertake to prevent the Devil from having the whole, en masse, provided he will come into our system of arrangements, open the purse-strings of men, that we may have wherewithal to carry on the work, and their hearts to believe our creeds. And, in addition to all this, we undertake to indicate to him, the rules by which he should regulate the affairs of nature and providence: when he had ought to give us rain, when sunshine, &c. &c. Thus, in all the concerns of Deity, Spiritual, Moral and Physical, there is no one, that escapes the interference of us, frail, mortal, impotent, though meddlesome creatures. We use all our powers of persuasion, entreaty, passion, zeal, rhetoric, and barter, to induce Him, whose will and pleasure, constitute the paramount law of the Universe, whose eternal purpose is the grand focus, to which all things tend, whose power, imparts its eternal impetus to the vast machine, whose wisdom regulates all its parts, whose goodness is the immovable and invariable centre, around which the whole revolves with uninterrupted order and harmony; to change his principles of government, to renounce his own plan, to discard his own purposes, and to render obedience to our prescriptions; because, forsooth, he being in heaven, and we, on earth, though he may govern well enough there, we best understand that mode, by which he can, control the affairs of men. Preposterous?..... With ignorance, it is folly; with knowledge, blasphemy! All we have to do, is to rely on him with confidence, submit to him with patience—ask of him what we believe he can and will do, consistently with his attributes as God—give him thanks for what he does—improve all events in a proper and becoming manner, and labor to promote his glory, by loving him, obeying his commands, and doing good to ourselves and others. An honest expression of such feelings is prayer. With them, we may “lift up holy hands, without wrath and doubting.” Without them we insult God with an empty and spurious form, and sink the dignity of the Christian Religion, to a level with gross and sordid idolatry.

GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

DESIGN OF ATONEMENT.

This great doctrine of grace ought to be familiar to all persons, in order to a right understanding of the sacred writings. True it is, that the scriptures only, teach the doctrine of atonement, and hence it is, that we should naturally conclude, that it was understood by all, who were acquainted with them. But the different notions, which for ages, have been entertained of atonement, ought to convince us, that the scriptures are misunderstood in this instance; because essentially different opinions cannot all be right. As we have, in our hands, many excellent works on this subject, I shall study brevity with perspicuity or plainness.—We have, in a former number, showed, that man is a transgressor of the law of God; that his guilt and shame, and self-condemnation, together with a train of natural evils attend him as the wages or consequence of sin; yet that his sin is infinite in no sense, owing to the limited knowledge, which man has of God and his law. We hence, argue, that sin, which is finite or limited, requires, not an infinite atonement; that an infinite atonement could be performed by none but God himself; and that, as man's sin is finite, such an atonement could not respect man but must respect God. This would be saying that God, by atonement, satisfied himself. This is the substance of the generally received idea of atonement. It is, on this plan, believed that Christ is God, and that as God and man, he purchased us of God; that he merited of God eternal life for man; that he bought us of God with a price; that he pacified the divine anger; procured the divine favor for us, and satisfied divine justice in our behalf. This scheme of atonement has not the stamp of reason; for how can any being merit, purchase, buy or procure any thing of himself? If Christ, then, be God, he has not merited any thing of God in relation to man, because this would be meriting of himself. If Christ was a mere creature there could be no merit from God in his obedience or sufferings, because he could do no more than the law required of him; and there could be no work of supererogation to be placed to our account: besides, how could a creature, who is finite, merit any thing of God, who is infinite? I think, then, that the atonement, under the notion of meriting, buying, purchasing or procuring grace, or favors, or good-will from God to man, is absurd and inconsistent. Many expressions seem to prove the notion of merit, &c. and, if taken literally, would prove it; but such a literal explanation would contradict the whole scriptures. It would, likewise, contradict the design of atonement, which was not to purchase or procure any favors from God, which he had not before designed, or which he could not consistently bestow; for all the good that man ever can or will enjoy was designed for him before time began, and God had the right and could consistently pardon his sinful creatures. This makes it evident that to purchase or to merit those blessings, was unnecessary. Self-moving, never-beginning and unchangeable love had determined the pardon and salvation of man, and that Christ should be the medium of its conveyance to man. God purposed this in himself before the world began. This was his will, decree or determination; and such a decree or determination must be consistent with God to execute, or he never would have decreed it. Thus meriting, purchasing or procuring grace or favor from God to man is not only inconsistent but unnecessary, consequently no part of atonement was purchased by Jesus Christ. It has been supposed that the truth of God's threatening would be impeached if he had pardoned sinners without an equivalent; but we have proved in a former no. that God never threatened any sinner, in any age of the world with endless misery; for had this been made, God has revealed to us no way how it could be avoided without the sacrifice of truth. Besides, it is evident that all the punishment ever threatened against sinners is and will be executed; also men will never be rewarded according to their works. Hence, then, the design of atonement was not to deliver men from the punishment to which they were entitled from sins, which they had committed or should hereafter commit; but its design was to free or deliver men from sin itself, and then they would be free from misery of course. If, then, we can find how sin can be destroyed in man, we shall find that in which atonement does consist. Atonement then, consists in, and is designed for the reconciliation of man; of sinful, ignorant and prejudiced man, to God his maker; but it never was any part of its design to reconcile God to man or to procure, merit or purchase any favor from God to man; because all the good that man needs or possibly can enjoy, both in time and eternity, was designed for him, and secured to him in the purpose and will of God from all eternity; and the last great expression of this love of God to us, was the sending of his Son into the world to convince us of the above truth, and to reclaim, reconcile or redeem us from all iniquity, that we might enjoy it. But how, or by what means does and will Christ reconcile men to God?

Ans. The work of reconciliation or atonement has always been progressive. It depends upon and is affected by the divine spirit calling men to consider and attend to the concerns of their peace. Light and knowledge are the most essential to this reconciliation. These Christ continues to give. He is the light of the world and he came to give light to men; to reveal more fully his father's character, his love and good will to men; to reveal his intentions of mercy, and that he sent his anointed Son, not to condemn but to save the world. Ignorance and darkness of mind are the great sources of sin. Ignorance of God's true character is the reason why men hate him. Believing him an enemy men dread him as a tyrant; flee from him, are afraid of him; but when men have just conceptions of God, they love him, obey him with pleasure and delight and rejoice with unspeakable joy. Thus Christ makes atonement by revealing truth to man, by which he reconciles him to God and to his own will in all things. It is the knowledge of the truth, which makes men free indeed; this knowledge is eternal life. God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shineth in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Man only being unreconciled by darkness and ignorance needs reconciliation; hence the work of atonement respects man; by it he is brought to see that God is a friend to all his creatures, and that nothing prevents the happiness of man but his own unreconciled temper and disposition. As to the universality of this reconciliation or atonement we need only say, that Christ did undertake this work, and we are assured that he will accomplish it. 'He will reconcile all things to himself in heaven and earth.' 'To him every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that he is Lord to the glory of God the Father.' Never will Christ's work as mediator cease till this great object be completed; then all men will be in subjection to the Father and God, all in all.

REMARKS.

We have here had a view of atonement, differing greatly from the generally received opinion, but yet, as I conceive, the only rational and scriptural scheme. If God by atonement (as is generally taught) did satisfy himself or paid his own debt, although the thing be absurd, yet it argues that God, all things considered, would be eventually a friend rather than an enemy. But the absurdity of such an idea is too great for men of sense to imbibe, or for men of candor and penetration to propagate. There is infinitely more consistency in supposing that God always was the friend of man and could consistently save him on that foundation; than to believe him to have been the enemy of man, and, in order to save him pleased himself, or was pleased by some other being. The former of these cases is worthy of a God of infinite perfection; the latter is unworthy of the name and standing of an earthly parent. Every system which supposes that God receives the atonement; or in other words, supposes that God is influenced by it, makes him a changeable being.

The old systems of atonement have been extolled by their advocates as comprehending and manifesting to the view of men and angels the highest wisdom of the Deity, far surpassing that which is discovered in creation; yet though the economy of grace displays the manifold wisdom of God, and is that which the angels desire to look into, yet its wisdom does not consist in God's changeability in one case, nor of pleasing himself in the other. This is not the wisdom of God in the Gospel. His wisdom, in the merciful plan of our redemption, is far superior to any idea to which the current system of atonement can pretend. Wisdom appears in operating on the most suitable and important particulars to effect its object. The particular object of wisdom respecting the atonement is man's salvation, consistently with the harmony of all the divine attributes, and we have seen that the reconciliation of man is that which wisdom has chosen to effect this salvation. Although this process may appear to be simple and to be destitute of those pretended mysteries of the current systems, yet it certainly is that without which man never could be happy; and with it he never can be miserable. If then, God can be just in saving his reconciled creatures; and if creatures by reconciliation must be happy, then wisdom must appear to be great, because God is glorified and sinners are saved; and the more plain and easy this scheme is to be understood, the brighter does wisdom appear.

This subject likewise, will lead us to a consideration and right understanding of the death of Jesus, and of the blood of Jesus by which we are said to be cleansed from sin. St. John says, that the blood of Jesus Christ his (God's) son, cleanseth us from all sin. This does not mean the literal blood of Christ, but it means his work as a refiner, purifier and sanctifier of his people, by which they are cleansed and saved from sin, of which work his literal blood seems to be a seal or assurance. The death of Jesus, likewise, in connection with his blood, was a like assurance of our cleansing, and the death of the legal dispensation, by or in consequence of which the gospel kingdom was to be introduced. Neither his death nor his blood are to be considered as the atonement; but they are assurances to us of the greatness of his love, by which reconciliation or atonement is effected. Thus we read, "he that spared not his own son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things." His death was an expression of that love which would give us all things.

This subject, likewise will help us to investigate, whether the current notion of an infinite atonement be correct. We readily grant, that the grace, by which reconciliation or atonement is effected, passes all understanding; it is the love of God through Christ, which passeth knowledge. I think that love has neither bound nor limit; consequently may be considered as infinite. But neither the love of God nor of Christ is the atonement; but the atonement is the effect of this love. This effects reconciliation in finite man, and this reconciliation is atonement. Now shall we say that this reconciliation is infinite? If it be affirmed the affirmation must be explained. If it be said that the happy consequences of reconciliation will continue to an endless duration, and will therefore be infinite in that sense we have no objection; but then we must remember that this is fixed on the consequences of reconciliation, viz. joy and complete felicity. But, moreover, we will grant that reconciliation itself must be endless, in order that its consequences should be so; consequently, reconciliation or atonement is infinite as to duration.

But that sin is infinite in magnitude and requires an atonement infinite in the same sense, (by which we mean that God is pacified,) we reject as utterly unreasonable and inconsistent.

REVIVALS.

The season for the rage of these annual epidemics is now fairly passed for this winter, and our village has escaped the contagion. The "orthodox" pretence that they are "especial visitations of the spirit," was never more fully proven false than in this place the last season. Every exertion has been made that priestcraft could invent, to bring about one, but all to no possible end:—the sleighing has been good, through the winter, and people could therefore better employ their time in business and pleasure, than in listening to the ranting jargon of night meetings! Such is the simple fact, whatever may be said to the contrary, that revivals cannot reign when people can find other employment for the mind. Yet they are the work of God—so is any other animal excitement, for these are no more. The Calvinists of Buffalo have not been wanting in their endeavours after a revival, and their priest very recently, at a night meeting, stated to his hearers that "the work had begun, and it was their duty to go from house to house and aid it." It has, however, left off again—or rather there has been no such thing, and we are yet uncured by the ravages of such a public disturbance. The gentleman who recommended, "as a duty," this same going from house to house, has had so much of it himself that it no longer appears "a duty," for himself, though he still urges it upon others. This song of "duty" has been so often sung for the vilest of purposes, by man, in his various stations, that it has lost its charms; and I can now lay the same claim to it in penning this, that would once have been awarded only to those who should oppose my sentiments.

Yet the fact is not to be disguised that a revival would present many pleasing features to the Calvinists here at the present moment. They have borrowed money to a very large amount, to build a "meeting house," and the debt must be paid. The house is nearly completed—the sum due is large,—and certain individuals are holden for the amount. Now the sale of the "slips" in this same "meeting house" must soon take place, and on the amount thus realized dependence is placed for the liquidation of the debt. These "slips" would, under the influence of a highly excited state of feeling, produce, probably, some three or four thousand dollars more, than when the people are fairly possessed of the reason their Maker has bestowed on them. A revival therefore at this time would be, I suppose, worth about four thousand dollars to the Calvinists of Buffalo; nor can I see that it would be a matter of much consequence as touching the subject of this same money, whether it should be the work of God or of man. Either would produce the four thousand dollars worth of the most acceptable piety.

AN ORTHODOX PICTURE.

Amongst the thousand expedients to which the advocates of endless misery have resorted to sustain their sinking cause, there is one, which from its novelty, is entitled to attention. We have now before us an ORTHOX PICTURE, which seems to be the last shift of limitarianism. It is entitled "A Miniature of the world in the 19th Century," and was drawn, engraved and published in Hartford, Conn. by J. W. Barker.

Although there is something like originality about it, yet it is altogether the most palpable plagiarism that has ever come to our knowledge. It purports to have been "INVENTED, drawn and engraved," by the above mentioned Mr. J. W. Barker; but the fact is, it was unquestionably invented by popish priests, some hundred years before the said J. W. Barker came into this "breathing world."

Our limits do not admit of entering into all the particulars of the picture, but we shall notice some of its excellencies, and point out a few of its defects. So far as respects its execution, he bestow unequalled praise. The artist seems to have followed the copy to a hair. The picture is truly a masterly imitation of an orthodox sermon, and no doubt will meet with a ready sale among those of a certain class, who hold to the inspiration of the New England Primer, and Assembly's Catechism. This said, we shall now enter into some of the particulars.

The most prominent personage presented to the eye is a PRIEST, apparently about six feet high, standing within about two inches of the brink of hell, and like a guide board pointing the way to a New Jerusalem, but showing no inclination to go himself. Although he is represented in the attitude of speaking, and as having just uttered the words, "seek your treasures above," yet he seems to gaze intently upon a little "shining dust" after which others are scrambling a little to his left. The representation is admirable, and but one improvement can be suggested; which is to add to the words which are represented as issuing from his mouth, the following, "a call! A CALL!! with $3,500 a year!!"

Some twenty men and women, and one little child, are represented as travelling in the straight and narrow way; out of which five or six are turning back, which number, when compared with the multitude below, is a very fair exhibition of orthodoxy. We should judge that about one out of twenty, are travelling the road to heaven, which leaves nineteen twentieths for the devil! In this the artist has immortalized himself! and what strikes us as peculiarly appropriate, there is not a single preacher of damnation to be found in the way to heaven!

The eye is next attracted by a group in front, on the brink of the precipice, who are busily employed in scraping together "riches of the world." Here is evidently a defect in the execution, and there are some reasons for believing that the artist designed to have the matter somewhat obscure. The costume of those who are picking up the dollars, is by no means appropriate. They should have been distinguished by clerical robes; and "salvation inscribed on every dollar." But as it is, there is no difficulty in coming at a correct understanding of the design. Any one who has ever seen the picture, will at once discover, that the chest and bags guarded by a miserly looking old fellow at the right hand of the group, represent what is blasphemously termed, the "Lord's Treasury," under the protection of the genius of Tract and Rag-bag societies! The young man standing the fourth from the right hand of the group, a little to the left of the Treasury, who is represented leaning over a spade, we conclude is the representation of some one who has been persuaded to work in a "Missionary Field" to obtain cash to educate "poor and pious" young men for the ministry of unreconciliation. The man on the left hand, and immediately on the verge of hell, who is about to commit suicide, represents some poor wretch who is led to despair by the preaching of eternal wrath.

On the right hand in one corner, we notice a group of persons, one trusting in "human merit," another saying "punishment inconsistent with mercy," and a third proclaiming "liberality of sentiment." The first we conclude, represents our over righteous brethren of the limitarian faith; "who trust in themselves that they are righteous and despise others;"—the second is evidently one of those consummate deceivers who are known to slander universalists by saying that we hold to no punishment for sin; and the third, is unquestionably designed to represent one of those who preach to please the people, regardless of any principles whatever.

The inattention of mankind to the thunders of eternal wrath, is seen in the peculiar indifference of the main group, which argues the impropriety of preaching a mass of absurdities repugnant to reason and common sense. The picture exhibits in a very forcible manner, the inefficacy of orthodoxy; and is calculated to excite an abhorrence of those abominable errors which has been so long propagated in our world.

We doubt not that the picture meets with approbation from many of those whose interest it is to keep the minds of mankind in bondage. But to the intelligent mind it is disgusting. It may be said that we ridicule the subject; and if there be any truth in the charge, we have an excuse in the folly of the thing itself, and the blasphemous impiety of those who sent it forth into the world. It would be a hard matter indeed to refute a picture with argument! Religion and honesty we venerate; but craft and deception we despise: And a picture of hell and destruction, as it has existed in the imaginations of mankind, is as ridiculous as the attempt to sell horn gun flints, basswood cucumber seeds and wooden nutmegs! It is not religion, therefore, that we expose to contempt and ridicule, but hypocrisy and deception. If then, any are disposed to censure us for laying violent hands on an orthodox PICTURE, let them remember that we are not the aggressors. We conclude, by advising our limitarian brethren not to imitate the Catholics too much, but to appeal to the reason, rather than the fancy of mankind to sustain their darling theories. E.

THE HOLY BIBLE.

If right we read, nor prejudice the mind,
The Bible is the text-book of mankind.

I look upon the Bible as the oldest and best of books. The history of creation is said by Strabo, to have been handed down to the Egyptians by a Chaldean shepherd; and its superiority to all other books is proven by the one important circumstance, of its influence in civilizing mankind. Its doctrines are superior to those of the Mahometan Koran, and of the Talmud of the Rabbis. The Bible inculcates universal charity, which word signifies in the original, love. To say nothing of the glorious principle of love, the laws which it inculcates are at the same time the most lenient and powerful. Human laws are founded upon them, but they are like the rays of light compared with the sources from whence they spring.... On the sacred page of the Bible we find woman elevated to her proper dignity, but among those nations where it is not read, woman is the drudge of the Sultan and the Caliph. The light of learning and wisdom flourishes where the Bible is found—but at its boundary commences the night of darkness and superstition. It has illuminated the world of literature and science, and cast a halo of glory around the atmosphere of intellect. It smiles on the calm and sunny scenes of life, and gilds the evening skies of the faithful in the dark hour of death. What the compass is to the mariner, the Bible is to the world. It teaches the peasant in the tilling of the field. It proposes reward to virtue, and punishment to vice. It interests equally the brilliant intellect and the humble capacity. All that is good, grand and sublime is contained within it. Many cannot relish it, because their taste is perverted; and many reject it from prejudice. To understand the Bible is at once to be introduced into a high source of enjoyment—the highest source on earth. When I hear a man exclaim against the Bible, I cannot refrain from taxing his mind with ignorance.

If you are a literary character and wish to behold elegance, perspicuity and taste, turn over the leaves of the sacred book. Are you pleased with poetry? you have at once an inexhaustible fountain. You have beautiful scenery, sparkling imagery, and ideas clothed in sublimity of language. It contains numerous specimens of angelic lyre, and I doubt whether there is such a field for the poet in the world. The poet who draws his scenes from the Bible never can fail to please—his writings are always new. Are you pleased with the thunders of eloquence? Here is another inexhaustible source. Some passages of scripture are irresistible. What can be more grand and sublime than David's description of the appearance of the Most High. "He bowed the heavens also, and came down, and darkness was under his feet; he rode upon a cherubim, and did fly, and was seen upon the wings of the wind." Do you ask for more such passages? I could quote a volume, but let the description which the prophet Habakkuk gives of the grandeur of God, suffice. "Before him went the pestilence, and burning coals went forth at his feet: he stood, and measured the earth; he beheld, and drove asunder the nations: the everlasting mountains were scattered: the perpetual hills did bow; His ways are everlasting." It was such eloquence that made Felix tremble on his throne. But poetry and eloquence are not the only beauties of the Bible. We there find sound science and philosophy. We there read of chemistry, and of an experiment which dissolved gold and rendered it portable. Aqua Regia will dissolve gold; but to drink it is fatal. History is complete. There we have the biography of many great and learned men. But it is a vain endeavor to attempt scanning the whole.

The history is, in the Bible, of him who groaned on Calvary. From that sacred summit a flood of light broke forth upon the world. It was the dawn of redemption! Superstition fled affrighted before the glorious appearance of Christianity, and the church of the living God arose on the ruins of the Heathen altar. the automaton of Pagan idolatry tumbled to the dust, and the false deities perished on Olympus. That glorious gospel which effected this great work is contained within the Bible. Like the rainbow which is hung out in the heavens, it was sent as a token that God would be mindful of us. Glorious token! I rejoice when I read it, and I would recommend it to all my fellow travellers to the grave. The waves of time are rolling on to sweep us away and as we pass through the dark vale of death the light of Calvary will illuminate our path to the superb palaces of God. Darkness and death are horrific to the lonely mind, but the Bible will overcome these terrors, and infuse a calm serenity in the darkest hour of existence.

MILFORD BARD.

ORIGINAL LETTER OF DR. FRANKLIN.

The following is an extract of an original letter from Dr. Franklin, to a minister of a church in the south part of New Jersey, which has recently been discovered among some old family papers. It is a composition perfectly in the manner and spirit of that great and worthy man.

Philadelphia, June 6, 1753.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter of the 3d inst. and am glad to hear that you increase in strength. I hope you will continue mending, until you recover your former strength and firmness. Let me know whether you still use the cold bath, and what effect it has.

As to the kindness you mention, I wish it could have been of more serious service to you; but if it had, the only thanks I should desire, are, that you would always be ready to serve any other person who may need your assistance, and so let good offices go round; for mankind are all of a family. For my own part when I am employed in serving others, I do not look upon myself as conferring favors, but as paying debts. In my travels, and since my settlement, I have received much kindness from men, to whom I shall never have an opportunity of making the least direct return;—

and numberless mercies from God, who is infinitely above being benefited by our services. These kindnesses from men I can, therefore, only return to their fellow-men; and I can only shew my gratitude to God by a readiness to help his other children, and my brethren; for I do not think that thanks and compliments, though repeated weekly, can discharge our real obligations to each other, and much less to our Creator.

You will see, in this, my notion of good works, that I am far from expecting to merit heaven by them. By heaven we understand a state of happiness, infinite in degree, and eternal in duration. I can do nothing to deserve such a reward. He that, for giving a draught of water to a thirsty person, should expect to be paid with a good plantation, would be modest in his demands, compared with those who think they deserve heaven for the little good they do on earth. Even the mixed imperfect pleasures we enjoy in this world, are rather from God's goodness than our merit; how much more so the happiness of heaven? For my part, I have not the vanity to think I deserve it, the folly to expect it, or the ambition to desire it; but content myself in submitting to the disposal of that God who made me, who has hitherto preserved and blessed me, and in whose fatherly goodness I may well confide, that he never will make me miserable, and that the afflictions I may at any time suffer, may tend to my benefit.

The faith you mention has doubtless its use in the world; but I wish it were more productive of good works than I have generally seen it. I mean real good works; works of kindness, charity, mercy, and public spirit; not holy-day keeping, sermon hearing or reading, performing church ceremonies, or making long prayers, filled with flatteries and compliments, despised even by wise men, and much less capable of pleasing the Deity.

The worship of God is a duty; the hearing and reading may be useful; but if men rest in hearing and praying, as too many do, it is as if the tree should value itself on being watered, and putting forth leaves, though it never produced any fruit.

Your good master thought much less of these outward appearances than many of his modern disciples. He preferred the doers of the word to the hearers: the son that seemingly refused to obey his father, and yet performed his commands, to him that professed his readiness, but neglected the work, the heretical but charitable samaritan to the uncharitable but orthodox priest and sanctified Levite. And those who gave food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, and raiment to the naked, entertainment to the stranger, and relief to the sick, and although they never heard of his name, he declares shall in the last day be accepted; when those who cry Lord! Lord! who value themselves on their faith, though great enough to perform miracles, but have neglected good works, shall be rejected. He professed that he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance, which implied his modest opinion, that there were some in his time so good that they need not hear even him for improvement. But now-a-days we have scarcely a little parson, that does not think it the duty of every man within his reach to sit under his petty ministration, and whoever omits this offends God. I wish to such more humility, and to you health and firmness.

Being your friend and servant,

B. FRANKLIN.

NICODEMUS,

OR, DEVOTEDNESS TO POPULARITY.

We have not much account of Nicodemus in the Scriptures; but from the few incidental notices there given of him, we learn that he was one of the great men of his day, a ruler of the Jews, a regular professor of the popular religion, and had the honor of sitting in the Council with other Pharisees of note and the chief priests. Of course, this great and honorable man enjoyed the support and superstitious veneration of the whole body of professors of regular religious standing throughout the nation, a gratification the exquisiteness of which can be realized only by those who have enjoyed the like. And his professions and honorable station gave him also the enviable right of wearing publicly the holy phylacteries of the Pharisees, written all over with passages of the law; and of being addressed by the graciously elating title of "Rabbi, Rabbi," wherever he went.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

Sir Isaac Newton lost the use of his intellects before his animal frame was arrested by the hand of death. So it is said of a Mr. Swissot, that he often wept because he was not able to understand the book which he had written in his younger days. Cornivus, an excellent orator in the Augustan age, became so forgetful as not even to know his own name. Simon Tournay in 1201, after he had outdone all at Oxford for learning, at last grew such an idiot as not to know one letter from another, or one thing that he had ever done.

POPERY AMONG COLORED PEOPLE.

A colored Preacher in New Jersey, while giving directions to his congregation how to behave in meeting, expressed himself as follows: "He that ministereth unto you from this place (the pulpit) is the angel of God, sent from heaven to you, to administer the word of God or of life." He also charged them never to go out of church before they received the benediction, for said he, "that is God's blessing, and if you go before it is pronounced, you go without the blessing of God."

THE TEAR OF GRATITUDE.

*There is a gem more pearly bright,
More dear to mercy's eye,
Than Love's sweet star, whose mellow light,
First cheers the evening sky:
A liquid pearl that glitters where,
No sorrows now intrude;
A richer gem than monarchs wear;
The tear of gratitude!*

*But ne'er shall narrow love of self,
Invite this tribute forth;
Nor can the sordid slave of pelf,
Appreciate its worth:
But ye who soothe the widow's woe,
And give the orphan food;
For you the liquid pearl shall flow,
The tear of gratitude!*

*Ye who but slake an infant's thirst;
In heavenly-mercy's name;
Or proffer penury a crust,
The sweet reward may claim:
Then while you rove life's sunny banks,
With sweetest flow'rets strew'd;
Still may you claim the widow's thanks,
The orphan's gratitude!*

*Could we with ink the ocean fill—
Was the whole earth of parchment made—
Were every single stick a quill,
And every man a scribe by trade;
To write the love of God, above,
Would drain the ocean dry;
Nor would the scroll contain the whole,
Though stretched from sky to sky.*

Once blooming virgin, thou hast chang'd at last,
This mortal state for lasting joys in Heaven.*

CONTROVERSIAL.

DIALOGUE.

Some years ago, during a religious revival in the Town of — in Vermont, a Mr. —, an Universalist preacher, riding through the place was overtaken by a Doctor Mac, who was a Deacon of a Calvinist Church; when the following conversation was commenced by the Doctor.

Dr. Good News, Sir, I have glorious news to tell you.

Mr. Ah! indeed Dr. and what is the news?

Dr. Why Sir, the Lord is in — working wonders by his spirit. There is a great revival, and many souls are daily converted.

Mr. I am glad of it Dr. for I know of no place where a reformation was more needed.—But Dr. there is one thing which is a matter of some surprise with me. It is this. Many of those converts come forward, relate an experience, and you receive their word for the genuineness of their religion, when in temporal concerns you would not take their word, or trust them the value of six cents.

Dr. I know it, but I think we have sufficient evidence that it is the work of God. It will do to take them into the church.

Mr. Well Dr. time will determine the matter. You recollect the reformation in the towns of — and —; and you know what has been the result. As soon as the revival died away, they began to examine into each other's characters, and the genuineness of their experience. Quarrels ensued, and after numberless church meetings, and excommunicating a large proportion of those whom they had received during the revival, they were able once more to enjoy peace; and twelve months hence, you and I can determine better as to this revival.

Dr. Ah, Sir, it is unfortunately the case, that there are always some who prove hypocrites.

Mr. But Dr. it surely is not the work of the Lord to make men hypocrites?

Dr. Oh no, by no means, but it is always the case, that when the Lord begins a good work among men the Devil will always set himself to work at the same time and place.

Mr. Well Dr. but as the hypocrite whom you say is worked upon by the Devil, relates an experience similar to those who are converted by the spirit of God, and with the same apparent sincerity, is it not a little singular, that God and the Devil should work so exactly alike, producing the same feelings of conviction and conversion, that you old experienced saints that have been serving God, and walking in the way of holiness for twenty years or more, nay, that your ministers who profess to know so much of the spirit of God in all its operations, are not able to distinguish which is the work of God, and which is not, but as cordially receive him who is operated upon by the spirit of the Devil, as him who is converted by the spirit of God, and time alone trying the character enables you to find the hypocrite? Would it not then be well Dr. for you to wait awhile, as you cannot determine by the relation, the exercises of a person's mind, that you may discover the genuine convert from the hypocrite?

Dr. I don't know but it might be well enough, but we think it best to bring them at once into the church.

Mr. Dr. how many hypocrites do you think will prove to be in —?

Dr. I do not know. It is not for me to say, but it is probable there will be some.

Mr. Perhaps Dr. there may be twenty?

Dr. Oh yes. It would be remarkable if there were not as much as twenty among such a number.

Mr. Perhaps there may be forty, fifty, or even one half?

Dr. Why there may be, but I hope for better things I cannot believe there will be so many hypocrites as one half.

Mr. You admit there may be as many as half, and for aught you know more?

Dr. Yes there may be, but I do not believe there will.

Mr. Now Dr. you have called this revival the work of God, might I not with as much propriety say, it is the work of the Devil.

Dr. You may call it so if you please, but I should not dare to say so for the world.

Mr. But Dr. you acknowledge that some will prove to be hypocrites. That it is the work of the Devil to make men hypocrites. One half or even more may prove hypocrites.—The work is so exactly similar that you are not able to distinguish. Now Dr. according to your own acknowledgment, have you any more evidence to prove this revival is the work of God, than that it is the work of the Devil?

Dr. You may say what you please about it, but I say it is the work of God.

The Doctor attended conference in the evening, spouted away about the wickedness of U niversalists, and said, he that day had fallen into company with a Universalist preacher, to whom he undertook to relate the glorious work the Lord was carrying on in the town, but that he laughed at him, and said it was all the work of the Devil.

ABSURDITIES AND CONTRADICTIONS.

The doctrine of endless misery is fraught with all that is extravagant and irrational; it is replete with contradiction and absurdity. It would be almost an endless employment to enumerate all the follies attendant upon that scheme. In this communication, I will notice a few of the many inconsistencies of which this system is composed.

The advocates for this scheme suppose, or maintain, that all men sinned in Adam, and became liable, or exposed to all the horrors of an eternity of torture. But in the same breath they tell us that all the elect were given to Christ, and were consequently sure of salvation from eternity! Now, how is it possible that all are exposed to endless death, when the salvation of the elect has ever been sure? In the one sentence, they tell us, that all are exposed to endless wretchedness, and in the other, that the elect never were thus exposed.

They tell us, that the scriptures teach endless misery in the clearest terms possible; and in justification of this, they cite passages which assert that unbelievers shall be, or are damned. Since sinners, say they, are damned it is not possible that they can be made happy. All who are damned must be miserable forever.—But when addressing their self-styled elect, they inform them that they were in a state of damnation, but were snatched therefrom by the special agency of God. This damnation necessarily means endless misery; but the elect experience it only for a season!

They tell us that men are not elected on account of their good works, or any thing virtuous in them. But on the other hand they say, if the elect were as vicious, or as sinful as other men, they would come short of salvation! Or in other words, good works are sinful in the sight of God; but these are the only conditions on which eternal blessedness is suspended. That is, if they were destitute of those works which are sinful in their nature, they will be rejected and excluded from glory!

Christ, we are gravely told, died for the whole world; but the elect only have any interest in Jesus! The gospel is glad tidings to all people, but it will increase the misery of all the non-elect. Christ is the Saviour of the world but all who belong to the world will perish! All men may be saved if they will, but God has fixed some in eternal anguish by an irrevocable decree! The damned will be punished in the presence of the holy angels and in presence of the Lamb, for the wicked shall be banished from the presence of God eternally! In Adam all men died eternally, and all this was executed in one day! Every sin is infinite; but one infinite atonement cancels all the sins of the whole world; and this infinite atonement is made by the human, that is, the finite nature of Jesus Christ! God is just, and his justice requires the endless death of every offender; therefore the elect will be saved! God is just, and if he had been just with his creatures, all would, long ere this, have been in irrecoverable ruin! Infants are totally corrupt, but are increased in wickedness every moment!

Every act of the unregenerate is sinful, therefore it is their duty to seek an interest in Christ! God and he only, can change the hearts of sinners, therefore it is their duty to change their own hearts! Every sinner can repent of his sins, and glorify God, therefore God will be glorified in the eternal suffering of his creatures!

What floods of confusion are here! That person who can swallow down these, and an hundred other inconsistencies, is prepared to be the dupe of deluders, and the advocate for ignorance. But such is the perversion of the gospel at the present day, that men are branded as infidels unless they will receive these inconsistencies as gospel truths, and feast upon absurdities too gross to bear a moment's consideration. From such inconsistencies, the Lord in mercy save us.—Rel. Inq.

ELECTION AND REPROBATION.

The reader will readily perceive, that the reasons assigned, in my first number, why men of piety weep, when they remember Zion, comprehended among other topics, the doctrine of election and reprobation.

We believe in those doctrines, in a sense; and we believe in them because they are founded in the fitness of things, and because they are supported by scripture, but we must differ greatly from the generally received opinion. The principle, against which I shall contend is comprehended in the following sentence, viz. 'God out of his mere good pleasure from all eternity elected some to everlasting life, did enter into a covenant of grace to deliver them out of a state of sin and misery, and to bring them into a state of salvation by a redeemer.' Here them, twice repeated, means the some, who are elected. If some only are elected, the rest are as certainly reprobated; and if this election and reprobation are expressions of God's purpose, then nothing can be added to the one, nor taken from the the other. This appears to be logically conclusive. Now as all God's purposes or decrees are from himself and, are of course, eternal; the consequence would be, that the reprobate was made, designed and preserved for a time in this world, to be endlessly miserable in another. Nothing can be more unquestionable than this, that the purpose, decree and determination of God mean the same thing. Hence it follows, that it is the will of God, that all men (excepting the some, who are elected) should be miserable to all eternity; that as he made the elect for glory, so he made the non-elect or reprobate for damnation, and that the final destiny of the one is as agreeable to his will as that of the other. We have thus far steered clear of the least exaggeration; the principle involves all the consequences mentioned, besides other, which we shall mention, equally absurd and contradictory to reason and revelation. Our opponents are cautious of asserting the absolute reprobation of the non-elect; notwithstanding, if some are elected to everlasting life, the rest of mankind are as certainly reprobated to everlasting misery; because God is not without a will or purpose respecting any of his creatures. We will now weigh this doctrine in the balance of the sanctuary and see whether it be agreeable to the scriptures. 2 Peter, iii. 9. The Lord is not slack concerning his promise as some men count slackness, but is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. Acts, xvii. 30. And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men every where to repent. Ezek. xxxiii. 10. As I live saith the Lord God I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his ways and live: turn ye, turn ye, from your vile ways, &c. With many other places of like import.

Now, it is utterly impossible for me to reconcile these scriptures with eternal reprobation, or to make it appear consistent, that God should decree or will the endless death of the sinner, and yet declare with an oath that he was unwilling that he should die.—God is not willing that any should perish, and yet he has (by his own decree or will) made the endless damnation of the non-elect, inevitable. If words can express a contradiction, or if one sentence can overthrow another so as to make it void of truth; then the texts, which I have produced, make the doctrine of endless reprobation to be a lie and its pretensions nothing worth. Again, what propriety can any person see between commanding all men every where to repent and a previous, endless, inevitable doom of damnation. If God, by a decree has doomed the non-elect to endless misery, and this decree be unalterable, why does he yet command them to repent? The clashing of these texts with the doctrine of endless reprobation, we should think, was sufficient to overthrow it; but lest a doubt should remain, or our opponents should argue that the unwillingness of God that sinners should die, does not mean his positive will against it; let us bring some more evidence. Ephesians, i. 9, 10.—Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fullness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him. Thus is God's will, his good pleasure, and his purpose, not in the endless reprobation of one creature, but in gathering them all together in Christ. Col. i. 19, 20. For it pleased the Father, that in him (Christ) should all fulness dwell, and by him to reconcile all things to himself, &c. 2 Corinth. v. 18, 19. To wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself not imputing their trespasses unto them, and committed unto us the ministry of reconciliation. Tim. 1 ii. 3, 4. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth. Titus, ii. 10, 11. That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. For the grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men hath appeared.—Now all these texts are a full and positive proof, that God does will, purpose and determine the reconciliation and salvation of all men; and if so, it is impossible to reconcile these scriptures with eternal reprobation. God is not only unwilling that any should perish but he wills, purposes and determines that all shall be saved. Hence there can be no decree of endless reprobation. This universal restitution is spoken of by all God's holy prophets since the world began. Acts, iii. 21. All the types under the legal dispensation, which are, likewise, fulfilled in the antitypes under the gospel, are full to the purpose.—There is nothing in the whole typical dispensation, which has the appearance of endless reprobation, but the reverse. When the gospel, which is the substance of the types, was introduced, it was glad tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. The law itself is a full proof of this point; for the requirement, binding on all men to love God with all their soul, strength, &c. prove to demonstration that God loves all; but if he has reprobated a part of mankind to endless misery, that part of the human family are loved of God, nor could they, with any propriety be required to love him. But all are required to love God, consequently all are loved by him. Thus the law preaches the gospel by way of consequence, and thus, the doctrine of endless reprobation for even one of the human family is, I think, completely overthrown.

Our opponents argue, that the doctrine against which I am contending is reasonable, because all were sinners and could have no claim to mercy; that, therefore, God hath the right to bestow or not to bestow his mercy on all or a part as seemed good in his sight. In answer to this, we reply; that if God has a right or can consistently save or extend his mercy to offending creatures, we are assured that his disposition will lead him to do it. I am assured, that earthly parents, who can consistently bestow forgiveness on, and great favors to, an offending child, or on any other inimical person, would fall short of what God requires of him should he refuse to do so; nor would his refusal make him like God; for God is kind to the evil and unthankful. The truth of God's universal mercy to man is, I consider, granted when it is acknowledged that God has a right thus to be merciful; for we know that this is his nature or disposition. There is but one argument more that shall be used at this time, viz. as wonderful and as strange as God's love to sinful man is, yet his hatred to him would be much more strange or wonderful. Grace from God is wonderful on account of its greatness or extent, but the display of it is not so wonderful, because it is the nature of God to be merciful; but if love should become hatred, and mercy should become revenge; then would our wonder be at the highest pitch, because it would appear that God had changed. Now if God be hatred instead of love, then a part or all mankind may be reprobated to endless misery, but if he be love and unchangeably so that doctrine cannot be true. Having, as I hope, sufficiently disproved the doctrine of the endless reprobation of a part or all of mankind, it will follow of course that the election of a part only to endless life cannot be true, because this would establish the doctrine of the reprobation of the rest, (which we have disproved,) the consequence is, that all are elected to eternal life or none; and in case none are elected to eternal life, then it follows, that all are reprobated to eternal death, and this will prove that God is hatred and not love.—Now let our adversaries choose, which of the twain they believe to be correct, (for it must fall on one of these two) whether universal election to eternal life; or universal reprobation to eternal death. I, for myself, shall advocate the former, viz. that all the human family are elected in Christ as his elect body, of which body, Christ is the elect head. Christ is by way of eminence called the elect; he is said to be the head of every man; the head of the church, which is his body; he is said to be the head of all principality and power, might and dominion and every name that is named not only in this world, but in that also, which is to come. Now what can we gather from all this, but that God chose, appointed, ordained, decreed or elected Christ to be the head of all mankind their lawgiver, their judge, their king, and Saviour? Is not he the propitiation for all? did not he taste death for all? He gave himself a ransom for all, and he came to seek and save that, which was lost, and God has proposed to gather together in one all things in Christ. Thus Christ is the elect head of mankind. If Christ be the elect head of all mankind, then all mankind, comprehending both Jews and Gentiles, are his elect body, otherwise there would be a head without a body, which would be contrary to nature. Now the purpose, or will of God, or his decree, is the same as his election. If, therefore, he has purposed or willed the salvation of all men in Christ, it will follow, that all are elected in Christ; and if all are elected in Christ, then it is certain that all mankind are his mystical or elect body.

It will, hence, be seen, that, although, there be an election to eternal life; yet there is no reprobation to eternal death, for if all are elected to this eternal life, then there can be none to be reprobated.

That the Church of Christ is composed of all the human family, or that every individual of the human race is comprehended by the church, is abundantly inculcated in the sacred writings. The whole family of man, is included in Christ's Church. Hence the election of all as Christ's body is the doctrine of the bible. God has purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times to gather together, in one, all things in Christ. Ephesians, i. 10.

Having, thus, established the doctrine of the election of all men in Christ to eternal life, on the ruins of the current opinion that some, only, are elected and the rest reprobated to endless misery; I will, in the next place, endeavour to explain a number of texts, which are generally thought to mean the election and reprobation, which we have disproved; likewise, shew that the election of some and reprobation of others, as to this life, is according to scripture. The case of Esau and Jacob is explained, by our opponents as proving their endless reprobation and election, whereas to me it means no such thing. God has determined, before the children were born or had done any good or evil, that the elder should serve the younger. What did God determine? did he determine Jacob for endless happiness and Esau for endless burnings? The account neither declares nor intimates any such thing. It simply states, that Esau the elder should serve Jacob the younger. Gen. xxv. 23. Rom. ix. 12. God, for reasons best known to himself, determined this before these children were born. Accordingly, it terminated as God purposed. Jacob was set before Esau, he had the pre-eminence, was the progenitor of the Messiah; to him were the privileges of the law given and his posterity became the visible covenant people of God, while Esau, as to these privileges, was rejected. I consider these temporal advantages and spiritual privileges enjoyed in time, as comprehending all these blessings, which God designed for Jacob, or which Jacob enjoyed above Esau. In this sense, and no other, was Jacob loved and Esau hated. Mal. i. 2, 3; Rom. ix. 13. I see not the least possible reason why, any person should conclude, that endless election to life, in the case of Jacob, or reprobation to endless death, in the case of Esau, should be understood from this passage.

CONSCIENCE.

To the Editors of the Gospel Advocate.

GENTLEMEN—In compliance with your request I send you the following communication. It was not written, however, from the want of other employment, but that you might be enabled, more clearly to comprehend my meaning, and understand my propositions and arguments. As I cannot discover the object of your criticism, nor find any proposition laid down in it for me to oppose, I shall frankly and candidly continue the subject of Conscience.

The study of human nature, is delicate and important. To have clear and perfect ideas of all its parts, requires a mind capable of exercising candid investigation—correct and perfect discernment and deep thought. Therefore, should there be errors in this composition, I hope they will be attributed to the want of requisite abilities, rather than a voluntary imposition. It is my design,

First—To consider the nature and origin of the faculty of the mind called Conscience.

And here I would remark, that all the faculties or principles of the mind are increased and strengthened by improvement and age. For example. By a careful attention to external circumstances, operating upon our natures, our taste is improved. By a candid examination of facts, and the productions of genius, our judgment is matured, and strengthened.

Conscience, is a knowledge or perception of good and evil, and its power is weak or strong in exact proportion, as the mind is enlightened by moral improvement, or by the revelation of the will of God. But, as the term knowledge does not exactly suit your fancy, I will express it in different language, viz. It is the light of truth, revealed immediately by God to man. Every human being who is endowed with rational abilities is, in some degree sensible of moral obligations; and just so far as this sensibility has an influence over a depraved heart, just so far the feelings and conduct will be turned into a right channel producing moral goodness. This sense of obligation, or this natural knowledge is produced in the mind by a revelation of the will and character of God. Those who receive his written word, as a volume of divine inspiration, feel themselves obligated to obey its dictates; and those who are convinced of the existence of a God by his works, and of the perfection of his character by the harmony of his works, feel a sense of duty to their heavenly father from this natural or divine knowledge, which they do actually possess. This knowledge, or principle, or if the reader please, conscience is implanted in the mind at an early age. As soon as we are capable of exercising moral feelings or ideas, we have a partial sense of moral obligations. And just as soon as we are capable of exercising such feelings, we are capable of knowing right from wrong. And just so far as we act with reference to this knowledge, or according to the dictates of conscience, we act right, because "the voice of conscience is the voice of God." It condemns us when we do wrong; and approves our conduct when we do right. Hence the pleasures flowing from a peaceful conscience. Hence the pain and misery which we feel when it upbraids us. Let the candid reader take such a view of the subject, and I am certain he will see the force of my arguments, as presented before. For every particle of proof that goes to substantiate the fact, that conscience is an inward monitor, reprimanding or approving, all the conduct, proves with equal clearness, that it is a heavenly principle, as perfect as its Author. This light of truth, in some degree, the heathen possess; and for whatever light they do receive, for that, they are under obligation. But have I ever said, they are under obligations to obey all the rules and precepts as prescribed in the bible? I answer no. But they are under obligation to love God, for this their consciences teach them. This sentiment coincides exactly with the Apostle Paul's opinion, when he says, Romans ii. 14. "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves." Also the verse preceding this, and the one which follows it.

With these remarks, I leave the subject. Yet, "lest the Editors of the GOSPEL ADVOCATE should be idle, I beg leave to ask them a few plain and simple questions," viz. What did Christ mean, in his prayer for his disciples and followers when he said, "I pray for them, I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me out of the world." What does that passage mean which says "the wicked shall be turned into hell and all the nations that forget God." Yours, &c.

A. B.

REMARKS.

As our correspondent cannot discover the object of our criticism on the foregoing subject, nor find any proposition laid down in it for him to refute, it may be proper to state, that our object was to show the incorrectness of his theory of a "perfect conscience," and that our principal proposition was this, to wit, that A. B. failed in bringing forward any thing conclusive in support of his theory. Nor do we find the desired proof, or arguments, in the foregoing communication. He undertook in his essay published in the Farmer's Advocate, to show that man has a perfect conscience, and we attempted to make it appear that he came far short of doing what he attempted. We shall now examine his second attempt; not because of any thing therein contained particularly offensive when abstractly considered; but because of its bearing upon certain tenets which we disapprove, and which A. B. appears to approve.

"A. B." in considering the "nature and origin" of the faculty of the mind called conscience, says; "that all the faculties or principles of the mind, are increased and strengthened by improvement and age." Let us see how this proposition agrees with the tenor of his former essay. He then maintained that man has a perfect conscience, and defined it to be "the principle or faculty of the mind, which discerns between right and wrong; or rather, a correct knowledge of things, feelings, and circumstances, approving what is right, and condemning what is wrong." See Gos. Adv. vol. 5, No. 4, p. 29. Now, since A. B. is unable to find any proposition worthy of notice in our former remarks, we will give him the following. A. B. has contradicted himself! Let it be asked, how much can a perfect thing be improved or increased by age? A. B. sets out to prove 1, from the writings of wise men; 2, from the light of scripture; and 3, from its necessity; that man has a perfect conscience, and then declares that this same perfect conscience is "weak or strong in exact proportion as the mind is enlightened by moral improvement, or by the revelation of the will of God!" If then we follow the premises of A. B. back to the commencement of human life, we shall find that the infant has no conscience at all, and the heathen but a very weak and imperfect one; inasmuch as his moral improvement has been very limited. The term knowledge suits us perfectly; and after A. B. has admitted all that we contend for, it seems almost unnecessary for us to add any thing more on the subject of a "perfect conscience improved by age," &c.—But we will notice another statement made by A. B. to see how it agrees with the foregoing. He says "every human being who is endowed with rational abilities, is, in some degree, sensible of moral obligation; and just so far as this sensibility has an influence over a depraved heart, just so far the feelings and conduct will be turned into a right channel, producing moral goodness." Suppose, then, that the Hindoo widow, from the force of education feels bound by her conscience and all the ties of her religion, to immolate herself upon the funeral pile of her husband, how far is her conscience enlightened, and to what degree does it influence her depraved heart? Or, again; the Indian, who invents the most cruel tortures to inflict upon his victim, acts as conscientiously as Calvin died when he burned Servetus, and where, in such case, is the "perfect conscience" of A. B.? Admit that every individual has some sense of moral obligation; it by no means follows that their conceptions are correct, when tried by the standard of unerring right, or that all are amenable to a law or rule which is known to but a few. And farther;—if the premises of A. B. are correct, the question which was put in our former remarks again recurs—are the heathen to be damned for not knowing the revealed law of God, when they have had no opportunity to acquire an understanding of it? or are they accountable to a rule or law which is entirely different from that which they had been taught to revere and obey? Admit, for the sake of argument, that our friend A. B. has a perfect conscience—one so strong and correct—so discriminating and exact in all its decisions that it cannot err—so improved by the enlightening rays of science and the revelation of heaven that it approves of whatever is right and condemns whatever is wrong; now, would A. B. venture to consign to endless perdition a poor Indian who, in consequence of an erroneous education, supposes he is doing right in causing untold sufferings to be dealt out to his victim? Will A. B. with all this before him contend that ignorant sinners will stand "speechless at the bar of God?" And, again; how much is the poor Indian influenced by a "revelation of the will and character of God;" or why is he to be damned for acting contrary to the revealed will of heaven, while his path is only irradiated by the "dim light of nature"? Or farther; admitting that "those who receive the written word of God as a volume of Divine inspiration, feel themselves obligated to obey its dictates; and those who are convinced of the existence of a God by his works, and the perfection of his character by the harmony of his works, feel a sense of duty to their heavenly Father," yet we do not discover that either the former or the latter are to be "hurled by the tempest of depravity into the gulf of perdition!" For either, or both, are liable to entertain erroneous conceptions; and, therefore, if for no other reason, ought not to be damned to all eternity merely because they have the ability to judge of "things, feelings and circumstances," and are so constituted as to be susceptible of improvement in their capability of forming opinions.—We cannot see, therefore, that our friend A. B. has made out what he intended.

We now proceed to notice the inquiries made by our correspondent, and hope he will reciprocate our candid endeavours, by giving us at some "convenient season" a reply to the queries contained in the last paragraph of the article in our fourth number to which we have already referred. He asks; "have I ever said that they [the heathen] are under obligation to obey all the rules and precepts, as prescribed in the bible?"—We answer no; not in so many words; but A. B. did contend that the heathen are under the same obligations that christians are; and he will not deny that christians are under obligations "to obey all the rules and precepts as prescribed in the bible." His words are as follows: "We are under obligation to worship God, and we have the bible to inform us of this duty. The heathen, without the bible are under the same obligation." Verily, if our friend has a "perfect conscience" we should think it would remonstrate against such contradictions as are found in his arguments. Our conscience, though not exactly "perfect," cautions us not to be severe and therefore we add no more in reply to A. B.'s first inquiry.

Question 2. "What did Christ mean in his prayer for his disciples and followers, when he said 'I pray for them, I pray not for the world, but those thou hast given me out of the world?'" We might say in reply, he meant just what he said—and what then? Are we to conclude that he did not come to seek and to save the world, merely because he said that he did not pray for them? Suppose that while A. B. was engaged in writing his communication, he did not pray for the President of the United States; does it follow that he never did, or never will pray for him? or that the said president will never be saved? But possibly A. B. has concluded that none will be saved but such as our Saviour prayed for. Very well; how many did he pray for? For his primitive disciples, certainly. Did he pray for any more? See John, ver. 20, of ch. xvii. "Neither pray I for these alone; but for them also which shall believe on me through their word." All believers, then, will be saved according to the probable opinion of A. B. And it may be added, that the vilest of sinners were prayed for by him who spake as never man spake. In the purest accents of love, mercy, and grace, the great Redeemer prayed for his most bitter enemies—yea for his murderers! "Father forgive them they know not what they do!"—is a sufficient refutation of the notion that the desires of our Lord were limited to his friends or the few who were faithful to follow his examples and reverence his precepts. But farther; the eminent St. Paul, exhorts that first of all prayers intercessions and giving of thanks be made for ALL MEN, without wrath and doubting. There being a time for all things, will exonerate our Saviour from the charge of being a limitarian, and show the peculiar impropriety of resorting to passages like the one proposed by A. B. in support of the absurd idea that "some men and angels" will be damned eternally or "hurled by the tempest of depravity into the gulf of perdition!" Our Saviour prayed that his disciples should be kept from evil and sanctified through the truth; but he did not pray for their salvation from an endless hell, for this best of all reasons, they were not liable to be doomed to any such place.

Question 3, "What does that passage mean which says, 'the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God?' In reply, for the sake of argument, we will admit that it means what A. B. probably supposes it does, viz. that all wicked folks, shall finally be cast into a lake of fire and brimstone which shall burn to endless duration.—One question will put the labouring bar into the hands of our correspondent. Who are wicked? The author of the text has answered the question. See Ps. xiv. 2, 3, "The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek God. They are all gone aside, they are all together become filthy;—there is none that doeth good, no, NOT ONE!"—All being wicked, all will be "hurled by the tempest of depravity into the gulf of perdition"—according to the opinion of A. B. and will be eternally damned without exception! But our correspondent appears to be under a very palpable mistake. The passage under consideration does not read exactly to suit his purpose. It does not say that the wicked shall be turned into an endless hell; nor do we find any proof that it will be impossible for those in hell to get out. The pious David himself, as appears from his testimony, was once in hell, but lived to be delivered from it. See Ps. lxxxvi. 12, 13. "I will praise thee, O Lord my God, with all my heart; and I will glorify thy name forevermore;—for great is thy mercy toward me; and thou hast delivered my soul from the LOWEST HELL." If then, David could find his way out of hell, we conclude that all others can; and would just add, that he did not mean, in the passage under consideration that the wicked and all the nations that forget God shall be "hurled by the tempest of depravity into the gulf of perdition" never to be delivered! On the contrary, the psalmist intended to be understood that the wicked and those who forget God shall be made to endure those dreadful sorrows which follow transgression and disobedience as a certain consequence.

Much more may be said on this subject; and evidences adduced to prove beyond controversy that hell, according to the obvious scriptural sense of the term, does not signify either a state or place of endless misery; but until A. B. signifies an inclination to break a lance with us in the field of argument, it is perhaps inexpedient that we should dwell longer upon it. Having noticed his remarks on conscience and attempted an answer to each of his inquiries, we submit the merits of our cause to the discriminating reader.

"MUD MEETINGS."

[¶ We are informed that the presbyterians in this village are trying to get up another "revival," and the present state of our streets is much in their favour! The "runners" are out, seeking for opportunities to lead astray the simple and unwary; and all the machinery is in motion! We should be surprised if some, who obtrude themselves into the dwellings of our respectable citizens, should not meet with that kind of treatment which will teach them that they are not LICENSED to practise their arts upon community indiscriminately. If they wish to do good by "convicting" and "converting" sinners, we advise them to "begin at home," (for heaven knows there is enough that needs be done among themselves) and permit others who are established in doctrines different from their own, to enjoy their opinions, without being visited too often by graceless revival-makers. We advise young females to put on resolution enough to withstand their unsanctified encroachments; and to the advocates of "mud meetings," we say—AN EYE IS UPON YOU!

REVIEW.

UNIVERSALISM; OR THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS, A SERMON, BY THOMAS LOUNSBURY, A. B. PASTOR OF THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CONGREGATION IN OVID. THIRD EDITION, pp. 16, 8vo.

The above is the title of a sixpenny pamphlet which of late has been hawked about our streets by a sturdy, abled bodied, and impudent fellow, about six feet high, dark complexion, well built, and apparently just out of his minority. His insolent intrusions into the dwellings of our citizens—his unseemly address—and his unblushing effrontery, is without a parallel, unless it be in the folly, falsehood, and weakness of the sermon itself. With the creature who peddled the production of Mr. Lounsbury we have little else to do, than to caution the publick to beware of his impositions. With the sermon itself (if it deserve the name) we have something to do, and we shall attempt to perform what devolves upon us, with reference only to "truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." We however advertise the reader, that it is not any intrinsick merit that we discover in the work itself, which leads us to notice it; but the importance attached to the puerile production, by the aforesaid pedlar and his compeers in imposition: We say imposition because the sermon is evidently designed to give the publick an erroneous idea of the doctrine which it pretends to expose; and it is unpardonable for a Bachelor of Arts—a pretended preacher of the gospel—a soul-saver to palm off so palpable a libel upon community under the pretence of doing God service. The pedlar of the sermon, is worthy of charity, and commiseration for he evidently knows no better; but the clerical deceiver who preened the thing, ought to know better than to misrepresent our sentiments.—We have neither room nor inclination to insert the sermon, in our columns; but shall begin with the introduction and go through as time an opportunity permit, with a review of all that concerns either us or the publick. To the task then.

The introduction is addressed “to the members of the first presbyterian congregation in Ovid.” It begins thus:—“Beloved Friends: From the boldness of certain errorists, who of late have infested the borders of our little community, it has occurred to me as an indispensible duty, that something should be done to arrest the progress of what seems to be a growing evil.” This “GROWING EVIL” is universalism; and we congratulate Mr. Lounsbury for having found out that it is increasing! Many of his brethren have too long shut their eyes upon facts, and have suffered their enemy to approach the borders of their Babylon without taking pains to give the alarm. We are glad to hear, from the lips of so renowned a champion as Mr. L., that they are at length awakened to a sense of their danger! But what proof have we that universalism is an evil. If it be TRUE, it is a blessing; and it requires something more than the rant of a priest, to prove it false. How far he has succeeded in showing that the doctrine of universalism is either false or injurious, remains to be seen; and should it be made to appear that Mr. L. has rather strengthened than impaired the evidences that support it, his saying that it is an “evil,” will appear as it is—a declaration, without proof or reason to sustain it.

We cannot but notice the peculiar cant of the author of the sermon, in his addressing it to parents and their “beloved children.” He pretends that it refutes universalism, and maintains endless misery; and presents it to parents and their “beloved children,” as a rich legacy!! Great, indeed, must have been his condescension—pure, beyond description, his love for parents and children, that he should do them so great a favour! What a precious gift! A SERMON, designed to convince the tender parent, that fathers and mothers will witness the inconceivable torments of their children in another world, with holy complacency and indifference! that children will enjoy extatick bliss, in hearing the groans of their parents; that brothers and sisters will cause the arches of the New Jerusalem to resound with beatific praises, on hearing the unavailing cries of their brothers and sisters for a drop of water to cool their parched tongues in a hell of liquid fire and brimstone; and, that holy priests will dance over the miseries of the wicked with more than mortal joy, increased through all eternity by the groans of the damned!!! Yes, parents, and children, THIS is the precious gift you have received from your dear Mr. Lounsbury—this the precious legacy, bequeathed to you and yours by a man who pretends to be your friend! How have you received it? Have you clasped the treasure to your feeling bosoms, and prayed that it might prove true? Has a perusal of its pages caused the tear of joy to trickle down your cheeks? Have you rejoiced in anticipation of ultimately beholding it verified in another world? Or have you again and again raised the fervent prayer to God, that it may prove FALSE?

Let it be asked, what benefit has ever resulted to mankind from a belief of endless misery? Where are its comforts? where are its good effects? We venture the assertion that it has never been productive of any good! It has soured the affections—it has blunted the tenderest sensibilities of the human heart—it has sowed discord in families—it has caused mothers to destroy their children—it has caused rivers of blood to flow from the hearts of men—it has “turned the world upside down”—it has increased profanity, and every species of immorality—and it has led impudent fanatics to sport with the dearest rights of man!

We extract the following from an old orthodox book, entitled, “The Practice of Piety.” It will be a treat to the lovers of fire and brimstone, and sufficiently disgusting to the rational and humane, without comment.

“From this judgement-seat thou must be thrust by angels, together with all the damned devils and reprobates, into the bottomless lake of utter darkness, that perpetually burneth with fire and brimstone; into which bottomless lake, after thou art once plunged, thou shalt ever be falling down and never meet a bottom! And thou shalt ever lament, and none shall pity thee; thou shalt always weep for pain of the fire!—and yet gnash thy teeth for the extremity of the COLD!!!!”

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

The following communication relates to a circumstance with which we are acquainted, only from report. Our authority, however, is such, that we cannot hesitate to believe it substantially correct. We are far from desiring to injure the feelings of Mr. Crawford—we believe him to be sincere in all his professions; but greatly marvel that he has been so long deceived in relation to his own condition. We can only pray for an increase of light, and do devoutly hope that Mr. C. will yet behold the fulness of God's eternal love for all mankind. If he have taken one step towards the haven of rest, we pray God he may take another, and another, till he arrive at the gate of the New Jerusalem, which is "the mother of us all."

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

A DIFFICULT MATTER.

We understand that the Rev. G. Crawford, pastor of the "first" (and only) "Presbyterian Society of Buffalo," on Sunday last declared to his hearers that until three days previous to the time of speaking he, (Mr. Crawford) had never experienced religion! This was spoken on the 18th instant, and three days takes us back to the 15th of the present month, at or since which time, we must date Mr. Crawford's conversion to christianity. Now, the trouble in hand is this: Mr. Crawford has been preaching here some three years or so, and has said and done much which he and his friends have declared was for the good of souls, and the salvation of sinners. About fourteen months since he succeeded in getting up a commotion, called a revival; though it was so partial and limited in its operation that it was never taken much notice of in the "Western Recorder," (and of course it was not worth much) but still it added some twenty persons to "the church." These all "rejoiced in hope," and did several other things that converts usually do, at such times, and went in unto the band of the faithful. Now, what we greatly fear is, that all this was good for nothing, because we were, it seems, all deceived in Mr. Crawford, thinking him, at that time converted to christianity, when now, it appears, we are not to date such conversion prior to the 15th day of the present month!

Thus circumstanced, we have great fears that the Revival, a year ago, was the work of the DEVIL, in which case all that was done was, and still is, worse than nothing, causing so sad an admixture of matters as to give no little perplexity to us in this affair.—Nor do our fears end here. Much church business has been done under this unregenerate Pastor, and we know not of what nature it may be. If the Old Deceiver has cheated in upon us one or the world's people to be our spiritual leader, what may he not do? Happily he has come out from among the ungodly now, but this cannot help all that was done before the 15th of the present month. How manifest it now is, that if the "true Spirit" would always work by some rule that we could distinguish, an advantage would be gained! If we could, even now, be sure that we are any better off than we were before the 15th of this month, it would give us great spiritual consolation. But, alas! our fears still look onward, dreading lest the same deceiver should still prove too subtle for our detection. What a blessing it was (as it now proves) that the revival did not spread more than it did; and that so many attempts of our Pastor's to get up more of them, while he was yet unregenerate, did not succeed!!

Messrs. EDITORS,

In looking over my old manuscripts and pamphlets, I discovered a piece of paper containing a copy of a complaint which brings to mind former transactions. That these transactions may not be forgotten, you will please give place to the following complaint, in your useful GOSPEL ADVOCATE and Impartial Investigator, and should you see fit, to the remarks which follow:

COPY OF THE COMPLAINT.

To the first Congregational Church in Camillus.

I am under the painful necessity of preferring a complaint to you against brother Ashley Clark for heresy, in that he denies the perpetuity of future punishment; and maintaining that all men will finally be saved, contrary to the express testimony of the scriptures, and to the confession of faith of this Church. He has for some time given occasion by his observations and conduct, for us to suspect that this was his sentiment, and of late he has avowed it openly. I have accordingly laboured with him as the gospel directs, both in the first and second steps; and not being able to reclaim, I now tell it to the Church.

Elbridge, July 23, 1822.

The reader will perceive that the above is not a complaint preferred against a brother in the Church for the crime of murder, debate, deceit, envy, malignity, backbiting, theft or covetousness; but for the awful crime of HERESY! This brother who is implicated as an heretic, is accounted so from the fact that he "denies the perpetuity of future punishment, (or endless punishment in a future state), and maintaining that all men will finally be saved." This "heresy," which is the belief that all men will finally be saved, made holy and happy, is so desirable to the benevolent mind, and so concurrent to the prayer of every true and sincere christian, that hundreds and thousands have fallen victims to its alluring charms! This heresy, if cherished and fully believed, is calculated to give peace to the mind; but on account of its direct opposition to a haughty, bigotted, self righteous spirit, its subjects have ever been subjected to persecution and reproach. Hence this heresy, or this belief in God as the Saviour of all men, called forth the expression of the Apostle in the following words;—"For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe." This faith of the Apostle, this firm and undoubting confidence in the living God as the Saviour of all men; in distinction from those that believed at that time, (that is) when this epistle was written, is that which caused his reproach and persecution, is that which constituted and established him an heretic. Once there was a time when his character was not thus implicated; but it was at a time when it was identified with bigotry and self righteousness; when he could breath out "threatenings and slaughter;"—when he could persecute even unto death, as hereticks, all those who testified to the gospel of the grace of God, all those who testified that Jesus was the Christ—the Saviour of the world! But when it pleased God to reveal his grace in him, how is the scene changed! He now suffers the same persecutions and reproaches from the hands of his former self righteous associates, which he had dealt out to his once despised heretics, but now his fellow helpers in the glorious doctrine of God's impartial grace. At a certain time, about forty of his former brethren, the Jews, banded together and bound themselves under a curse, saying that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed him; for their selfrighteous spirit would not suffer him to live; neither would they hear, although he had testified to them that he himself had been a persecutor as they now were—that he had imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on Christ—that when the blood of the martyr Stephen was shed, he also was standing by, and consenting unto his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him! When this was delivered, they would not hear; but lifted up their voices and said, "away with such a fellow from the earth, for it is not fit that he should live." This was the treatment that the Apostle Paul received in consequence of testifying to the resurrection of that Jesus, who by the grace of God had tasted death for every man. This was the heresy that caused him so much persecution; for he testified after he had been permitted to speak for himself, saying, "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the Prophets; and have hope toward God which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust." The Apostle maintained the resurrection of the dead, even all the dead—including the Jewish nation of just and unjust. It was for this one voice, that he cried among them touching the resurrection of the dead—that he was called in question—that he was suspected of heresy! But it may be proper to state in this place, that probably it was not for the doctrine of the resurrection merely that he was called in question. But in the manner in which he treated of the character of those who were the subjects of the resurrection. It is very probable, that this one voice that cried standing among them touching the resurrection of the dead—touching upon it in the same manner as did his lord and master, (of whom they had now been the betrayers and murderers) that when they should rise, they should be as the Angels of God, being the children of the resurrection. That the just (that is) the jews should rise and be blest for their righteousness, they were willing to allow; but that the unjust, (that is, the guilty—the dogs—or in other words the heathen) should rise and be equally blessed, and all this because they were the children of the resurrection through the grace of God: This doctrine was too intolerable for their narrow, contracted minds to be reconciled to. For they had limited the Holy One of Israel and fancied themselves the exclusive favourites of heaven. But this was the view the Apostle had of the resurrection—he knew of no other resurrection after the dissolution of the body, when this mortal shall have put on immortality, than a glorious and happy one. That this is a fact is too evident from his epistle to the Corinthians to need to be controverted. In the fifteenth chapter he gives them his views of the resurrection in full—these are his words: "So also is the resurrection of the dead—it is sown in corruption—it is raised in incorruption—it is sown in dishonour—it is raised in glory—it is sown in weakness—it is raised in power—it is sown a natural body—it is raised a spiritual body. And as we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. But I anticipate a foolish objection, that the Apostle is treating of christians, or a particular chosen people; but let it be remembered, that the Apostle is treating of all those who bear the image of the earthly nature, of all those who are living in dishonour, of all those who die in Adam. For he says, verse 22, as in Adam all die even so in Christ shall all be made alive.

Thus we discover that the Apostle does not contemplate any particular portion of men, or description of men, but of characters; and of those characters, who are the subjects of the resurrection, as is expressed in the 21st and 22d verses. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive; and it seems to be the whole aim of the Apostle in this chapter, to make use of the necessary and most powerful language, to establish in the minds of his Corinthian brethren, that "the second Adam shall restore the ruins of the first." In the accomplishment of this glorious event, this Apostle had the most undoubting and unwavering faith, if we may credit his epistles, for they abound with this sentiment. To his Roman brethren he writes, "therefore as by the offence of one, judgement came upon all men to condemnation, even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For by one man's disobedience many [or the multitude] were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many [or the multitude] be made righteous. To his Corinthian brethren he declares, that as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive in a glorious immortality. To the Ephesians, he writes, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, EVEN IN HIM. To the Phillippians, he says, that at the name of Jesus, every knee should bow, in heaven and in earth, and under the earth, and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father. To the Collosians, he says, and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself, whether things in earth or things in heaven; and with the full assurance of the truth of this doctrine, he exhorts Timothy, that first of all supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty, for this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth, for there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time. To his Hebrew brethren he writes, that he (Jesus) by the grace of God should taste death for every man; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their life time subject to bondage.

This then was the doctrine in which this Apostle believed, and which he exhorted Timothy to command and teach, (viz.) that the living God was the Saviour of all men, and for which he was called in question, and for which he was accounted an heretic—and how is it at the present age of the world? How was it in the present instance, in the complaint above noticed—was it not for the same faith of the Apostle—for the same heresy—for the same belief in the doctrine of the restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy Prophets ever since the world began? Do we not frequently hear of excommunications from the east, from the west, from the north and from the south from the churches of different denominations?—And what is all this for? Is it for immoral conduct? Nay it is for that heresy which is identified with the belief that as Jesus hath by the grace of God tasted death for every man—that he shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied.

Brethren and sisters of the abrahamic faith whithersoever scattered abroad, and all who have suffered excommunication from different denominations for this faith; let us not be ashamed of this heresy—for it is the power of God to salvation to every one that believeth! It is the glorious Gospel of the Grace of God. Let us not murmur or complain, since the holy Prophets and Apostles have suffered the same things for the same offences. Let us also put our trust in the living God, the Saviour of all men, let us endeavour to be his willing and obedient subjects until he shall call us to shout in pure immortal strains with every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, even all that are in them. Blessing and honour, and Glory and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever! So let it be.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MESSRS. EDITORS,

As many of your readers have never been acquainted with the religious tenets of that great and good man Michael Servetus, who suffered martyrdom by the instigation of that cruel and bloody monster John Calvin, for the pretended crime of blasphemy and heresy. The historian informs us that Servetus was a man of great erudition and unfeigned piety, and that his eagerness to discover truth was never surpassed. His religious notions and tenets with respect to the supreme being and a trinity of persons in the God-head, amounted in general to the following proposition, that the Deity before the creation of the world, had produced within himself two personal representations or manners of existence, which were to be the medium of intercourse between him and mortals, and by whom consequently he was to reveal his will and to display his mercy and beneficence to the children of men; that these two representatives were the word and the holy ghost, the former was united to the man Christ, and born of the Virgin Mary by an omnipotent act of the divine will, and that on this account Christ might be properly called god; that the holy spirit directed the course and animated the whole system of nature, and more especially produced in the minds of men wise counsels, virtuous propensities and divine feelings; and finally, that these two representations were to cease after the destruction of this terrestrial globe, and to be absorbed into the substance of Deity from whence they had been formed.

So much for the blasphemy and heresy of Servetus, which so enraged the pious and God like Calvin, that he spent much time, and took great pains to procure a green kind of fuel which was slow in burning, caused the poor wretch to writhe in the most excruciating pain for more than two hours, before his spotless soul took its lofty flight through the trackless ether into the bosom of the God who gave it. "I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."

EXTRACT FROM A SERMON.

HE HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL.—Mark vii. 37.

Man, it must be admitted, originally came forth from the hand of his creator, a pure and perfect being of his kind. But made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, he soon became contaminated with sin. That he would become a sinner, was known to our heavenly Father, before the morning of creation had dawned upon chaos. The evils to which he would be exposed were foreseen, and a remedy provided in the "Lamb slain before the foundation of the world." Every thing connected with our existence was known and permitted to be, for some wise and excellent purpose. Indeed, it would seem, that to say the Deity did not permit even sin to enter the world for some wise purpose, and that he will not overrule it to the greatest possible good of the world of mankind, would be an impeachment of his mercy and his goodness. For, that sin could not be, without the permission of God, is as evident as it is that God is omnipotent; and that a good being, possessing almighty power, could not suffer an evil to exist, without designing to make it subservient to some greater good; is equally evident. Man becoming impure, by abusing the good things which had been furnished to his use by the Creator, it became necessary that something should be done to remove his impurity and establish him in a state of innocence from which he had become estranged. Ignorance was the cause of his departure from the path of wisdom, and misery was the consequence. Hence all that was lovely and admirable in the character of Deity, was called into action by the necessity of erring man. Compassion viewed man in his degraded and unhappy condition, and sent its image to have mercy upon him. He who can contemplate the works of Christ who as the express image of God, had compassion on the ignorant and those who were out of the way, without being excited to admire his character, is truly to be pitied. His going about from place to place teaching and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, healing every sickness and every disease among the people; the multitude who were scattered abroad as sheep having no shepherd—were fainting under their privations, and had their wants supplied by his kind and provident hand;—the restoring to life the widow's son, over whose lifeless remains she mourned and wept;—the restoration of Lazarus to the embraces of his affectionate sisters; and many other examples on record of a similar kind, are so many evidences of the fact, that his object was to remove every imaginable evil whenever it was expedient so to do. When the fainting multitude were fed and satisfied; when enraptured hundreds heard from his lips the words of life everlasting; when the disconsolate widow embraced her reanimated child; when Lazarus of Bethany came forth from the gloomy tabernacle of the dead; when light burst upon the eye-balls of the blind; when the lame were enabled to leap with joy and gladness; or, as set forth in our text,—when the deaf were made to hear, and the dumb to speak,—they might, with much propriety have exclaimed "He hath done all things well!"

The compassion of the Saviour is beautifully set forth in the case of the Prodigal Son. The undutiful child had wandered into foreign parts and sinned against heaven in the sight of God; he had left the venerable mansion of peace, to riot in the prohibited pleasures of the dissolute; until want staring him in the face, he had resolved to return and seek shelter under the protection of a parent. He was ignorant of the reception he should meet with, and felt the weight of guilt that hangs upon the sinner; he approached the dwelling of his father, expecting only to become a servant! But his affectionate parent, waited not to hear his entreaties, made no enquiries that could distress his child; and while a great way off,—saw him, had compassion on him, commiserated his wretched condition, ran to embrace him, fell on his neck and kissed him, restored him to the blessings of which he had voluntarily deprived himself, ordered the fatted calf to be slain for the repast, and rejoiced at the event! How beautifully does this represent the compassion of God and his Son Jesus Christ. Surely none but those who resemble the elder brother can fail to rejoice at such evidences of kindness and mercy.—God is indeed of great mercy and full of compassion. Hence the compassion and mercy of God are so nearly allied, that but little need be said to show that his tender mercies are over all his works. When compared with the mercy of man, it appears in all its loveliness. When Peter enquired of our Lord how often he should forgive an offending brother, the answer was, "not seven times only, but seventy times seven." This precept is so evidently divine, that it may be said of the doctrine of him who uttered it, "he hath done all things well;" and when we consider that his own conduct was governed by it, we are lost in admiration of his righteousness. It was exemplified on the cross!—"Father forgive them, they know not what they do," was enough, of itself, to disarm the sons of the devil of their malice.

3d. Justice, though it requires that sinners should be recompensed for their evil deeds is no less perfect. Although the feeling heart can with propriety mourn over the miseries of the wicked, yet when God afflicts we must admit that all is done according to the eternal principles of right.

It has been the misfortune of mankind to consider the punishment of sin an evidence of wrath in him who visits the evil-doer with a recompense of reward. Feeling within his agonized breast, the pains of guilt, the sinner often mistakes his own malignity for that of Jehovah! Realizing within himself a hell of torment, he too often supposes that God has prepared a place of similar burnings which shall exist forever. But if we coolly contemplate the subject, we shall find, that justice, as well as mercy requires not an endless continuance of a place or state of torment.

What does justice demand? The answer is plain and obviously correct. It demands that man should be holy. This is what the Law of God requires, and the principle on which it is founded is interwoven with the whole scheme of redemption. Obedience to the requisition, is the only means of procuring happiness; and disobedience is sure to procure misery. For, again:—A penalty is annexed to the law, and justice requires that it should be inflicted on every transgressor. But, the difficulty consists in ascertaining the nature of the penalty which justice requires to be inflicted. Some have supposed that the penalty is infinite in duration, if not in magnitude; and it has been said that Christ would not do 'all things well,' unless he caused eternal torment to be brought upon those who die in impenitence. Against such an idea I offer the following particulars.

Every principle of justice requires that man should be holy; and hence, should mankind forever continue to be unholy, it would be in opposition to and violation of justice itself. Therefore, justice can never receive its full demand unless all mankind are saved from iniquity.

The penalty of God's law, is designed to reform the subject, and is not in the least related to vindictive wrath. To suppose that justice requires, therefore, the endless wretchedness of man, is, to blaspheme the Holy One of Israel. We have seen, from previous remarks, that God is full of compassion, and of great mercy; and how can we now say that he is not merciful? Hence the grand consummation of all things, will witness the law magnified and made honourable by universal obedience. The Christian, looks forward with unspeakable delight to the period, when all creation will be subdued by the grace of God, and engaged in celebrating the merciful justice of him "who hath done all things well." How satisfactory to the devout believer is an hope so ennobling and divine! Then, ignorance will be done away by knowledge,—sin succeeded by holiness, death swallowed up of life; and Christ a triumphant conqueror! Then will be heard the saying; "O, death where is thy sting? O, grave, where is thy victory!"

But, alas! how appalling the contrast between such scenes of joy and the horrid picture which we have had drawn of a future state! How often has it been said, that instead of universal holiness and everlasting happiness, even the saints of God will witness the unspeakable wretchedness of millions! Although Omnipotence desired the purity and salvation of all;—although Jesus died to redeem the world from sin;—although the primitive saints laboured incessantly, even unto death, to effect the emancipation of the world;—although good men, from the creation of the world, have prayed for the salvation of the whole human family;—although missionaries have been sent over sea and land to convert the unconverted;—although ministers have preached in order to effect it; yet, we are told that these righteous desires—these holy endeavours—these earnest wrestlings with God—these sacred testimonies of heaven's kindness—these heaven-ordered, and godly sacrifices, are to be unavailing at last!! Notwithstanding Jesus has bled, and suffered, and died for lost sinners; notwithstanding God hath promised, testified,—nay sworn that he will cause his pleasure to prosper in the hands of him who came to save that which was lost; yet, the adversary of all righteousness, it is supposed, will hold in adamantine chains of infinite cruelty the souls of ten thousand times ten thousand poor sinners! And to complete the dreadful picture, when all this cometh to pass, and the myriads of the damned shall have entered upon the endless journey of despair; we are required to believe that the righteous will look beneath their feet upon these scenes of untold suffering, and shout in joyful acclamations—"he, hath done all things well!!! Parents, it is supposed, will rejoice on witnessing the torments of their children, children delight to behold the misery of their parents, husbands who are exhorted in the scriptures to love their wives, will view their anguish with complacency, wives will exult over the unavailing sorrows of their husbands, and mothers will enjoy extatic bliss on hearing the groans of their infant offspring! and yet, so conspicuous will the justice and sovereign grace of God appear in all this, that even hell itself will resound with the language of our text!

DISCONTINUANCE.

We learn from the 22nd number of the "Herald of Salvation" published at Philadelphia and edited by Brs. S. R. Smith and P. Morse, that it is to be discontinued on the completion of the current volume. We sincerely regret that the publick are to be denied the satisfaction of perusing the productions of those who have so ably conducted the Herald; but it is an opinion which we had long since formed and which we believe accords with the views of many of our brethren; that we have quite too many periodical papers for the benefit of those who publish them, and that a less number would be equally beneficial to the cause of truth. No paper, without advertising patronage, can be supported with less than one thousand subscribers who pay promptly; and if a greater number of copies of any one work could be circulated, it might, and undoubtedly would be better, to reduce the price, rather than divide the patronage between two or more. So far, therefore, from considering the discontinuance of the Herald an omen of evil, we believe it will be as well for the cause, (especially if its editors would contribute to other papers) and far better for the publishers.

REVIEW, &c.

In our last number we commenced a Review of the discourse of Mr. Lounsbury, and intended to continue it as time might permit. After having commenced, in compliance with the solicitations of our friends, the senior editor of this paper has written and put to press, a PAMPHLET, containing an entire refutation of the sermon. We shall therefore abstain from entering into the particulars in the Advocate, being assured that our brethren would prefer having a review in pamphlet form. The price of the pamphlet will be one shilling, and may be had of the Editor, or at the Bookstore of R. W. Haskins. Our agents throughout the country will soon be supplied with such quantities as they may need. The Review contains 1. a refutation of the Sermon, and 2. a brief, but lucid exposition of the parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

Means of promoting revivals.—The committee of the Presbytery of Oneida county, specify the following as the "means which appear to have been blessed," in promoting the revivals in that vicinity: 1. Seasons of fasting and prayer. 2. Confession of sin in churches. 3. Church Discipline. 4. Visiting from house to house. 5. Preaching the gospel, its doctrines and precepts, its promises and threatenings,—with great plainness and earnestness. 6. Union of feeling and efforts in churches. 7. Meetings of inquiry. 8. Avoiding disputes on minor points. 9. Urging awakened sinners to immediate repentance and reconciliation with God. 10. The visit of ministers, professors, and others where revivals had commenced. 11. The preaching and other labours of evangelists. 12. United, agonizing, persevering prayer. 13. The instruction given in Sabbath Schools.

The above is taken from the "Rochester Observer," a paper devoted to the cause of calvinism, missionary schemes, &c. &c. We have long contended that "revivals" are the work of men; and now, more than ever, we are perfectly satisfied that such is the fact. "The committee of the Presbytery of Oneida county" have, in specifying the "means which appear to have been blessed in promoting the revivals in that vicinity," have confirmed us in the opinion that God has little, if any thing to do in those cases.

Seasons of fasting and prayer are among the means resorted to, with success by revival makers. Reader, these men are calvinists, and unless their professions are a lie, they believe that "God hath fore-ordained whatsoever comes to pass;" and yet they would have you believe that "seasons of fasting and prayer" have an influence in inducing God to "get up a revival!"

"Confession of sin in churches," is another means of producing such an effect. Of this we have no doubt; for when old sinners own their faults, it is enough to "alarm" any body!

"Visiting from house to house," is another way to get up a revival; and no doubt, many have been frightened out of their senses by the means! This brings to mind something we have read somewhere, perhaps in the bible, about "creeping into houses," &c. "The truth will out."

Preaching damnation with great plainness, is the next thing to be done. In other words, to follow the example of FINNEY, in denouncing wrath upon all but the elect, is the way to get along! We have some such preaching here; in which the sheep, goats, and all, are doomed to hell without discrimination! Preaching the gospel is quite another thing! Query. How will the self-styled elect relish the idea of being damned themselves?

Inquiring meetings, alias mud meetings, &c. are the next things to be attended to! Next, "urging sinners to immediate repentance" is the way to get up the farce. In other words tell them they are going right down to hell, and keep them from reasoning, until they get so far into the traces that they cannot get out without making bad worse!

We can hardly be serious, while contemplating the ridiculous course pursued by the calvinists.—They know their babel is tumbling to the ground, and their object is to sustain it as long as they can, at all hazards! But, we predict, that an enlightened publick will, ere long, by actions, as well as words, convince them that their craft is in danger! Reader, be not deceived; although they tell you the work is of God, try it, prove it! We tell you, from experience, and facts which cannot be denied, that ro-rivals are the work of men, women and children! God, from their own confessions, never got up a revival alone since creation, AND NEVER WILL.

The following, extracted from the [Hartford] RELIGIOUS INQUIRER of March 3, shows to what contemptible means the limitarians are accustomed to resort, to sustain their rotten, falling schemes. We say accustomed to resort, because facts justify us in making the assertion. Surely their 'lies make the righteous sad!' An Universalist—aye, a leading universalist too, has been brought into the fold of orthodoxy!! Marvellous indeed! Well, suppose it were true,—what then? Why, he has turned from truth to wallow in the mire—that's all!—Ed.

From the New-York Observer, of Feb. 10.

A letter from a gentleman in New-Haven, to his friend in this city, dated Feb. 1, 1827, mentions that a revival has recently commenced in Ellington, Conn. "In Hartford, a Mr. M——, a leader among the Universalists, has been brought into the fold of Christ, unexpectedly to all. I was told to-day that Mr. B—— of Boston, had been sent for to help them. He attributes the conversion of Mr. M—— to the work of the Devil. By the way, he professes not to believe there is any Devil."

To the Editors of the New-York Observer:

Gentlemen,—Believing that you have no wish to be the subject of imposition, and still less the medium of transmitting misrepresentation to others, we hasten to correct the above statement, as far as concerns the Universalists in Hartford. First, then, no Mr. M. has ever been a leading Universalist in Hartford. Secondly, NO SUCH TRANSACTION has occurred; the whole is an entire fabrication—an utter, UNQUALIFIED, FALSEHOOD. These are the mildest terms which an utter destitution of truth will warrant. There is no mistake about it. Where it was manufactured, or by whom, or for what purpose, is hardly worth an inquiry. If you are willing to pocket such an insult, and submit in silence to the slavery of retailing such palpable slanders, we much mistake your character.

But we will suppose the worst of the case, allow the story to be true. What would it then prove? If nothing why so much noise about the recantation of a Universalists? But, if a secession from any church or society prove the erroneous tenets of that which has been left, the result would equally prove Islamism, Christianity, Papacy and Protestantism. But as no man in his senses can be willing to follow so fallacious a mode of reasoning, our advice is, that no such means be used as encouragements to ignorance, or warnings to those who may be inclined to believe in the equal and universal goodness of our Heavenly Father.

But as the story appears to have been thought of some importance, as religious intelligence, at least, we will drop a few words on the converse side of the question, touching indisputable facts, and relating particularly to this city.

Within about twelve months a considerable number of communicants in the Baptist church has been excommunicated for heresy, alias, a belief in the doctrine of Universal Salvation.—These are uniformly people of good character and exemplary conduct. Having no private views to gratify, and no sinister motives to mislead, the fair inference is, that nothing but a sense of duty has induced them to submit to the indignity of an excommunication. With these facts in full view, it has nevertheless hardly been mentioned in the Inquirer. We never produce them as evidence of the truth of the doctrine, but under certain circumstances, they may fairly be considered as the effects of that truth which so far maketh free from the shackles imposed by custom, that the subjects endure shame and contempt rather than deny themselves the privilege of worshipping the God of the whole earth.

With the direct denial of the fact as stated by your correspondent, we trust you will be satisfied of the course which a sense of honour dictates. For the reliance which ought to be placed on his denial, we appeal to Mr. Danforth, the printer of your paper. He is too well acquainted with us, and with the circumstances, and members of our society, to harbour a doubt of the truth of this statement.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT TO THE MINISTRY OF RECONCILIATION.

On Monday, January 1st, a number of Ladies and Gentlemen, living within the precincts of the ministerial labours of brother HOLLIS SAMPSON, assembled at his house, in Parma, Monroe co. and of their own free will and accord without being influenced by the whining eloquence of a theological beggar, gratuitously presented him and lady with cash and other articles of family consumption to the amount of fifty-five dollars and fifty cents.

The above act was pure benevolence, growing out of respect for their teacher; the sum presented being no part of, and wholly disconnected with a handsome salary they are paying him for his services beside.

MORE TROUBLE.—We learn that the Roanoke Union Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, were to hold a meeting, commencing on Thursday last, for the purpose of breaking down the usurped authority of the Bishops and Presiding Elders, "who at this time exercise all the legislative powers of said society." And "to obtain equal representation among the local preachers, and laity, in the law making department, &c. with the itinerant preachers." We discover in this notice, a fresh blow aimed at the domination of Priestcraft: God grant it may strike home with irresistible power, and shiver the idol into atoms.—Liberalist.

The Jews.—The conversion of a Jew costs the society, in London, an average sum of about one thousand pounds; and one half of the converted return to the "error of their ways" as soon as converting-money is no longer to be had. The making of a half-christian out of a full Jew, would render twenty poor and honest Christian families comfortable for a whole year. How is it that persons can thus abuse the charities of society, by so wasting money which the merciful contribute?—Niles Reg.

POETRY.

MEMORY AND HOPE.

Busy memory depart,
Shed not here thy tears of sorrow;
Come sweet Hope and cheer my heart,
Tell me my joy will gild to-morrow.

Yet memory why dost thou grieve
O'er joys long past and pleasure faded?
Cannot blissful moments leave
A single ray with grief unshaded?

Still I love thy gentle tear,
Thy pensive eye with lustre beaming;
I bid thee hence, yet woo thee here;
I love thy look with feeling teeming.

What is it makes me love thy sigh?
'Tis Hope,—she bids thee sweeten sorrow:
That angel Hope, that whispers by "Those scenes may come to-morrow."

Then still, O memory, linger near,
Recall each joy, that wakes thy sorrow;
Sweet Hope shall smile upon thy tear,
And bid it sparkle till to-morrow.

SELECTED BY I. WHITNALL.

When noisome weeds from lilies grow,
And hyacinths on nettles blow;
When briars yield the camphor gum,
And sweets from gall and wormwood come;
When hatred flows in streams of love,
And hawks and kites protect the dove;
When foxes shall the brood defend,
And sheep secure by wolves be pen'd;
When darkest cells shall light afford,
And wrath pronounce the peaceful word;
When sin shall cleanse poor man defil'd,
And lies with truth be reconcil'd;
When scorpions' stings shall comfort give,
And spasms make the dying live;
When kings for equal rights contend,
And tyrants do the same defend;
Then future torments held to view
Shall change the heart and make it new.

CONTRVERSIAL.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

Messrs. EDITORS,

Will you do me the favour to insert in your paper the following Queries, suggested on reading W. I. REESE's exposition of Mat. xii. 31, 32, which appeared in the Advocate of last week; and give an answer from yourselves or your correspondent?

March 2, 1827.

Is it not probable our Saviour meant that all manner (or kinds) of sin, but that against the Holy Ghost, should be forgiven—rather than all the sins of all men: especially if we remember that he was reproving the Jews for blasphemously ascribing the agency of the Holy Spirit to Beelzebub—admonishing them that all other species of sin should be forgiven, except this; and when he had previously taught, if “they forgave not men their trespasses, neither would their Heavenly Father forgive them?”

If the Holy Spirit is merely a “doctrine” or “message,” how was it proclaimed to the devils when they were expelled by a single command? And if the doctrine of Christ procured their expulsion, why could not the disciples cast one out upon a certain time—as they preached the same “doctrines,” and had been commissioned to cast them out? Or, were the devils contrary doctrines or messages, and if so, how did they influence the swine to run into the sea?

How can we suppose the Saviour meant the Jewish Nation when he spake of an individual—Mat. xii. 32, “whosoever, speaketh,” &c.—“shall not be forgiven him;” Mark iii. 29, “he that shall blaspheme”—Luke xii. 10, “him that shall blaspheme?”

Does not the translation in Matthew—“neither in this world, neither in the world to come”—probably accord with the meaning of the original; as the parallel passage in Mark, says, “he hath never forgiveness”—in Luke, “it shall not be forgiven,” and the other Evangelist, (John) in one of his epistles, “there is a sin unto death: I do not say he shall pray for it?”

Is that an “unchangeable” God—“of one mind”—“without even a shadow of turning” who alike regards with favour the righteous and the wicked—him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not?—Where does he promise forgiveness to his “offending offspring” who continue in rebellion against him? Where were the wicked inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah “suffering the vengeance of eternal fire” in the days of Jude?

As we are in this world liable to much natural and moral evil, is it not the dictate of wisdom that we should hasten our departure from it, if we are assured of an immediate entrance upon a state of bliss ineffable? And, upon this view of the subject, can war, pestilence, suicide, and the thousand other sources of premature death, be longer considered as evils, or rather as messengers of mercy, having in view the highest good of man?

As Eve was tempted by some object unconnected with herself, who was it? Is it the one alluded to in Revelation xii. 9?

What was the first estate (Jude 6) from which the angels fell? Where are they reserved, and unto what great day? What fire is prepared for the devil and his angels; and how shall accursed men be associated with them in punishment?

If the wicked are sent to hell for iniquity committed on earth—and if they are under the influence of all their unholy and rebellious passions there, is it probable that continually augmented guilt will by and by purchase exemption from punishment?

REPLY TO “A.”

The communication of “A” is altogether made up of interrogatories, which is indeed a very safe way of procedure. For it is generally thought, there is no danger of making a very great sacrifice in merely asking questions. This is the side taken by most religionists of the day; and it is seldom the case, that one can get them to suspend asking questions long enough to answer one. I pretend not to judge from the character of “A’s” queries whether he is seeking for “the truth as it is in Jesus,” or whether his object is amusement. But this is no matter of concern with me, since every one who approaches the sacred repository of truth, should be guided by sincere motives, rather than mimic the grovelling fancies and insincerities of others.

“A,” says, his queries were suggested on reading my “exposition” of Mat. xii. 31, 32. But one would be led to conclude from his first inquiry, that he had given my “exposition” very little attention. For he proceeds on the very ground which I have, in that “exposition," proved false, viz that all sins shall be forgiven "except" the sin against the holy spirit. I there shewed, what must be obvious to all who understand what they read, that the word "but" in the text is a mere connective and not a preposition. But "A" asks, "Is it probable our Saviour meant that all manner (or kinds) of sin but that against the Holy Ghost should be forgiven rather than all the sins of all men; especially, if we remember, that he was reproving the Jews for blasphemously ascribing the agency of the Holy Spirit to Beelzebub—admonishing them, that all other species of sin should be forgiven "except" this; and when he had previously taught, if "they forgave not men their trespasses, neither would their heavenly Father forgive them. This question is evidently gratuitous, as the article to which it relates, it is believed, contains a sufficient answer to it. But I shall give it all due attention."

1st. It is not even "probable" that "our Saviour meant, that all manner (or kinds) of sin but that against the Holy Ghost should be forgiven, rather than all the sins of all men." because the reverse is the fact. For it has, already, in substance been shown, and I now repeat, that our Lord did limit the period in which the Jews were to be "kept under darkness," to the then existing age and the age to follow." This fact only, I apprehend, can justify the language which precedes the qualifying clause, that "all sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men; and blasphemies wherewithsoever they shall blaspheme."

2. Our Lord "was reproving the Jews for blasphemously ascribing the agency of the Holy Spirit to Beelzebub." I have said, in my "exposition," that the word spirit in the text signifies doctrine. By this, I did not design to be understood, that the word has the same meaning in every instance where it occurs, for the case is plainly otherwise. But the proof I there adduced, that the word is used for doctrine I think cannot be invalidated. We are all prepared to say of the Messiah, that the spirit of the Lord was upon him. But who will hazard his reputation for good sense, in asserting, that the word has the same or a similar meaning in every instance? Surely no one. There is then, at least, presumptive evidence, that the sense of the word may be varied in the text, Mat. xii. 31, 32. The word spirit is used variously in the scriptures. We read of the spirit of God—the spirit of Christ—the spirit of truth—the spirit of man; the spirit of beasts; the spirit of princes; the spirit of the mind; the spirit of grace and supplication; the spirit of bondage; the spirit of adoption; the spirit of life; the spirit of holiness; the spirit of meekness; the spirit of faith, which, probably, is the same as "the word of faith," Comp. Rom. x. 8, and 2. Cor. iv. 13.

Our Lord, referring to the manna of the Israelites as figurative of the spiritual food of the gospel, and discovering, that his disciples were displeased at the manner in which he had expressed himself, explained the matter fully, that it was his doctrine he intended. "The words that I have spoken unto you, are SPIRIT, and are life," John vi. 58,—62; see 1st John iv. 1—3. I have here introduced these texts again, to show that the word spirit is sometimes synonymous with doctrine. Indeed this truth is admitted by many able commentators. This idea, however, "A" has not questioned. But he seems to doubt the propriety of calling the holy spirit against which the Jews blasphemed, the holy doctrine of Jesus. In Mat. xii. 28, Jesus says, he casts out demons "by the spirit of God," and Luke xi. 20, "by the finger of God;" in both of which cases, though different terms are used, is evidently meant the divine power by which he wrought those miracles, and which was, also, signally manifested, in his preaching to the people. All that Jesus ever said or performed, during his ministry on the earth was designed to establish and give credit and currency to his doctrine. The miracles which he and his apostles wrought, were so many steps to the triumph of his sublime system of truth, by exciting that attention which could not have been produced in any other way. Hence, the blasphemy of the Jews was directly designed to destroy the influence of his doctrine. This was evidently their object in ascribing his miracles to Beelzebub. And whether this was their object or not, Jesus knew, that if what they said had any influence at all, it would operate against his doctrine, which he proved divine by his miracles. So that his doctrine was the victim, the object of their malice, whose destruction they sought. For this they crucified him; but he prayed for their forgiveness on the cross, because they knew not what they did! Hence, for the sake of the argument, even setting aside what I have said respecting the meaning of the word spirit in this particular instance, I think it is undeniable, that the object of the blasphemous Jews was to destroy the system of truth which Jesus had introduced. When they, therefore, spake against the holy spirit, their primary object was the extermination of the doctrine and religion of Jesus. "A" may view the subject in either light which may suit him best; the result will be the same.

But perhaps "A" is a Trinitarian, and feels grieved on that account. If this be his faith, and, that the holy spirit here mentioned is "the third person in the trinity," if this doctrine be true, I think my views are the more fairly proved by this passage. Here there is no turning to the right hand nor to the left. If "the Father is God, the Son God, and the Holy Ghost God, and yet there are not three Gods, but one God," (see the creed of Athanasius) then, by the same rule, God is the Son, the Holy Ghost is the Son, and the Son is the Holy Ghost, &c. I do not know how "A" will like the synonyms here used. I do not charge him with this confession, but it is trinitarianism, whether he will hear or whether he will forbear. I am not the author of thus ridiculing this sublime text, but the following is the substance of it, on this hypothesis: "whosoever speaketh a word against the son of man it shall be forgiven him, but whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of Man it shall not be forgiven him!" and vice versa. May God forgive the authors of such wickedness!

If what I have said in my "exposition," on that part of this text which I have called parenthetical, be correct, the difference, between Jesus the messenger and the holy spirit, (or doctrine which the Jews aimed at) is established, and the good sense of the text is preserved. But if a more rational construction can be given, I will most certainly give it my approbation. The above remarks, in part, relate to "A's" second paragraph, but it was deemed proper to place them here.

3d. Jesus did teach, that, if we forgive not men their tresspasses, neither will our heavenly Father forgive us. This sentiment I hold to be a salutary one, and though it was originally, addressed to a few, I think it is applicable to all men. As I have shown in my "exposition," by an appeal to the scriptures; in what the forgiveness of our heavenly Father consists, I will only say here, that the pardon of an unforgiving man, does not depend on a change in the mind of an immutable Deity, but of his own. One who is possessed of an unforgiving disposition I truly pity. And while the mind is filled with such a spirit, it can contain nothing else, and therefore, can have no sense of the forgiveness of Him who is "kind to the unthankful and the evil."

"A" in his second paragraph, asks, why the disciples of Jesus, who taught the same doctrine, could not cast out a demon on a certain time, &c. I reply, there is no necessity of supposing, that those miracles were wrought by preaching, unaided by Him who effected the mighty works. Acts ii. 22. Neither do I think this subject touches the question in dispute. What did the blasphemous Jews know about the means by which our Lord and his apostles healed the sick, raised the dead, &c.? Had they any higher views of the Messiah whom they looked for, than to promote their earthly glory and grandeur? Were not their minds very ill adapted to comprehend the illustrious miracles wrought among them? Had they "known him," would they have persecuted him, or derided his doctrine, or would they have crucified him? Acts xiii. 27. Had the Jews been enlightened, so as to have expected as high advantages from Jesus as the apostles did, would they have been more likely to blaspheme, than they? Look at blasphemous Saul. He persecuted the Church of God. Was he not as bad as any of the sons of Israel? Was he not the chief of sinners? But did he not these things, "ignorantly through unbelief?" Was there "light" in his head as well as malice in his heart, when he was ignorant of what he did? Yet, it seems he had "lived in all good conscience before God." And was not this the case with the persecuting Jews, generally? Considering the state of the Jews, and, that their sole aim was to crush the rising cause of Jesus, the more this subject is investigated without prejudice, I am persuaded, it will appear, that the word spirit, as spoken to the Jews, implies his doctrine, the object of their malice, and blasphemy.

"A's" arrangement of singular pronouns, is perfectly harmless, as they might be opposed by nearly the same number of examples, from the same passages, of a plural character. But the explanatory note of Mark, is sufficient for my present purpose; "Because they said, he hath an unclean spirit," Mark iii. 31. Who said? Answer, "the scribes who came down from Jerusalem," ver. 22. But will "A" say the scribes collectively, who blasphemed, are not meant, because our Lord said, "he that shall blaspheme" be in the singular? Our Lord, addressing the Jews, said, "Fill ye up the measure of your fathers," Mat. xxiii. 32. And, perhaps, few will controvert, that the blasphemy against the holy spirit, together with the catalogue of crimes our Lord foresaw they would be guilty of, was deplorably decisive in filling up the measure of their iniquity, on which account the most unparalleled "tribulation" came upon them. When one million and one hundred thousand, were cut off at Jerusalem, besides thousands that were murdered in other places, and the remainder dispersed and cruelly persecuted. Yet who will hence infer, that every Jew was personally concerned in blaspheming the holy spirit (yet this might have been the case) or that each in person, assisted in persecuting, scourging, and crucifying, the preachers of the gospel? See Mat. xxiii. 32—39. But this matter, I think, is not of difficult solution. Were not the Jews all agreed to what their rulers suggested? And when the scribes, who, it seems, were doctors of the law, blasphemed on seeing the miracles of Jesus, it appears rational to conclude that the multitude would coincide in, and echo the same abuse. And though it did not require all the Jews to condemn, and crucify our Lord, yet, as they were all agreed in the bloody transaction, they are all justly implicated. "For they that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew him not, nor yet the voice of the prophets, &c. they have fulfilled them in condemning him." Acts, xiii. 27, 28. "Then answered all the people and said, his blood be upon us and upon our children." Mat. xxvii. 25. More instances of texts agreeing with the above, can be adduced, but these, it is believed, will convince any rational man, who is acquainted with the history of the infatuated Jews, and the influence of the chief rulers over the people; that all of that unhappy nation, who bowed their necks to priestly domination, and submitted willingly to the haughty pretensions of their doctors, as far as Jesus, his doctrine and his miracles, had been seen, heard, or heard of, and opposed, partook of the crimes and guilt, of persecution, murder, and blasphemy, either by sanctioning the malicious conduct of others, or, by actually participating in the commission of these enormities. Hence, I here repeat, that when it is understood, that "blindness in part happened to Israel," it will be perceived that our text (Mat. xii. 31, 32) must have a national, and not merely an individual application. "A" objects to this, it appears, because our Lord said "he that shall blaspheme," &c. in the singular number! this is strange logic! No one doubts, I presume; that "every one shall die for his own iniquities." But were not the Jews punished nationally? And did not their complicated crimes fill up the measure of their iniquity, and, as a nation render them ripe for the vengeance that awaited them? See Mat. xxiii chap.

"A" having collected together his singular pronouns, &c. asks, "Does not the translation in Mat.—neither in this world, neither in the world to come—probably accord with the meaning of the original" (see my "exposition," for the meaning of the original,) "as the parallel passage in Mark says, he hath never forgiveness (eis ton aiona, to the age.) "A" is informed, that 'never, in Mark is the same as 'world,' in Matt. But the word signifies age or dispensation. See Dr. A. Clark on all these passages, viz. Matt. xii. 31, 32, Mark iii. 28, 29, Luke xii. 10, and 1 John v. 16. See my exposition, for scriptural views of forgiveness, the immutability of God, the punishment of sinners and the object of such punishment.

The remainder of "A's" production not having a bearing on the present question, I shall make it the subject of another communication.

LONG PRAYERS.—Whitefield was one evening at a gentleman's house, and at the hour of family worship the gentleman prayed. He was immoderately long; and when he at length concluded, Whitefield said to him, "Sir, you prayed me into a good frame, and you prayed me out again."

The population of Upper Canada, according to the census lately taken, is only one hundred and sixty four thousand which does not equal the population of the city of New-York by several thousand. It has however, rapidly populated of late years.

There is a new project of a law, about to be put in force in France, still further restraining the liberty of the press.

SENTIMENTAL.

Although we step a little aside from the beaten track, in giving the following an insertion; yet the moral deducible from it will be a sufficient apology. A mild, persuasive, and affectionate course of conduct on the part of a wife, is more frequently efficacious in reforming the dissolute husband than a contrary course; and it is believed that if love and affection were exemplified in the conduct of married people more frequently, there would be less of misery than is now experienced in our world. The subject brings to mind a fable, found in some book, we forget what—to the following purport: The Sun and Wind undertook a trial of their powers, and a traveller was selected as the subject of the experiment. The object was to get off the traveller's coat. The wind commenced the attack; it blew this way; and that way,—but the traveller held fast to his coat. Indeed, he exerted his strength to keep his coat, in exact proportion to the fury of the wind. The attempt, therefore, on the part of the wind, was entirely unsuccessful. The Sun then displayed its powers. It begun by sending forth its gentle beams upon the traveller, which soon induced him to unbutton his coat. Another, and another ray of light and warmth succeeded, until at length the traveller yielded and cheerfully laid his garment aside! The reader will make the application.

GAMBLING,

OR, RAIN AND SUNSHINE.

—as we turn our backs

"From our companion, thrown into his grave;

"So his familiars' to his buried fortunes

"Shrink all away."

"Why do you keep me for so long a time at the door?" said Edward F. passionately to his wife. The night had passed; but its cold wind entered the house, as Mrs. F., with a sorrowful heart, undid the lock.

"Is it late, Edward; and I could not keep from slumbering."

He said nothing in return to this: but flung himself in a chair, and gazed intently on the fire. His son climbed upon his knee, and, putting his arms around the father's neck, whispered, "papa, what has mamma been crying for?" —Mr. F. started—shook off his boy, and said with violence, "get to bed sir; what business has your mother to let you be up at this hour?" —The poor child's lower lip pouted; but he was, at this time, too much frightened to cry. His sister, silently, took him up; and when he reached his cot, his warm heart discharged itself of its noisy grief. The mother heard his crying, and went to him; but she soon returned to the parlour. She leant upon her husband and thus addressed him; "Edward I will not upbraid you on account of your harshness to me—but I implore of you not to act in this manner before your children. You are not, Edward, as you used to be! Those heavy eyes tell of wretchedness, as well as of bad hours. You wrong me—you wrong yourself, thus to let my hand shew I am your wife—but at the same time let your heart know singleness in matters of moment. I am aware of the kind of society in which you have lately indulged. Tell me, Edward—for Heaven's sake tell me!—we are poor—we are reduced! we are ruined!—is it not so?"

Edward had not a word for his wife; but a man's tears are more awful than his words.

"Well, be it so, Edward! Our children may suffer from our fall; but it will redouble my exertions for them. And as for myself, you do not know me if you think that circumstances lessen my feelings for you. A woman's love is like the plant which shows its strength the more it is trodden on. Arouse yourself my husband—it is true, your father has cast you off, and you are indebted to him in a serious sum—but he is not all the world!—only consider your wife in that light—."

A slight tap was now heard at the door, and Mrs. F. went to ascertain the cause; she returned to her husband: "Mary is at the door—she says you always kissed her before she went to bed?"

"My child—my child," said the father;—"God bless you—I am not well Mary.—Nay, do not speak to me to-night; Go to rest now—give me one of your pretty smiles in the morning, and your father will be happy again."

Mr. F. too was persuaded by his affectionate partner to retire; but sleep and rest were not for him—his wife and his children had once given him happy dreams—but now, the ruin he had brought upon them was an awakening reality.

When the light of the morning appeared above the line of the opposite houses, Mr. F. arose.

"Where are you going Edward?" said his wife, "I have been considering," he replied, calmly; "and I am determined to try my father. He loved me when I was a boy—was proud of me. It is true, I have acted dishonorably by him. Yesterday I spoke harshly of him; but I did not then know myself.—Your dear affection, my wife, has completely altered me. I never can forget my ill treatment towards you: but I will make up for it—I will—indeed I will—Nay, do not—do not grieve in this way—this is worse to me than all—your young ones my wife—I will be back soon."

The children appeared in the breakfast room. Mary was ready with her smile, and the boy was anxious for the notice of his father. After a short space of time, Mr. F. returned.

"Why so pale, my husband! will your parent not assist you?"

"We must indeed sink, my love! He will not assist me. He upbraided me; I did not, I could not answer him a word. He spoke kindly of you and your little ones but he has cast us off forever."

The distressed man had scarcely said this when a person rudely came in. The purport of his visit was soon perceived. In the name of F.'s father he took possession of the property; and he had the power to make F. a prisoner.

"You shall not take papa away," said the little son, at the same time kicking at the officer.

"Mamma," whispered Mary, "must my father go to prison—won't they let us go too?"

"Here comes my authority," said the deputy sheriff.

The elder Mr. F. doggedly placed himself in a chair.

"You shall not take my papa away," cried out the boy to his grandfather.

"Whatever may have been my conduct sir," said the miserable Edward, "this is unkind for you. I have not a single feeling for myself; but my wife—my children—you have no right thus to harrass them with your presence."

"Nay, husband," responded Mrs. F. "think not of me. Your father cannot distress me. I have not known you, Edward from your childhood as he has done; but he shall see how I can cling to you—can be proud of you in your poverty. He has forgotten your youthful days—he has lost sight of his own thoughtless years."

The old gentleman directed his law agent to leave the room. He then slowly, yet nervously answered thus:

"Madam—I have not forgotten my own thoughtless days. I have not forgotten that I once had a wife as amiable and noble minded as yourself—and I have not forgotten that your husband was her favourite child. An old man hides his sorrows; but let not the world, therefore, think him unfeeling—especially as that world taught him so to do. The distress I have this moment caused was premeditated on my part. It has had its full effect. A mortal gets to vice by single steps; and many think the victim must return by degrees. I know Edward's disposition; and that with him a single leap is sufficient. That leap he has taken. He is again in my memory as the favourite of his poor mother—the laughing eyed young pet of a—pshaw—of an old fool; for why am I crying."

Little Mary had insensibly drawn herself towards the old philosopher, and, without uttering a word, pressed his hand, and put her handkerchief to his eyes. The boy also now left his parent walked up to his grandfather and leaning his elbow on the old man's knees, and turning up his round cheek, said, "then you won't take papa away?"

"No! you little impudent rascal—but I'll take you away; and when your mother comes for you, I will treat her so well, that I'll make your father follow after."

Thus came happiness at the heels of ruin.—If husbands oftener appreciated the exquisite and heavenlike affection of their wives, many happier firesides would be seen. One in love and one in mind, ought to be the motto of every married pair. And fathers would many times check improvidence, if they were to make use of affection and kindness, rather than prejudices and strictness. C. E. E.

IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTEND FOR THE FAITH."

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

PRELIMINARY INQUIRY.

MESSRS EDITORS: A friend, of your denomination, handed me, not long since an extra sheet of the GOSPEL ADVOCATE and IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR; in which I find that you call upon the friends of religion, of every name and denomination, to aid you in the important work of investigation; and upon your learned opponents to enter your columns, and convince the publick, if they can, that your sentiments are either erroneous or pernicious. I would inform you that I wish to avail myself of the invitation; and that I desire to enter your columns to investigate the everlasting concerns of time and eternity with that spirit whose fruits are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, faith, meekness, and temperance.

But before I commence the investigation I want that you should answer me one question: DO YOU BELIEVE THERE IS TO BE A DAY OF JUDGEMENT AFTER THE RESURRECTION? When you answer this question, I will then commence my argument; and if my life and health will permit, I will continue it until the subject is brought to a close. Yours, &c.

G. W. B.

Sullivan, March 23, 1827.

N. B. If the signature is not correct our friend will please notice it in his next.

REPLY.

That our correspondent may not delay the promised argument, we take the earliest opportunity to declare, that WE DO NOT BELIEVE THERE IS TO BE A DAY OF JUDGEMENT AFTER THE RESURRECTION OF MANKIND, IN THE COMMON ACCEPTATION OF THE TERMS.—In other words, we do not believe, that mankind are to be tried, judged, or condemned, after the resurrection spoken of by Paul in the xv. chapter of his Epistle to the Corinthians.

We thank our correspondent for accepting our invitations, and assure him that his conciliatory feelings as he has expressed them, shall be duly reciprocated. E.

ASSERTIONS WITHOUT PROOF.

It would seem that certain clergymen are bent on doing all in their power to mislead their hearers and keep them in ignorance. Misrepresentations of the most gross and disgusting character, are uttered in the pulpit by the pretended ambassadors of Jesus; and it requires the utmost stretch of charity to induce the belief that they are justified by ignorance. But mankind are becoming too enlightened to be imposed upon with impunity. Children, well instructed in the sublime doctrine of God's impartial benevolence, can detect, expose, and refute, the assertions of our calumniators. These thoughts were suggested by a line handed us on Monday last to the following effect:

"Mr. McMaster, in his discourse yesterday, at the Presbyterian church, made the following statements or declarations; viz. That UNIVERSALISTS have not so much faith as the Devil;—quoting the passage where it is said by a demoniac 'why comest thou hither to torment us before the time?'—and meaning to prove by this, the certainty of future punishment. And soon after, in defining faith, he said that the essence of it is Charity."

Now were we not in a very grave mood, at this moment, we might attempt to show how ridiculous this "Rev." calumniator would appear when stripped of his infallibility! But we will be serious.—Now, pray, Mr. McMaster, if this article should ever meet thine eye, be so condescending as to tell us why the Universalists have not as much faith as their Presbyterian neighbours? We believe in God—in Christ—in the testimony of all the holy prophets—in the efficacy of the ransom paid for all men; and we do entreat thee, kind Sir, to tell us in what point we fall short of believing all that is required of us? And in return for the favour we ask, we will tender the assertion, that our good Presbyterian brethren believe just as much as the devil, and no more,—for the devils believe and tremble; and so do the calvinists. E.

NEW PUBLICATION.

We have received the second number of a weekly paper, entitled the UTICA MAGAZINE, issued from the office of the Oneida Observer. From its contents we conclude it is designed to promote the doctrine of universalism; but not finding the name of its editor on its pages, we can say no more than that we desire it may prove serviceable to the cause of truth. The terms are one dollar and fifty cents a year, if paid in advance, two dollars if paid at the end of six months; and two dollars fifty cents if paid at the expiration of the year. We hope the publisher will, in adding another to the list of periodicals already established, meet with such success as shall warrant its continuance.

MESSRS. EDITORS: During a tour to the east a few weeks since, my ears were frequently saluted with strange tales and anecdotes relating to the self-styled 'Brigadier General of Jesus Christ,' and his coadjutors in office. There were many of them such barefaced insults to community, that I was seriously inclined to doubt the veracity of them; for I could not be so uncharitable as to believe that an enlightened and christian people (as I have ever took them to be) would suffer such unwarrantable outrages upon decency and morality, to be practised among them! There was one of those tales however, related to me by a gentleman of such respectability and candour, that I could not for a moment disbelieve it; he said, he held himself accountable at any time, if called upon, to prove by the testimony of the mouth of two or three respectable witnesses, the truth of the same. He stated that a certain clergyman, (whose name I have since forgotten) who resides in the vicinity of Vernon, Oneida co. while officiating at the altar, (and as we would naturally conclude, preaching the gospel, which is glad tidings of great joy to all people,) made in substance, the following remark to his congregation:—that if there were any then in his presence, that refused to join his church, they were requested to dispose of their property immediately, and move away.

Query. Ought we not to give the reverend gentleman great credit for being so charitable as to permit the unfortunate out-casts to dispose of their property before their departure? and for not compelling the poor wretches to go away naked?

STEPHEN.

FROM THE NANTUCKET INQUIRER.

SUPPORT OF THE GOSPEL MINISTRY.

We have recently perused a small pamphlet, put forth by the "American Tract Society," purporting to be a discourse by "Rev. James Bennett, president of Rotherham College England," on supporting the Gospel Ministry. In reading this work, we are unable to say which of these two feelings predominated—astonishment or diversion. The revered writer takes this appropriate text: "If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?"—The whole object of this homily, is to enforce the extraordinary claims of the priesthood upon the property of the laity. After adducing the examples of some of the Apostles who considered the "workman worthy of his hire;"—the pious author stumbles a little at the case of Paul, who "wrought with his own hands to minister to his wants," saying that he only did this occasionally, or was assisted by churches at a distance, &c. But we shall presently see how these examples are improved upon.

The reverend gentleman thus estimates the value of brains.

"The question arises, then, what sum is necessary to answer the ends of justice? to determine this, we must compare the services of ministers, with those of others who benefit society by their talents and their toils. Mental services are adjudged worthy of a higher recompense than mere physical, or bodily powers; because they demand the exercise of the higher qualities of our nature, and are more difficult to be procured than mere muscular force. If then, the recompense given to physicians, counsellors, and others, whose intellectual benefits their fellow men, be the standard, I ask whether ministers are justly paid? Are they not frequently put off with that which is given to the mechanic or labourer, for mere muscle and sinew?"

He proceeds to particularize the exact proportion which ought to be contributed out of the substance of each individual, so as to produce a comfortable income" for these disinterested supervisors of our spiritual concerns, viz.

"Such a remuneration as the tribe of Levi enjoyed, under the ancient dispensation.--- What this was, we may learn from what has already been said, that a twelfth part of the population had a tenth of the produce of the land, besides cities with their suburbs, and certain parts of the offerings of the Lord"---

Being just ten per centum---and his reverence further saith, that he and his brethren cannot be satisfied with any thing less---for they wish not only to live respectably and above board, but to be "examples to the flock of all that is useful and benevolent."

Thus it may be seen how desirous the clergy are to get one tenth part of our property.--- The above tract is the production of the famous American Tract Society.

A WORD TO OUR PATRONS.

This number completes the FIRST QUARTER of the year, and of the Fifth Volume of this paper. Three months ago, the editors and publishers of the Advocate embarked in the hazardous undertaking, and "cast their bread upon the waters," with the determination that every faculty of body and soul should be devoted to the cause. Their ALL was placed at hazard, by assuming the responsibility of the establishment; and their more than all was jeopardized by the undertaking. Obstacles which none but ourselves know any thing about, have arisen from time to time, calculated to discourage any but those who are determined to persevere; but they have been encountered and overcome. Our friends have been kind—very kind; and considering the pressure of the times, have done better by us than we had anticipated. But few are aware of the vast expense of the establishment. Our expenditures amount to twenty-seven dollars a week, which is no trifling sum for us to raise and pay.

The above will justify us in making the following REQUEST. We desire and request our subscribers to remember us. Although many of our patrons have been prompt in remitting their favours, yet a great many have not yet sent the sum stipulated to be paid in advance, and are, therefore, according to the terms of the paper, under obligation to pay two dollars, before the expiration of the next Quarter. But to convince our friends that we have no desire to speculate, we now agree, that those who have not found it convenient to pay in advance, shall each be entitled to a receipt in full for the fifth volume, by forwarding ONE DOLLAR AND FIFTY CENTS before the fifteenth day of April next, addressed to J. Guiteau, Esq. P. M. Buffalo, N. Y.

Now, brethren, we know you can raise the above amount, without injury to yourselves or families, and by doing so, you will do us a very great favour. And farther, by being prompt, you will save to yourselves fifty cents; for after the time above specified, we shall be compelled to exact the full amount. BARR-

WEN want you help us? If you will, you shall be entitled to our thanks, and most devoted services.

Portic Department.

The beauty of the following lines richly entitles them to a place in our poetic department. They were written by the late Lyndon Arnold, Esq. of this town, on the death of Mr. BENJAMIN MARSHALL, late Tyler of St. John's Lodge, in this place, who fell dead at the door of the Lodge, immediately on the last Brother leaving the room.---Providence Paper.

With age, with want, infirmity oppress,
Death said to Marshall thou shalt shortly rest;
I see no reason for thy tarrying here
But fear of me, and me 'tis vain to fear.

No wife remains with thee thy grief to share.
No tender infants to demand thy care;
Few are thy comforts, numerous are thy woes,
And few thy friends but what the Lodge compose.

Say with one blow shall I thy soul release,
And send it joyful to the realms of peace?
The sage repli'd, these things O death, are true!
One boon I ask, and then submit to you.

Those genuine friends, the brothers of my heart,
Whom kind affection prompted to impart
The means of living to my feeble age,
And still sustain me tottering on the stage,

This night in social brotherhood convene,
My wish, O death, would lead me to the scene,
There when the lodge in harmony shall close,
And eash one hasten homeward to repose,

I'll wait thy coming---thy command obey,
And through thy regions meet eternal day.
'Twas reason's claim, nor death refus'd the grace,
But met him punctual at the time and place.

CONTROVERSIAL.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

I shall now take up the remaining queries of "A," and attempt an answer. I will state the substance of these inquiries by changing the method, though not the meaning. For "A" will bear me witness, that he did not very accurately consult arrangement in bringing forward his questions. Hoping that if I here misrepresent "A's" meaning, he will candidly correct me. I state the arrangement as follows:

1st. As Eve was tempted by some object unconnected with herself, was it the being mentioned, Rev. xii. 9, or who was it?

2d. "What was the first estate, from which the angels fell, where were they reserved, and unto what great day?" And where were the Sodomites, &c., "suffering the vengeance of eternal fire?" Jude, vi. 7.

3d. "What fire is prepared for the devil and his angels, and how shall accursed man be associated with them in punishment?"

4th. "If the wicked are sent to hell" ("A" takes for granted, that hell means endless misery,) for sins committed here, and continue there under the influence of their unholy and rebellious passions, will their increased guilt purchase exemption from punishment?

5th. If Universalism be the doctrine of the Bible, seeing we are liable to various evils in this world, would it not be wisdom in us to commit suicide? and are not war, pestilence, and all other causes of premature death, blessings instead of evils?

These questions I believe, as I intended they should, embrace the sum of that part of "A's" communication which they are designed to include, and it shall now be my object, candidly to examine their merits in the order in which they stand.

1st. Then, I begin with the case of Eve,—the first temptation of which we have any account. "A" admits, that "Eve was tempted by some object unconnected with herself, from which, and other statements, I infer, that "A" believes in the common doctrine of the rebellion and fall of angels. We will view this subject in the light this doctrine presents. "Eve was tempted by some object unconnected with herself." What reason can be given for this? The usual answer to this question by most orthodox people is, (and without which I apprehend there can be none) that our first parents were entirely destitute of any unholy nature or passion, and therefore, could not sin without a tempter "unconnected" with themselves. And what other view, concerning the first pair than, that they were created immortal could be entertained, on the hypothesis that natural death was introduced into the world by their transgression. If this is not the belief of the orthodox now, let them declare it to the world. And if it be not their belief now, let it be remembered, they are not as orthodox as formerly. But we know it is the faith of some, and "A" evidently betrays the same sentiment. Who, then, tempted Eve? The "old serpent, which is the devil," &c. Who, or what, is the old serpent? Answer, he was formerly an angel of light, but rebelled in heaven and was "cast out into the earth." Was not this angel as holy before he rebelled, as Eve was before she was tempted? It must be credulity mingled with absolute folly that would answer in the negative. If Eve either could not, or did not sin without being "tempted by some object unconnected with herself," could, or did this angel sin without being "tempted by some object unconnected with himself? If the holiness of Eve was her security against temptation in herself, was the holiness of the angel less? This view of the subject, makes it absolutely necessary, that the angel should have had a tempter "unconnected" with himself. For the sake of conveying our ideas, we will call the angel who tempted Eve the first. But who was the tempter of the first angel? As this is said to have taken place in heaven we should think the answer would be, some other angel; who by the bye could no more sin without being "tempted by some objected unconnected with" himself, than the first angel could. Reader, our labour here is but just commenced. For the second angel must also have been tempted "by some object unconnected with" himself. And why not also, the third, and fourth, and fifth, and so on, "ad infinitum!" The very argument which makes it necessary to believe, that "Eve was tempted by some object unconnected with herself," positively demands the belief, that no holy angel in heaven could sin without being "tempted by some object unconnected with" himself. According to this doctrine, no angel then could have been exempt from sin. This tempting disposition must have flown through all the hosts of heaven, and could not have stopped short of the throne of God!!!! Reader, I admit the conclusion is horrid, beyond description, but I am not the author of it. If this doctrine be true then He who "cannot be tempted with evil nor tempteth any man," must have been the first tempter!!! And I call on "A" or any one else to show, by fair reasoning, that this conclusion is false. I would merely suggest, in passing, whether it is indeed orthodox to call Eve's sin, "original sin," if a sinner tempted her, and another sinner tempted Eve's tempter, &c. &c. &c.

Before I give my opinion whether Eve was tempted by the same being mentioned, Rev. xiii. 9, we will ascertain, as well as we can by the light afforded by the context who, or what that being was. Hoping for the reasonable indulgence of "A," and of all concerned, who know that this chapter, as also the whole book of the Apocalypse, abounds in figurative language, the following brief view of this chapter is humbly submitted, but I must omit many particulars.

1st. At the 7th ver. we are told "there was war in heaven." Which, doubtless, is the "heaven" in which the "woman" and the "great red dragon" appeared, ver. 1, 3. And the "dragon," ver. 3, is the same as the great dragon, "that old serpent, called the devil and satan, which deceiveth the whole world," ver. 9.

2d. By the "heaven," in which the woman and the dragon were seen, I understand the Jewish church-state, and by the woman, I understand the Jewish church, itself; from which Jesus, who was to rule all nations descended, according to the flesh. By the Sun, I understand the light of the new Jerusalem when the old priesthood should be changed, and the church rise above that dispensation which had only shone by reflection, represented by the "moon under her feet;" and by the "twelve stars," I understand the "twelve tribes of Israel."

3d. It is well known, that in the early days of the church, the land of Judea was a Roman province, and continued to be so for many years. And though this contributed much to the propagation of Christianity, yet, it is equally well known, that there was a formidable opposition to it, first, by the Jews, and afterwards, by the Romans. By the "great red dragon," I understand that carnal spirit which led the Jews in dread array to persecute Christ and his followers, and which disposition was afterwards inherited by the Romans, to whom it appears to be more particularly applied. See the 17th chap. where the Papal Church is figuratively described, and represented as having its seat at Rome. "The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth." "And the ten horns are ten kings," vers. 9, 12, Comp. ver. 3, of our context, where the dragon "drew the third part of the stars of heaven," by which I understand the Jews. Comp. ver. 1, who commenced the bloody work of persecution, and, thereby they were deprived of that holy dispensation which teaches to return good for evil: they were cast "to the earth," ver. 4.

4th. It must be kept in mind, that though the character of the church was changed, it still retained its first representation under the figure of a female. See chap. xvii. 9, above. Hence, at ver. 6, it is said, "the woman fled into the wilderness, &c. that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and three score days." By which, it is generally believed, is meant the apostasy of the christian church, which continued twelve hundred and sixty prophetick days, or the same number of years. Comp. Ez. iv. 6. While this state of things remained, "there was war in heaven." But the cause of Jesus, carried on by the spirit of love and good will to man, is represented as coming off victorious. The cause of error and wickedness is represented as being "cast out into the earth," (or out of the church) and all its pernicious attendants, persecution, slander, and evils of every kind, were cast out with it, ver. 9. "I know of but one principal cause of temptation, and that has caused the best of men to exclaim, "O wretched man that I am!" Rom. vii. 14--25. And that cause seems to be almost entirely overlooked by most professors in looking for another. Must we then suppose, that the principal tempter is the devil of orthodoxy? No. "But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own desire, and enticed," James i. 14, 15. Were not the Jews, Romans, and all the persecutors of Christ and his cause, moved by their unhallowed desires to promote their carnal interests? Was not this Eve's tempter when she saw that the fruit was "to be desired" to make one wise? "To "A's" inquiry, then, whether the being mentioned, Rev. xii. 9, was Eve's tempter, I reply, I think the principle is the same in both cases, "for the devil sinneth from the beginning," 1 John iii. 8, Comp. ver. 5. I have not room in this communication to go through with this 12th chapter of Revelation, neither will I say that I am certainly correct in all that I have said upon it; but I am willing the publick should know my opinion, that I may be corrected, if I am in an error about it.

Here it is plain, that "A" takes for granted, that angels, in the kingdom of immortal glory, became sinners, and fell from thence. "A" would, probably, then call immortal felicity their "first estate." The first question should be, who were the angels mentioned by Jude 3? Are there no earthly beings called angels in our version? We think "A" will not assert this. See Rev. 1; 20. Mat. 24, 31, and other places. And nothing in my judgement, but the assumed, popular doctrine of the "fall of angels," would lead any one to suppose, that any other than earthly beings are meant here. In Kneeland's translation, I find the following note taken from the Improved Version, on this subject. "The messengers who watched not daily over their own principality, but deserted their proper habitation, he hath kept with unknown chains under darkness (punished them with judicial blindness of mind) to the judgement of a great day i.e. when they were destroyed by a plague." Alluding to the falsehood and punishment of the spies. Numbers 14. See Simpson's Essays p. 210. Let the epistle of Jude be impartially examined, and I think the above opinion will be confirmed.

The incidents mentioned in the 5th 6th and 7th verses of this epistle, are urged by Jude as warnings to those to whom he wrote. Peter mentioning similar facts, says they were for examples to those who should afterwards live ungodly. Jude speaking of Sodom and Gomorrah, says, they "are set forth for an example" &c. But will it do to say, the inhabitants of those cities are "set forth" for an example in another world, there to suffer the vengeance of unending wrath? This question was settled before Jude came on the stage, by an approved Prophet of the Lord. See Ezk. xvi. 50th v. to the end of the chapter. But this is nothing new. It is only another deplorable picture of the miserable system I am examining. Orthodox people contradict themselves, and each other, when they think it will serve their purpose.— They also contradict the servants of God who spoke as they were moved by the holy spirit. And not being content with that, here they set Jude and Ezekiel at telling two opposite stories, both of which could not be true if they were opposed to each other. It is a lamentable fact, that the holy scriptures have suffered more from professed friends, than they ever can from open enemies. The learned Whitby who certainly never intended to write favourably to my sentiments, says the fire which consumed the cities of the plain, continued burning in the earth from the days of Abraham to the beginning of the second century, a period of more than two thousand years. And if it did not burn more than half so long it would be sufficient to entitle it to be called aiouion fire, in the scriptural sense of that term.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

As I was, a few days since, examining the Pagan notions of calvinism, as set forth in the larger catechism agreed upon by the assembly of divines at Westminster, with the assistance of commissioners from the church of Scotland and received by the several Presbyterian churches in America," I was forcibly struck with the following question and answer, which I copy from that book:

Q. 85. Death being the wages of sin, why are not the righteous delivered from death, seeing all their sins are forgiven in Christ?

A. The righteous shall be delivered from death itself, at the last day, and even in death are delivered from the sting and curse of it, so that, although they die it is out of God's love to free them perfectly from sin and misery, and to make them capable of farther communion with Christ in glory, which they then enter upon."

Upon this curiosity I must spend a few words, and I will take up the answer in course. "The righteous shall be delivered from death itself, at the last day." What advantage have the righteous here, over the wicked? The whole human race are to be raised, the Presbyterians say, at the "last day," and this delivering of the righteous from death, at that time, can be no more than a resurrection. Here then all classes are even; and of the length of time that this deliverance is to last, we will next speak. The "wicked," say the calvinists, are to be punished eternally; and if so they must be "eternally" delivered from death, and the righteous cannot exist longer than eternally, let what will betide. Thus far, then, there is no advantage, to either party. I proceed:— "And even in death are delivered from the sting and curse of it, so that, although they die, it is out of God's love, to free them perfectly from sin and misery, and to make them capable of farther communion with Christ in glory, which they then enter upon." How are the righteous delivered, in death, from the sting and curse? They die just like other men, that is, all men die with the same "sting" and the same "curse," so far as regards this feature of the case. Some persons die with less pain than others, but we have yet to learn that these are always what the calvinists here call "the righteous." So far, then the two parties are equal, and no advantage is yet gained, by either side. But it was God's love which caused them to die, that they might be freed entirely from sin.— Very well: the same "love" drowned the world to free men from sin; the same "love" destroyed the cities of the plain, that their inhabitants might be freed from all sin and misery; and the same "love" still enables us to lay aside our earthly and imperfect habitation, and with it all sin and misery, as well as the propensities that beget them. Still there is no advantage to the calvinist, in this matter, which the Universalist does not enjoy in common with him. At the close of this answer we are told that the righteous, when they die, enter upon communion with Christ in glory! This is the strangest of the whole matter. Let us suppose that Moses was one of the righteous: then he entered upon communion with Christ, in glory, when he died, where he has continued ever since. How, then, is Moses to be delivered from death at the last day? But the more important question in this matter is, what will become of this doctrine of the "last day?"

and of the "general judgement" which calvinists tell us of, according to this answer? Is this same Moses, who has been so many thousand years in communion with Christ, in glory, yet, at same future day, to be called up and judged? If so, for what? Has he been ever since his death enjoying the bliss of heaven; while it is still a matter of doubt whether he is entitled to such happiness? Suppose it should prove, at the "judgement day," that his character was not understood, and that he had been improperly disposed of—will he then have been dealt with according to the deeds done in the body?—This case, it will be readily seen, is but a supposed one, yet it is a case that will apply to the whole human family, and by bringing it to view, we are enabled to discover that the Westminster assembly of divines aided by the commissioners of the church of Scotland, had overturned the notion of a future "last day," entirely.

This same catechism, at the words, the righteous are delivered from the sting and curse of it (death) refers to, and quotes Corinthians, xv. 55, thus: "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, [hades] where is thy victory?" My readers may not all be aware what word it is, which is here translated "grave." It is the Greek word hades, and the same word occurs in ten other passages of the New Testament, and no more—in all, eleven times. I will quote each passage, before I remark upon them.

Matt. xvi. 18. And upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell [hades] shall not prevail against it.

Matt. xi. 23. And thou Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell. [hades.]

Luke x. 15. And thou Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shall be thrust down to hell [hades.]

Luke xvi. 23. And in hell [hades] he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, &c.

Acts ii. 27. Because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, [hades.] &c.

Acts ii. 31. He seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, [hades.] &c.

Rev. i. 18. I am he that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive forevermore amen; and have the keys of hell [hades.] and of death.

Rev. vi. 8. And I looked, and behold, a pale horse; and his name that sat on him was death, and hell [hades] followed with him.

Rev. xx. 13. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell [hades] delivered up the dead which were in them, &c.

Rev. xx. 14. And death and hell [hades] were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death.

Here are ten cases where the word hades occurs, and the reader will see that in each case it is translated hell. The eleventh place where the word occurs is Corinthians, xv. 55, already quoted, but here the word is translated grave, for fear that mankind should believe the doctrine of Universal Salvation, as taught by all God's holy Prophets since the world began. To say, O Hell, where is thy victory? would not favour the doctrine of endless punishment, as it would call in question the durability of the place. Yet this "grave," is the same place in which the rich man was when he lifted up his eyes, being in torment, see Luke xvi. 23, as quoted above, and the same which, in Rev. xx. 14, was cast into the lake of fire.

So much for the Westminster catechism, and the prevailing calvinistick errors and heresies that can now only be bolstered and preserved by the ignorance of their devotees, against the weight of unanswerable arguments which are daily brought against them.

GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."

MEANS OF GRACE.

Nothing is more common from preachers and others, than the sound of means of grace. Like many other things, which pass for divinity, it is indisputably a mistake, yet, no doubt, is well meant. The expression, means of information or knowledge, is true and proper; but means of grace is an expression, untrue and improper. To understand this in the best manner, and to see how unfit and inapplicable the sentiment is, in relation to the system of truth; I will,

1. Speak of Grace in its extensive sense, as emanating from God himself.

2. Of Grace in its common use and acceptance in the affairs of man with man.

3. That Grace emanating from God is dependent on no means, which man can use or perform.

1. I will speak of Grace in its extensive sense, as emanating from God himself. Grace, is favour, or love or good will; and grace in God in relation to man, is his favour or good will or love towards or for man. This love or good will is said to be everlasting; i. e. as ancient as eternity, and as unchangeable as God himself. In other words, Grace may be considered as the natural and necessary expression of the divine nature towards rational creatures, without which expression, we never could have known what character ought to have been attributed to the Almighty. That God is all powerful and wise, is proved, from creation; but the nature and disposition of God, made known in all his works is, that, in a moral sense, God is favourable to and has a good will for, his creatures. In short that God is love. Hence it is evident, that favour or love or good will from God to man, which is termed Grace, is not procured by means or any qualifications in man; but is, simply, the expression of the divine nature, and that conduct contrary to this of love and good will, would be a denial of his own nature. Hence, the term 'God of Grace.' My idea, in fine, is this; that God cannot be otherwise than a God of love; he cannot act inconsistent with such a disposisition; he is unalterably and of necessity and everlastingly a God of love and grace. Hence, then, all the blessings of both providence and grace, are communications flowing spontaneously from God, which no being ever did or could procure, and in relation to which, means of man have had in the first place no existence, and in the next place where they have existed, have had no manner of effect. — God is love, essentially and eternally so, consequently all that we can do can neither take from, add to, or alter in the least. Creation was the effect of infinite power, wisdom and goodness; Providence is carried on by the same power, wisdom and goodness; and redemption is an expression of the same perfections; all these teach us that God is the same in all his works; the same yesterday, to-day and forever.

It will be necessary to say something of the communication of God's love or good will, which most writers believe to be confined to something supernatural, which they call grace. All nations have a communication from the works of God, and from the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world, that God is good and doeth good to all his creatures, and that his moral character is love, is goodness. But to make this plainer still; what can we know of God as a wise, good and powerful being, but from the communications, which he has already made, and those, which he is universally making of himself? If, then, God cannot be otherwise than a God of love or grace; all the communications of himself are communications of his grace; and the book of nature is alike open for the instruction of all men, and teaches this goodness of the Deity. — Notwithstanding this general book of information; there are the scriptures as a further assistant in the knowledge of God, together with the admonitions of providence and the influences of the spirit to assist us.

This grace, in its extensive sense, is God's friendship towards men; and the communication of it in his word and works.

2. Of grace in its common use and acceptance in the affairs of man, with man. Grace, here, means favour, or friendship. The common expression of one man to another was the following, 'If I have found grace in thy sight.' Grace, likewise, means the bestowment of favours, the forgiveness of injuries and assistance in troubles; yet the genuine idea of real friendship comprehends all these; that man who is a real friend is ready to forgive, willing to communicate both in advice, instruction and property, and feels himself bound to do to others as he would wish them to do to himself.

3. Grace, emanating from God, is dependent on no means, which man can use or perform for its bestowment.

We have proved, that if God acts at all, he must act gratuitously, because this is his nature, and he cannot deny himself. This proposition is sufficient to show us, that the means, which man can use, can make no alteration with God, either as to his purposes or his works: for his purposes are gratuitous and so are all his works. This is a truth, that God is in one mind and none can turn him. His counsel shall stand and he will do all his pleasure; we are informed, likewise, that his purposes are purposes of grace. He purposed in himself in the dispensation of the fulness of times to gather together in one all things in Christ. This is his purpose and grace, which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord before the world began. Now if God be the friend and protector of his creatures, and if his nature inclines him to do good unto all and to extend his tender mercies over all his works; if this, I say, be the nature and purpose of God from eternity and can admit of no change or alteration; then no means ever used or performed have had any hand in their excitement or their bestowment. I will mention a number of the most essential particulars, which are in full proof of this position. When man apostatised God made known to him his design of mercy. "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." Here, I ask, did man do any thing, or use any means, by which the promise of grace was made to him? or did he use any means which begat this gracious disposition in his Creator? The answer must be in the negative. Then it will follow, that, as God is unchangeable, this gracious disposition was essentially, originally and unchangeably in God; he was not moved to it by means or motives without himself; but acted graciously in this case because it was his nature so to do, and because this his nature excited him to do light in mercy. When Christ came into the world, did he come of himself, or did God the Father send him? Christ himself answers this question, and declares, that he did not come of himself; but that the father sent him. He says again, that God so loved the world, that he sent his only begotten Son into the world, &c. From these and a vast number of similar texts, it is evident that no means were used with God to make him propitious; but that all the grace displayed in the gift of his Son originated in himself; it was his own purpose and grace. Here we shall see the amazing and dangerous absurdity of calvinistic preachers, who assert, that Christ pacified his Father and made him propitious to man. It is incontrovertible, that this is departing from the account, which the scriptures give in this case, and it is laying aside all sense and reason and following a tradition, as dangerous as it is absurd. When the spirit was given in the day of pentecost, and the Apostles were filled with the Holy Ghost, and spake with tongues, was this the effect of man's means, or was it the spontaneous act of God's nature or grace? the latter most certainly. Men and angels were spectators of the scene, and were astonished at what they saw, but the grace was the grace of him, whose nature is love. No means were used, that produced this remarkable effusion of the spirit, and the apostles, on whom the spirit rested were as much surprised and astonished as the spectators. It was, in short, the wonderful work of God. It was a work to be attributed entirely to God, as a God gracious and merciful.

Salvation is called God's salvation; he is called God our Saviour, and our salvation is called God's work; it is his eternal plan, counsel, scheme or purpose, which he purposed in himself. In short it is the Lord's doing and it is marvellous in our eyes.—The work or plan of man's salvation is so fixed as that all boasting is excluded from man. Man's place is at the footstool of God's mercy; with the angels he covers his face and his feet, and is swift in rehearsing and exalting redeeming grace, and in ascribing all the glory to him, that sitteth on the throne and unto the lamb forever and ever. Thus far we have found no means of grace performed by any creature, but all is the work of God.

It will now be inquired, whether the words, sacrament and prayer are not to be considered means of grace? Answer, they are means of knowledge, but not with propriety to be termed means of grace. Grace, as to its original plan and communication, as well as internal sanctification, is the gift of God.—How, then, can any thing which man can do be considered as means of that, which God gives, and to which man is naturally opposed? how can man be instrumental in procuring that, against which he has a total aversion? But it is inquired, whether there are not conditions of salvation, and whether the performance of those conditions does not amount to the idea of man's salvation? Answer, there are not, nor is it possible that there should be either conditions or means of grace or salvation, as it respects God's love or good will to man, because this has been and must be eternal from his nature; and it must be unchangeable from the immutability of God, and his purpose: Therefore means or conditions of grace or salvation, in such a sense, are wholly out of the question. Even Christ himself performed no conditions of God's grace or love to man; because God's love to mankind was antecedent to Christ's coming and was the cause of it. Hence that preaching, which represents Christ as procuring, or purchasing God's favour; or that faith and repentance in man are means of God's love or grace to man, is contrary to the whole of the oracles of truth, and incompatible with reason and a sound understanding.

Salvation has two significations in scripture, or is applied to two different periods; the first is, that eternal salvation, which is above in heaven: The second is that, which a believer enjoys on earth.—He, that believeth hath the witness in himself, enters into rest and rejoices with exceeding joy. He tastes and sees that the Lord is gracious and that there is joy and peace in believing. This is the present salvation. Now as to this salvation all the means appointed in the word are to be used; they are the use of the scriptures, prayer, meditation, conversation, searching the scriptures, guarding our lives and conversation, and following the use of reason unbended by prejudice. These, (in relation to the present salvation) are all means of instruction, calculated to instruct men in the knowledge of God their Saviour, in the truths of his everlasting love and good will to men and of their infinite obligation to him. All these means are designed not to obtain any thing from God, which he has not designed, but to come to the knowledge of that, which is designed and already prepared. So the apostle expresses it, coming to the knowledge of the truth, or of that which is designed and prepared.

REMARKS.

This subject teaches us, that the fate of all men, as to eternity, is unalterably fixed by him who made and governs the world. We have seen that if God acts at all he must act agreeably to his nature. His nature being goodness, he must, in communicating being or making creatures, produce them into existence with a design for as much happiness as their natures and situation would permit, it is, therefore, the nature of goodness to be communicative; and as God is happy as well as good; it will follow, that God delights to communicate goodness and happiness to his creatures. The design of this reasoning is to show that means of God's grace or favour are unnecessary who is willing to do above all that we can ask or think. I go further and say, that means to attain the divine favour or grace are unnecessary because that grace has always abounded. Why should we use means to obtain the favour of God, while we live upon it, are surrounded with it, and are supported by it in all our future prospects? The generation of men in all ages, have been kept from despair by confidence in the loving kindness of the Lord.

A number of texts are easily understood and their difficulties obviated from the above subject. Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling.—This is the present salvation, or the understanding and enjoyment of God's love or grace in time or in the present life. For the attainment of this knowledge and consequent enjoyment here, we are to work, to study and seek: Not to make God propitious; but to know that he is so: Not to make him our friend; but to see and know that he always was a friend: not to incline him to be merciful; but to see and know that he always was merciful and that his mercy endureth forever: Not to make him willing to save men; but to know, that he does will the salvation of all men, that this is his purpose and grace, which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord. It is in this sense we are to ask for knowledge as for silver and search for it as for hidden treasure; if we seek, likewise, we shall find; if we knock, it shall be opened. All these expressions teach us that there is a divine treasure of grace made sure for man, and he is to seek for this treasure and find it, not seek to make it. Besides, it would be absurd to set men to seek a treasure, when there was none. If, then, we are, called upon to seek a treasure, we may be sure, that there is a treasure laid up or reserved for us in heaven, otherwise why should we seek one?

Mark, xv. 18. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned. This text is explained by our subject; the belief here required is connected with salvation, for salvation is promised to them, that do believe.

The salvation promised is the present salvation and the truth to be believed is the everlasting love or grace of God to ourselves and all mankind. He, that believes it not is in condemnation or damnation; and will so remain, till he does see and believe. This damnation cannot be endless, for then this love or grace of God towards us could not exist; then there is nothing connected with salvation for us to believe. Thus faith may be considered a mean of the present salvation, or of seeing and enjoying the love of God; but not a mean of begetting or procuring God's love.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

Few of our readers it is presumed, are aware of the object and tendency of Sunday Schools; and but very few have ventured to express their feelings relative to the subject. As sentinels upon the walls of Zion, we feel in duty bound to attempt an exposure of the policy in which they originate, and the consequences resulting from them.

The friends of those schools have many specious pretences to favour their measures, and have for many years gone on with their operations without opposition or molestation. By simultaneous efforts in almost every part of this country, they have bro't them into popular favour; and having the good of souls in their mouths, as the ostensible motive, they have overawed those who have presumed to question the expediency or propriety of their plans; and by a series of successful experiments, have now attained that degree of influence which renders it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to correct the evil, or remove its effects.

But it is our business, not to bewail the past inattention of our fellow-citizens, but to search out the motives by which the friends of Sunday Schools are and have been actuated, and to lay before our readers the pernicious effects they have upon society. Like all other plans of a similar kind, that of establishing Sunday Schools is shielded by a pretended regard for the souls of our youth and children. If aught be urged against the measure, its friends are sure to reply to every objection by telling us that the salvation of many "immortal souls" will be secured by these means. But if that be the only object, it would seem that the friends of such establishments might spend their time, and the money procured from the publick to better advantage and for a better purpose. For when mankind have their confidence so impaired in their Creator, as to believe it necessary to do something to procure his favour or save their children from his wrath, they might about as well erect an iron Moloch and sacrifice their offspring to appease its vengeance! But are we bound to believe that the salvation of souls is in reality the primary object with those who are most engaged in establishing these institutions?—Perhaps not. Indeed there are many reasons for believing that the good of souls has but little if any influence on the minds or actions of such persons, among which we mention the following:

1. Those who are most engaged in establishing these schools are the most backward in paying of their substance to defray the expense. Instances are very rare in which clergymen, (who are the most engaged in promoting such institutions) contribute any thing of consequence towards purchasing books or defraying the incidental expenses of these schools. Many, who live on the bounties of the publick and are cradled in the lap of luxury, pay nothing for such purposes; and it is fair to conclude that they care more for a "good living" than for the souls of the children who are sought after and brought into these institutions.

2. The promoters of Sunday Schools make use of every art to instil into the minds of children their own principles or tenets, and are careful to keep from them any thing calculated to impair their confidence in the dogmas of modern orthodoxy. Ministers of various denominations, it is true, are actively engaged in promoting Sunday Schools, and appear to the common observer, to be only intent on communicating useful information, without regard to sectarian opinions. But a careful examination of their proceedings will convince the most obstinate, that their avowed object is not their real one. For we have presbyterian Sunday Schools; baptist Sunday Schools; methodist Sunday Schools; and episcopalian Sunday Schools. In one the children have books and tracts which are exclusively calvinistick; in another those which are favourable to methodism; in another such as are suited to the baptist denomination; and in another those which are truly episcopalian, in which the child is taught to reverence the priest—say his creed, catechism, &c. and do sundry other things like a good churchman. From all this it appears, that the primary object with those who are most anxious to promote these institutions, is, to instil into the tender minds of children and youth the peculiar dogmas of their respective parties; as if heaven could be gained by an unmeaning assent to what a child cannot understand.

The above reasons for believing that sectarianism lies at the bottom of these proceedings, are not the only ones that could be urged; but they are sufficient to convince the reflecting mind, that the object is not altogether so justifiable as has been imagined. In fact, a desire to proselyte seems to be the moving cause of the great machinery which is in operation in our country, and it is high time that the publick were apprised of the fact.

It would not be a very difficult matter to show, that these Sunday Schools have a bad tendency;—for whoever reflects upon the subject with candour, will be convinced that much of that sectarian prejudice, and a portion of that fanaticism, which prevails in our country, is engendered in those institutions. Indeed who has not known more or less evil to result from them?

But we are told that children are taught to read the BIBLE, which in itself is good. We admit that children in those schools are taught to read the scriptures, and that it is a good thing for them to become conversant with the sacred pages of holy writ. But is it not a fact, that they are not only taught to read the bible, but are instructed how to understand it according to the views of their teachers? It cannot be denied, that every opportunity is improved to instill into the mind of the child who attends these schools, the peculiar dogmas of the sect which has the controul of the institution. Hence a calvinistick school is so managed as to impress the tender mind with the sentiments of those who are appointed to give instruction; and so in relation to all other denominations. Teachers are carefully selected, and none are permitted to superintend a class but those who are faithful to teach their peculiar dogmas.

From the foregoing remarks it appears, that unless it be a good thing for children to be doctrinated before they are capable of forming an opinion from facts, these schools have in a general sense an evil tendency, and particularly a pernicious effect upon the rising generation. This being the case, it is high time for parents to inquire into these matters, and so far as their influence extends, to prevent the evil from spreading any farther.

But another consideration remains to be noticed, which particularly concerns those who believe in the impartial and equal mercy of God. If they are worthy of the name of believers in the salvation of all men, they feel a lively interest in keeping the minds of their children from being filled with those anti-christian dogmas which represent our heavenly Father to be an angry and unmerciful tyrant. How, then, can they consent to have their children hear the character of God misrepresented, and his mercy as well as justice impeached? They cannot. And it is believed, that with one consent, our brethren of the abrahamick faith will set their faces against those sectarian institutions. Universalists would not consent to have their children instructed in the doctrines of Mahomet; and why should we be willing to have their tender minds polluted with the pagan notion of a vicarious sacrifice, an angry God, a dreadful hell of brimstone, and an infinite devil?

The foregoing thoughts were suggested by reading an article in favour of Sunday Schools, in the Western Recorder of March 27, which, with unqualified assurance intimates, that every child shall be brought into these schools to receive instruction at the hands of our spiritual guides, who think none others capable of taking charge of our children. We have neither time nor room to exhibit the sentiments of the writer in their proper light this week, but shall in continuing our remarks hereafter on this subject, notice such parts of the article as concern our readers and the publick. LINES ON T. G. A.

WHO DIED NOVEMBER 30TH, 1825.

To the Rev. Mr. O——, who officiated at his funeral, and in addressing the mourning friends, suggested a fear that a “dark curtain” was drawn between the deceased and heaven.

Our lifeless friend we here behold,
His eyes are clos'd his clay is cold;
The vital spark of life has fled,
And he is number'd with the dead.

His dust is laid beneath the sod;
His soul again return'd to God;
To dwell in heaven or earth or air,
Or find a home we know not where.

He was the friend of age and youth;
The friend of justice peace and truth;
And though with wealth he was not blest
A friend to all who were distress'd.

With feeling heart humane and kind;
A sound clear head, a taste refin'd;
And form'd upon God's noblest plan,
A lib'ral minded honest man.

If there's a retribution day
When e'er we quit this earthly clay;
And if our father God above,
Rewards the righteous with his love.

Sure heaven's bliss, our friend has seen;
And no “dark curtain” hangs between;
But in the mansions of the blest,
His peaceful shade shall ever rest.

RELIGION.

There is nothing more common at this time than the frequent inquiry, "have you got religion?" It is urged again and again—"do get religion, it will make you so blest and so happy." Religion I will cheerfully and cordially admit in its true and real sense, of course must have this effect—but can there be any thing improper for us who are seeking for knowledge and truth, to ask what these mean by religion? If you inquire, is it the Mahomedan belief? no—Heathen or Jew? no—Christian—not exactly. Then please explain.

Why, come to our meetings, read our creed and join our society; when that is done God is honoured, and a soul saved. Have we not too much to fear, that this is the prime object of the leader, and in case of success the end of the follower, without reflecting on the one hand of the base presumption of taking the prerogative of Him who is in all, through all, and who created all and has without our agency established truth with a penalty annexed for its subversion, and on the other a criminal acquiescence without reflection? I ask then, is there not danger of a premature action, and of overthrowing the very thing we should support? Have we not reason to conclude that those who cry the loudest, and declaim the most should they make one proselyte, that they take him still farther into error than he even was before, "and if possible, make him ten fold more the child of hell, than themselves?" It is true, he may have a name among men, and that too of christian; but what will that profit him without the reality? "If the blind lead the blind, &c." a passage I am perfectly satisfied designed for the case in hand. I am sensible this exposition will by some be called heterodox; and once I would have so considered, or regarded it. But, nothing now would make me shudder more than to reflect that, I was bound to such despotism. As well might a coat of many colours, pass with a stranger for our standard uniform, or the real uniform itself for love of country.—I do not make these remarks as applying to this or that denomination, but with such as on whom it may bear to stop short and reflect, who, and what manner of spirit they are of, the nature and attributes of Deity, together with the relation they bear to him; and if possible fix on some rational principle that will be at unison with itself. To attain this object, I would recommend them to the Bible, before their minds are too far biassed by the creeds, sayings, and traditions of men. I challenge the world to shew me a favourite of heaven, a child of God, a christian (in these days) who has not been rationally and coolly made such; and whose actions do not denote liberality and general good; and whose object is to worship God, the real and true God alone. What would we think on seeing a company of extortioners passing for christians, the narrow miser, the ignorant bigot, the mad fanatic. Yet in a degree we witness this at every corner, and they imagine themselves safe because they have the name. Oh delusion, delusion; infatuation, the blind, the lame, when will you look and be healed; can it not in truth be said you worship an idol. If you do not worship the likeness of any thing, in substance, at the same time, if you embrace an error, with all your heart, you may be ranked with idolators to the neglect of the true worship. Look ye to it, and if you are in the path of truth, then abide; but if on the other hand, you awake and find yourselves in a road that you neither know from whence you come or whither you go, stop, inquire and reflect, it may be you are travelling from, in lieu of to your supposed object. And again, how often do we witness teachers subverting or concealing truth or inventing pretexts, false in themselves, to support some favourite doctrine, as though the word of God was in danger, or Deity himself would fall if a single error of theirs was exposed.

I am daily more and more convinced that there is but little true religion where professed the most, and am not without as great fears that there may be less with those who either make no profession or boastfully disregard it.

The word religion is a technical phrase—designed, in my view, to apply to a correct conception of Deity, together with our duty to him, ourselves and fellow men, which when once duly regulated, adhered in and submitted too with a calm, cool, consistent course of conduct, with resignation and love of truth, because it is such—is truth, is love, is every thing.

I have a very poor opinion of a person's love who only loves his own denomination and hates all others, and who condemns me, because I was born in a temperate and not in a torrid zone. And my opinion is quite as unfavourable of the religion of him who is not satisfied when he has endeavoured dispassionately to reason me out of my error. I do not think he has any authority to go farther, either in word or deed. He may with the same propriety use the cudgel as to display anger, and the sword with as much reason as the cudgel. T.

CONTROVERSIAL.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

BUFFALO CALVINISM, &c.

In the Western Recorder of April 3d, 1827, there is a letter from "the Rev. T. S. Harris, Missionary at Seneca, near Buffalo," from which some extracts will follow. Mr. Harris says that he has hopes that God has come near the poor Senecas, lately, &c. and that a revival is expected at the Mission station. Many of the Indians had cried in meeting, where a flood of tears ran down their faces; and one squaw stated before 200 people "that she felt she must repent, or her soul would be lost in an eternal hell!" with other circumstances, equally sensible and interesting. All this, and much more, of a like import, Mr. Harris states took place on Sunday the 11th day of March last. It may be well to bear the date in mind, as it will be found somewhat connected with other transactions, to be detailed below. The cause of this state of things Mr. Harris has kindly entrusted to us, so that we are not left at a loss for that important particular. The following is his account, in his own words: "Our Mission school was visited by the operations of the Holy Spirit, about the 1st of February. Several of the larger children were seen to be under deep conviction of sin. Our dear brother Clark, (the teacher of the school) was previously [note that "previously"] roused to unusual earnestness and faithfulness with their souls." Here, then, is a distinct statement that the cause was our dear brother Clark, who had previously, (that is, before the Holy Spirit paid the school a visit, about the 1st of February) bestirred himself earnestly and faithfully, and so brought about this visit, which was followed by the crying and other important operations detailed by Mr. Harris. Mr. Harris' letter is stated, in the Recorder, to bear date the 14th of March, about which time our dear brother Clark was in Buffalo, endeavouring to produce a new state of things in the Presbyterian Church there.—He attended public meeting at the Presbyterian meeting house, in Buffalo, on the 18th of March, four days after Mr. Harris penned his communication for the Recorder, when he very earnestly exhorted the church, in a set speech, to flee from the wrath to come. He told the members that they were a dead church, that the preaching under which they had recently sat, was pernicious, and, in short, that the whole church was in the broad road to utter destruction. The deacons, particularly, were strongly censured; and dear brother Clark even went so far as to declare they were devilish deacons, the devil's deacons, &c. with some other remarks, scarcely less pointed in their character than these. "The Rev. Mr. Crawford," the spiritual preceptor of the Presbyterian flock in this village, was present, and followed dear brother Clark's remarks with some of his own, in which he took occasion to confirm what had been said relative to the preaching under which the church had sat. Mr. Crawford repeated, from dear brother Clark, that his (Mr. Crawford's) preaching had been cold, lifeless, and dead; and that he had been guilty of much neglect, and much sin, in the discharge of his spiritual duties to the church, but that he had received new light within the three last days,* and he devoutly hoped that both himself and his flock would soon reach the path of duty.—Some little confusion was produced in the meeting, by these proceedings, and for a moment the solemnity of the house of worship was interrupted by a somewhat general movement of the people towards the door: order was, however, happily, soon restored, and the meeting was closed without farther commotion. The following day dear brother Clark was declared by some members of the church to be insane, but still his opinion and Mr. Crawford's so exactly corresponded, in relation to the preaching of the latter gentleman, that it seemed somewhat mysterious. On farther inquiry, it appeared that dear brother Clark had been some days labouring, occasionally, with Mr. Crawford, pointing out to him the supposed error of his ways, and that he had spent the better part of one entire night, with unusual earnestness and faithfulness, in this important duty, but a short time previous. It was to that night's labour that Mr. Crawford is supposed to have referred, when he announced to his people that he had received new light within the last three days. Dear brother Clark had also, at an evening meeting, but a short time previous to his remarks at the meeting house, held nearly the same language respecting Mr. Crawford; which, however, was not so well received by this gentleman at the time as it subsequently was, before the congregation, on the 18th of March. It is proper, perhaps, here to state, in explanation of this, that the remarks of dear brother Clark, in the evening conference, are understood to have been previous to the night's labour with Mr. Crawford, and consequently, at a point of time, prior to the receipt by the latter gentleman, of the new light mentioned by him on Sunday the 18th.

In looking back upon this whole affair, and calmly reviewing it, in connexion with Rev. T. S. Harris' letter, it seems highly difficult to arrive at a conclusion to be depended upon. Mr. Harris certainly thought dear brother Clark,

highly gifted with good and wholesome gifts, when, by his faithfulness he brought the Holy Spirit to visit the mission school about the first of March; and even as late as the 14th of the same month he still thought so well of him and of his doings as to despatch, on that day, an account of his labours for publication in that useful paper, the Western Recorder. This was on the 14th, and on the day following, (15th) he was in this village, and, as we are told imparted new light to Mr. Crawford, upon the condition of the church in Buffalo. On the 18th, (three days later) he made the pointed remarks already mentioned, in the Presbyterian meeting house. These, by a part of the worshippers, were considered evidence of delirium, while others not only justified what had been said, in a spiritual sense, but added the confirmation of their own beliefs to the same effect. Such is the nature of the testimony, and its character is too complicated to give satisfaction. No one is prepared to dispute the ability or qualifications of either Mr. Crawford or Mr. Harris, to judge, and to judge aright, in spiritual matters, for it is their province and their business. Dear brother Clark, being a school master, might not be able so readily to discover what was operating upon him, although it seems that even he had no doubt it was the immediate power of God.— On the other hand, able and discerning men suppose the whole the result of a most unfortunate aberration of intellect. Are the Inspirations of Deity, by which he enables his creatures to work miracles, in raising revivals, &c. so like insanity, in their effects, that the two cannot be distinguished? If so, then, indeed is it time to treat with marked circumspection the approach of each symptom of a revival, and by closely studying the character and actions of those who promote it, endeavour to discover whether the individuals have happily been made the recipients of particular Inspiration, or unfortunately been deprived of the reason they once possessed. Whether dear brother Clark was in his right mind when he set the Indians crying, at the Seneca school, and also when he hurried worshippers from the meeting house in Buffalo, and again when he imparted new light to Mr. Crawford, by night; or whether in all these instances he was influenced by an absence of reason, instead of direct Inspiration, are points yet undecided. Nor, indeed, can it be told, it would seem, whether, in a part of these cases he was not actuated by one cause and in a part by the other. Mr. Harris, in his letter, speaking of the school, after brother Clark caused the Holy Spirit to visit it, observes: "The whole school exhibited the most complete order and solemnity, for several days. The Holy Spirit, after regenerating, as we hope, the souls of two or three precious immortals, retired with his most special influences from the school, but he appears to be knocking loudly at the hearts of dark and stupid souls around us." This, it would seem, admits of no ambiguity; for, although Mr. Harris is not positive about the regeneration of the two souls, yet he expresses no doubt that the Holy Spirit was there. Indeed he evidently knows this, for he states that he (the Holy Spirit) retired at a certain time, with his most special influences, from the school; and although we are not told where the Holy Spirit went with these special influences, yet Mr. Harris subsequently found him knocking, and loudly too, at the hearts of souls somewhere in the same neighbourhood. Such knocking, at such a place, seems strong evidence that there was no mistake!

But a new perplexity is found in the remarks of the Editor of the Western Recorder, which precede the letter of Mr. Harris. He there observes: "The Lord has not only restored it [the Indian mission] to peace and quietness, but, as it would appear, is about to visit it, with the special influences of his Spirit." Here is an intimation that the Lord is about to visit the station with the special influences of his Spirit, when we have the testimony of Mr. Harris that the Spirit had been there with such influences, and had put them into the school, but had subsequently taken all the special ones away!— Mr. Harris does not hint that they are expected back, unless, indeed, the knocking at the hearts of souls, which he mentions, is so to be taken. In short, there seems no threading the mystery, and a knowledge of the facts appears calculated to destroy all confidence in revivals, even where it has existed, in its purity, heretofore. D. K.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MESSRS. EDITORS—By your answer to my Question I learn, that you do not believe there is to be a day, or a certain time after the resurrection, (spoken of by the apostle Paul, 1 Cor. xv, where this mortal shall put on immortality,) that mankind will be judged.

I am now prepared to commence my proposed argument, after I inform you that I do BELIEVE that there is to be such a day or such a time in which all mankind that are, ever were, or ever will be, in this world, will be judged and rewarded according to their conduct in this mortal life. The above statement being my real belief, I shall endeavour to prove that there will be such a day, or time, by evidence, or what I think is evidence, contained in reason and revelation.

My first proof I shall attempt to bring from reason, on the ground that all mankind are to be saved. 1st. If all mankind are to be saved, it follows of course that they are to be saved from something which they are by nature subject to suffer. I would then ask, what mankind by nature are subject to suffer? I answer, mankind by nature are subject to suffer pain of body, and distress of mind. Pain of body arises from some obstruction in the organick system; it being mortal and fallible it is liable to get out of order, and must eventually fail and cease to be a system when man dies; and the only remedy that will save man from bodily suffering is a change of nature, as described by the apostle and effected by this mortal putting on immortality when man is raised from the dead incorruptible. But it is evident that the mind is distressed by being harrassed with fears of future evil, or by being exercised with a wrong spirit. Such, for example, as desiring revenge of an enemy, or being unreconciled with the dealings of Providence. Such desires of the mind are produced by ignorance or want of a knowledge of the truth, and the only remedy that can and will effect the final and everlasting cure, is a knowledge of the truth. The next Question is, what is the truth that will produce this salutary effect? I answer, the truth that will produce this effect, (by the unreconciled or evil designed man coming to the knowledge of it,) is, that the author of his existence created him and all mankind, for two most benevolent purposes, which are inseparably connected; to wit, His declarative glory and the final holiness, happiness and felicity of all his creatures: and receiving or knowing that the author of his existence is infinite in wisdom, and knew the best way to fix the plan of creation, preservation and redemption; and knowing that he has almighty power, is perfectly able to do what he knows is best to be done: and knowing that he is unbounded in goodness, and that he never did nor ever will do, nor suffer to be done, any thing that is not for the best that it should be done, neither will he suffer any thing to be left undone that had better be done.

Whenever any man or all mankind come to the knowledge of this truth, they will then see that every thing in existence, whether in heaven or in earth, is necessary for their individual happiness in connection with every other creature which, of course, places them in a situation wherein nothing can offend them, and wherein it is impossible for them to fear any future evil; and therefore, when the body is perfected in immortality and the mind by knowing the truth, man is completely saved. The following Questions then arise. 1st. How is man's body to be immortalized? I answer, by being sown in corruption and raised in incorruption. 2d. Is man active, or passive in this operation? I answer he is passive wholly. 3dly. How is the mind to obtain the knowledge of the truth? I answer the mind of every man must be first disciplined and qualified to receive the truth, and then the truth must be presented to him in such way as he can receive it. 4thly. Is man active or passive in receiving the truth? I answer, active, necessarily so; for the following reasons:—The mind of every creature is an active principle, and cannot exist in an inactive state; but is the effusion of the body and sent forth by the spirit operating in the nervous system, as steam sent forth from the water by the heat operating in the particles of it; and as there is no steam from water, when there is no heat in the particles, so there is no mind from a man when there is no spirit in him, for the body without the spirit is dead, and who would contend that a dead man has a mind?

Now if the mind must receive a knowledge of the truth, in order to be happy, it then follows, that the mind either must be brought to the knowledge of it in this life or after the resurrection; and as it is obvious that many are not brought to the knowledge of the truth, in this life, as many die in the full expectation of going to a place of endless misery; others in full confidence of being saved by the power and goodness of an idol god; it is evident they must be brought to the knowledge of the truth after the resurrection. If so then there must be a day of judgement to give them that knowledge, for no effect can be produced without a cause to produce it. G. W. B.

[REPLY NEXT WEEK.]

GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."

VIRTUE AND FELICITY CONNECTED.

By virtue, I mean to communicate the idea of friendship both towards God and his creatures; insisting, at the same time, on that friendship in both cases, which is real and genuine. 1. Of friendship to the Deity. In order to have a true regard or friendship for God, we must have a knowledge of him in his true character. If we have wrong conceptions of our Maker, and are friendly to him under that conception; this friendship cannot be called genuine, because the object towards which our friendship is extended, is a mistaken object: consequently genuine friendship to the true God cannot be exercised by those, who do not know him. We are not to suppose, from the above reasoning, that God can be comprehended by men or angels, for there is none by searching, can find out the Almighty to perfection: but the true knowledge of God, of which rational creatures are made capable, is, that he is the only true God; that there is none besides him, and that his power, wisdom and goodness, are infinite and are engaged unchangeably for our good: that he made all things, supports and governs all things and purposes, in himself, to reconcile all creatures (who are unreconciled) to himself. This summary comprehends every thing in the true character of God, which is necessary for us to know, and this we must know in order that our friendship be genuine, tho' the comprehension of this character is beyond our ability. Virtue, then, in relation to the Deity, consists in friendship; i. e. in love and obedience to the true God. When men know God, and glorify him as God, they are said to be truly virtuous. True friendship to God will be proved by endeavoring to establish and promote his cause among men; to obey all his commandments cheerfully; to submit patiently to his dispensations; to rejoice that he reigns; to be thankful for all his mercies, and to be kind and obliging to his creatures. Friendship to God can never be considered real, unless it is extended to his creatures; because a parent can never be satisfied with any marks of friendship, however great, unless they are expressed, likewise, towards his children. Thus we have an epitome of friendship towards that great and good Being, who made and governs all things.

2. Of friendship towards man. This (in its genuine purity) is doing to others as we would have others do to us. I am persuaded that nothing short of this ought to pass for real and genuine friendship. This is the great and golden rule of our Saviour Jesus Christ, it comports with every man's reason and judgment, and there can be no complete felicity, where this friendship is wanting. We may talk of friendship, and we may hear it recommended; we may profess to be friends and think we have friends, and yet we may be deceived in others and others may be deceived in us; and the reason, in both cases, will be, that our friendship was nominal and pretended, not real and genuine. Pretended friendship may fail; it often does fail; frequently, the greatest pretended friends, become the greatest real enemies. All this arises from that defect in our friendship, which the gospel only does or can supply. Every man wishes for happiness in this and the coming state; if his friendship be real for others, he will have the same wish for others; hence this desire for the happiness of all in this and in a future state will excite him to comply with St. Paul's exhortation to pray for all men, and it will excite all men every where to pray, lifting up holy hands without wrath or doubting. There is no obligation, which any fraternity of men however ancient the institution may be, or however solemn and awful its obligations are, that can avail to the promotion of this true friendship, if the authority of Christ does not effect it. This is proved by the experience of men, and all ages and countries have witnessed it. This friendship is not effected by being a member of any church, neither is it generally discovered in members of the churches in any considerable degree beyond that, which is seen in the other societies of men. On this point there is a general and universal defect, for all have come short, in this respect, of their duty and the glory of God. If we reduce this golden rule of Christ to the particulars of our intercourse with man; the meaning and extent of this duty must be understood. If we desire, that justice and kindness; that mercy and compassion; that truth and faithfulness, and love and true friendship should be exercised towards us; and if we can realize the pleasure, which the exercise of such friendship would administer to us; we may easily infer our own duty to others and have a glimpse of the mutual felicities resulting therefrom. Our Saviour said, if ye love them, that love you; or if ye do good to them, that do good to you, what thank have you? hereby determining, that the above duties are not to be confined to our friends, or relations, or to the rich from whom we might expect a return; but that they be extended to the poor, to the stranger and to our enemy, equally with our relations and pretended friends. The direction of Christ is, love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you. Thus, in true friendship, are we bound to respect all men without exception.

I will now shew that this virtue is connected with felicity. Any and every person, knowing and loving the true God, according to the divine constitution, must be happy; happy in the approbation of his own mind; happy in the communication of everlasting love and assurance of God's favour, happy in providences, in which God allots his circumstances here, and in the prospect of the full enjoyment of all that is promised him in heaven.

The true friend of God, is not kept from enjoyment till he arrives in glory; he is not a stranger to felicity here; but has prelibations and foretastes of heaven; in the wilderness of this world he has some clusters of the heavenly Canaan. We read, that the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth. He, who ordained all things, has connected true friendship or virtue with real enjoyment, and established this as an unvarying truth, that wisdom's ways shall be pleasantness and that all her paths shall be peace. The consequence is, that, in keeping God's commands there is great reward. Did not the Ethiopian, who had been to Jerusalem to worship, and was instructed, on his return, in the knowledge of God's mercy; did not he go on his way rejoicing? and have not all, who keep God's law, great peace? Are not all men of virtue persuaded, that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come; nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall separate them from the love of God? And is not such a persuasion replete with unspeakable felicity? I need not multiply instances in proof of this point, for it is attested by the cloud of witnesses who have gone before us, and the promise of God secures it. We have thus far spoken of virtue or friendship as it respects the Deity.

We will now look at felicity as connected with virtue or friendship towards men.

The connexion here is as sure and as certain as in the former case, although the enjoyment be not so great. Although a person may be accused of great crimes and his character may labour in the minds of others; yet a consciousness of innocence will administer more peace to the mind, than the treasures of the world. This will be one instance in proof of the connection of virtue with felicity. The disadvantage under which a person labours, who is detected of theft, murder or any other capital crime, will show the happiness of virtue by contrasting the feelings of one, who is guilty with the feelings of him who is innocent. In addition to all this, is not the self approbation of doing justly; performing acts of mercy and kindness; relieving the afflicted; visiting the widow and fatherless in their afflictions, and keeping unspotted from the world; I say, is not here an enjoyment, which the world can neither or give nor take away? A man, with an approving mind, knowing that he does desire and has done his duty, is happy in the contemplation of his innocence and virtue, while the guilty man feels all the horrors of his situation. Friendship among men is always connected with grace; and it always was a good and pleasant thing for brethren to dwell together in unity. Thus in the exercise of brotherly love, the good man is satisfied from himself, and society, in the diffusion of such a principle, is blest with peace and prosperity.

REMARKS.

Let this subject correct us in our views of religion; for if we be lacking in friendship, we are equally lacking in religion. Let every person be convinced that he has no more true religion, than he has real friendship to God and man. Prayers, however frequently made, or zealously expressed, are no proof of religion, if friendship to God and man be wanting. We must be persuaded, likewise, that God will not account our friendship to be genuine, if it be partial towards his creatures. The love of God is universal towards his creatures and such must be our love or it cannot be genuine: here we must love our enemies, and pray for them that despitefully use us and persecute us; the wisdom or friendship from above is without partiality; such must be our friendship in relation to mankind.—The reverse of this, or the partiality exercised among mankind is one of the greatest sources of contention, and ought to be guarded against as the bane of human society. Let then, brotherly love continue.

Many acts are called virtues, when there is neither fear of God or regard for man: such as courage, strictness in discipline and valour in battle, with many others of a like nature, both in civil and military men; but these, originating in a desire for self-aggrandizement, or to obtain the applause of a superior and the desire and expectation of promotion, are not strictly virtues, although entitled, many times, to great applause. The minister of the altar may be actuated by similar motives in his zeal and engagedness in the duties of his function, when there is no other motive, by which he is actuated than the desire of applause, and the acquirement of a great income.

All virtues of this kind (we must remember) can have no higher felicity connected with them, than the attainment of those worldly objects and honours, which were sought after in the exercise of the above virtues. This will be the reward of that virtue, whose only object is the applause of men and the emoluments of the world. In short, (if I may use the expression) carnal virtue will be connected, only, with carnal felicity. What, then, is the honour after which we should seek? it is the honour that cometh from God only. It is the virtue of friendship, consisting in a knowledge of the true character of God our Saviour, and in love to that character; it is to love our neighbour as ourselves. This virtue is connected with that felicity, which is food for the mind and endureth unto everlasting life.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

In the concluding paragraph of the remarks on this subject in our last number, mention was made of an article in the Western Recorder of March 27, to which we now request the attention of the reader. It is headed with the words "something must and can be done," and is signed, "V. D. M."

The absurdity and stupidity of the writer, renders the production harmless, and a principal object in noticing it, is to corroborate by the concessions of the friends of Sunday Schools, the statements made in our last. The author of the piece under examination undertakes to prepare the mind of the reader, for a reception of his doctrines by an appeal to a day of retribution, and requires an assent to each of the following requests; viz. first "when you begin to see my object, you will not turn away from it, saying—'this is nothing new.'" The other is, "when you have carefully examined the subject, and heard what I have to say, you will then, solemnly, in view of your own last account, ask and decide the questions—what must I do; and what can I do, to promote this object proposed?"

Well, desirous of being obedient to the requests of our sapient author, we will not "turn away from the object, saying, it is nothing new," but, although we see very plainly what the object is, we will consider it in all its bearings. The object of the writer, (and of all the brotherhood of the calvinists) is expressed in the following extracts from the article itself. So here it is.

"The plan, then, is this—that we turn our labours, at once, upon children and youth; that we have an institution in all respects adapted to the purpose, where all, from 5 to 18 years of age, may steadily receive religious instruction, suited to their ages and capacities; and that we resolutely determine to bring every child and youth, of every class and description, within the instruction of this institution.—I would have this work put into the hands of God's people."

"Thus, as the churches are spread over the whole surface of our territory, the exertions of the one would meet those of the other, and the thing be accomplished. Every child would be taken as soon as it could read, and taught to read the bible; and from that period to the period of manhood, be taught constantly, and in the best possible manner, the truths of this sacred book, till they should be engraven on his heart. Such an institution, and one that with proper modifications can be made to accomplish all this, is already in existence. I mean the Sunday School, connected with bible classes.—Such an institution can be made to accomplish all this amount of good, if we extend it to the utmost limits in our power. We have this institution; and for this reason I need not explain its nature, or dwell upon its blessed effects; but it is doing comparatively nothing—nothing, I mean, compared with what it might do. It is the institution by which a complete moral revolution can be effected—the very instrument placed in our hands, to overturn the empire of Satan; and by which it has got to be overturned."

"Would we do our duty, we must go at once and scour every street, search through every family, and report, not merely how many attend the school, but how many do not attend, and why they do not."

"Such is its simplicity, that once organized, and completely in operation, it will move on with its own strength, increasing in power." It would spread itself from one community and state to another, for in a little time it would embrace the whole christian world. A system analogous to this is the only one with which we can operate to much effect at our missionary stations; and it is probably some such system, or perhaps by this very system, that the millennium is to be ushered in. Do you say, it is indeed a fine theory; but the thing will be to carry it into effect? I know this is the very thing; and this is the place where you and I have something to do; something we must do, or sin against God and the souls of millions. I have laid this subject before you, not to obtain your cold commendation, or to please your fancy with dreams; but to obtain your active co-operation, and to induce you immediately to take hold of the work."

From the foregoing extracts it is plain to be seen, that the object is, as stated in our last number, to doctrine, and traditionate (if we may coin a word on the occasion) every child in our country!! But all this would be comparatively of little consequence were not other matters of greater moment connected with it. The object is, not merely to convert the children to the dogmas of endless misery, and fill their tender minds with fears of hell, brimstone, and the devil, but, as the writer declares, it goes farther; it is the only system with which they can operate to much effect at their missionary stations!! Reader! for the sake of heaven, ponder this subject.

Some of our readers will recollect that J. V. N. Yates, formerly Secretary of state, made an attempt to accomplish a similar plan to that proposed by the author of the foregoing extracts. He attempted to put the tracts of the N. Y. State Tract Society into the hands of "every child!" But a wise legislature put a quietus upon him and his doings—by putting him out of office! Every enlightened citizen knew, at the time, that this Mr. Yates was but a tool in the hands of the clergy; and ever since their defeat, no efforts have been spared to accomplish, in some other way, what they so much desired at that time and by those means to accomplish. Their tracts have been consigned to their merited oblivion, and their authors left to mourn over the catastrophe.—Since then, amalgamations of sects have been proposed; the N. Y. State Tract Society has been swallowed up by a National Tract Society, and other means are now adopted to bring about the end desired. Not a moment has been lost. Theological beggars have infested every section of the state—tracts have been distributed gratis to those that would not buy—revivals have been "got up"—owners of packet-boats have been threatened with a loss of custom unless they would be obedient to the instructions of the clergy; and all the arts that human wisdom could invent, have been practised upon community! Last of all comes the plan of establishing Sunday Schools, on a more extensive scale!—These schools, when one established, can be made to answer as a substitute for the "official instructions" of Mr. Yates. When the children are drawn into these establishments, then, aye, then, they "must" and shall be instructed in all the mysteries of a modern theology—then, after their parents have been duped by a band of sacred beggars, to let their children go to Sunday School to learn the bible, their hands can be filled with sectarian tracts, and christian almanacks!—and then, too, the little "totally depraved" creatures can be coaxed or wheedled out of their gingerbread money to support missionaries, buy tracts, or maintain "poor and pious students" while learning their creeds at a theological Seminary!!

We are sometimes charged with being severe upon our opponents; we plead guilty! but may the hand that now holds our pen be palsied if it remain inactive while our fellow beings are duped by a band of money loving, sacred impostors. Shall we lie to our conscience and to our God, by saying that the promoters of these schemes for gaining proselytes, are actuated by good motives, and are in pursuit of a good object? Shall we assume the servile language of a slave, and bow obsequiously before their idols? Nay, heaven grant us strength and resolution, and while the heart that dictates these sentiments can beat with emotions of gratitude for the liberty now enjoyed, we will continue to warn our brethren of the dangers to which they are exposed.

FACTS RELATING TO THE UNITARIAN CONTROVERSY.

I. Trinitarians cannot produce a single passage of the Bible, in which the doctrine of the Trinity is stated, although it is very plainly defined in the Standard of the English and Scottish Establishments.

II. That learned and impartial Editor of the Greek testament, Greisbach, himself a Unitarian, rejects, from the 1st Epistle of St. John (v. 7, 8), the words, "in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one, and there are three that bear witness upon earth." The Critical Evidence upon which this passage is maintained to be spurious, is held to be satisfactory by the generality of competent judges of all churches. Many of the Theological writers of the present day, though avowed Trinitarians, have expressed their belief in its spuriousness; among whom are Marsh, the Bishop of Peterborough,* Pettyman, the Bishop of Winchester,† Adam Clarke, the Wesleyan Methodist‡ Charles Butler, the Roman Catholic||, the Eclectic Reviewer§, a Calvinist; and Dr. Wardlaw, of Glasgow, avoids this and the other supposed Trinitarian passages that are affected by Greisbach's emendations, in his controversy with Mr. Yates.

VI. The words printed in italics in our common version, denote that there is nothing corresponding to them in the original, e. g. the word God Acts vii. 59, and 1 John iii. 16.

VII. Neither the word Trinity nor any equivalent word, nor the phrases, God the Son, God the Holy Ghost, Eternal Son, Two natures in Christ, Original Sin, Imputed Righteousness, Vicarious Sacrifice, or Atoning Blood occur in the Bible.

VIII. The Holy Spirit, as different from God the Father, is never in the Bible, proposed as the object of religious worship.

IX. The powers of Christ are never, in the Bible, referred to God the Son, but invariably to the Father or his Spirit.

Our blessed Saviour in his solemn Prayer, recorded in the 17th chapter of St. John's Gospel, declares the Father, to whom he is praying, (ver. 1, 5, &c.) to be the only true God, (ver. 3,) and with the same breath, claims for himself only the character of him whom the Father [the only true God] had sent.

I
Two loveliest flowers that Nature shows,
From Winter's murderous hand would hide;
The Crocus—earliest bud that blows—
And Rose—the Summer's pride;—
To . . . 's parlor they retreat,
Where lovely things are wont to meet;
And hope, beneath her care,
To lengthen out their reign,
And flourish fresh and fair,
Till spring return again;
And triumph o'er th' usurper's power,
Who seeks the death of every flower.
In vain:—the ruthless tyrant found,
Th' asylum of the gentle pair,
And crept, while darkness veild him round,
And wreak'd his vengeance there.
They droop—they fade—their fragrance flies—
They die—as all that's lovely dies,
And wait again, till Nature bring,
The renovating warmth of Spring.

II
Behold how nature's works are filled,
With moral lessons for our minds!
How every blooming joy is chilled
With persecuting winds!
Go! hide thy youth—preserve its pride,
Its form, its beauty and its joys;
Thy manhood's strength and glory hide,
Where yet no fatal blight destroys!
What unknown depths wilt thou explore?
What lofty heights, untrod before?
What secret place, beyond the fight,
Of winged thought, or winged light?
For youth has always fled,
And beauty has decayed,
And manhood's strength has sped,
And joys must ever fade;
And all the tenderest ties that bind,
Our souls to earth, too fondly fast,
And knit us closely to our kind,
Will break, and break with fatal haste.
And ah! th' ethereal mind, at length,
Must lose its tone, resign its powers,
And feebly must recline its strength,
As e'en these blighted flowers.
Go then! when nature shall command,
Go! hide thee in the tomb,
And silent wait that powerful hand,
To renovate thy bloom. D....

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

3. "What fire is prepared for the devil and his angels, and how shall accursed man be associated with them in punishment?"

The above is rather a novel question in this day of increasing light, but no more so than the two remaining ones. But "A." shall have our opinion without gainsaying. "A." takes no pains to inquire, who are "the devil and his angels," but only, "what fire is prepared for them?" We, however, choose to ask, in the first place, "who are the devil and his angels?" and not take things as granted, which ought to be proved. "A." would probably answer to our question, The devil is the arch apostate who headed the rebellion in heaven and his angels are those who rebelled against him. But will it do thus to take things for granted? If this had been the practice of the reformers, we might now have been first rate Roman Catholics. Besides, it is believed, enough has been said, in considering Eve's temptation, (ques. 1.) to explode this unreasonable opinion. It was there suggested, that it was Eve's desire for the forbidden fruit which tempted her. An attempt was not there made to show the propriety of the dialogue represented as having taken place between Eve and her desire for the fruit. But instances in scripture are not unfrequent of persons holding conversation with some principle inherent in themselves. See Ps. ciii. 1—5, and Luke xii. 19. In the figurative language of scripture the trees of the wood are represented as conversing together. Judges, ix. 8—15. But this is not the place for the full discussion of this subject.

The words devil and satan are often used in scripture synonymously. Comp. Matt. iv. 1—11, and Mark, i. 13, and other texts. They are used to express "opposing persons and opposing things," or principles. John, vi. 70, and xiii. 2, 27, and Matt. xvi. 23. Again, the word satan, (though it is rendered adversary by our translators) is applied to the angel of the Lord who "stood in the way for an adversary (satan) against" Balaam. Numb. xxii. It is applied to David, 1 Sam. ii. 9, 4, rendered adversary.—In 2 Sam. xix. 22, the word satan occurs in the plural, is rendered adversaries, and applied to the sons of Zeruih. In 1 Kings, xi. 14, 23, 25, the word satan occurs three times, is rendered adversary, and applied to "Hadad, the Edomite," and "Rezon the son of Eliad." In Ezra, iv. 6, the word satan occurs, is rendered "accusation," and applied to a piece of writing. But it is no where in the Bible applied to an angel who fell from heaven. See Balfour's 2d INQUIRY, Sec. 3. "Dissert. 6, Dr. Campbell, says, 'the word diabolos in its ordinary acceptation signifies calumniator, traducer, false accuser, from the verb diabollein, to calumniate.' This is also its meaning as given by Parkhurst, and other lexicographers which need not be quoted. Its extraordinary acceptation, with them and others, is, that it designates a fallen angel, who is the implacable enemy of God and man. But the three first passages which I shall quote, show, that our translators understood the word diabolos in the way Dr. Campbell explains it, which he says is its ordinary acceptation. The first is, 1 Tim. iii. 11, 'Even so must their wives be grave, not slanderers, (diabolous) sober, faithful in all things.' Here pious women are exhorted not to slanderers, literally, 'not to be devils.' The very same word is used, verses 6, 8, in the singular number, and is rendered devil. Again, it is said, Titus, ii. 3, 'The aged women likewise, that they be in behaviour as becometh holiness, not false accusers, (diabolous.) Here the word again occurs in the plural, and is rendered false accusers. Aged pious women are exhorted not to be devils!—Again, 2 Tim. iii. 3, speaking of those who in the last days should have a form of Godliness, but denying the power of it. They are said to be 'without natural affection, truce breakers, false accusers, (diaboloi.) Literally, devils.'—Balfour's p. 118—19.

In many texts of scripture the enemies of christianity are called devil and satan, for the reason, perhaps, because they acted in concert Eph. vi. 11, is so understood by Wakefield and others. And the 12th verse seems to make it plain, that this is its meaning. The word devil in verse 11, seems to express the aggregate of the particulars mentioned verse 12, which Wakefield renders thus, "Clothe yourselves in the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the devices of the accuser.—For we not only have to wrestle against flesh and blood, but against authority, against the powers, against the rulers of this dark age; against the wickedness of spiritual men in a heavenly dispensation." And in his note he says, "viz. against Jewish Governors, who have a dispensation of religion from heaven, as well as against heathen magistrates under the darkness of superstition and idolatry." On 1 Tim. iii. 6, 7, where the word devil occurs twice, McKnight says—"According to Erasmus, this clause should be translated 'fall into the condemnation of the accuser!' A sense which the word diabulos hath verse 11. For he supposes, that, by the accuser is meant the persecuting Jews and Gentiles who were ready to condemn the christians for every misdemeanor." Comp. also Rom. xvi. 20, and Malachi iv. 3.

We have seen, that devil and satan are often synonymous. In Matt. xii. 26, and Mark, iii. 23, Beelzebub an idol of Ekron, 2 Kings, i. 2, is called saran. By "everlasting fire," Matt. xxv. 41, to which "A." no doubt alludes, I understand the same as hell fire," or the "fire of Gehenna." Although the word fire is used figuratively in scripture to express temporal punishment; and though, "the valley of Hinnom" is employed as an emblem to represent the destruction of Jerusalem and the deplorable and abject state of the Jews at that time. (Jer. xix.) I would suggest for candid consideration in answer to our question, "Who are the devil and his angels?" as "Beelzebub, the god of Ekron," is called satan, whether the god of the Ammonites, is not here called "the devil," and the heralds of his doctrines, "his angels" or messengers. It seems, that, originally, this place, together with the fire which it is said, they kept constantly burning for the purpose of offering their sacrifices, was prepared for Moloch, and his priests, or messengers. Solomon built "a high place—for Moloch, the abomination of the children of Ammon."—1 Kings, xi. 7. The Jews are charged with the same abominable practices, Jer. vii. 31 and xix. 5. Which, it appears was in full force in the days of our Lord. Hence he charged his enemies with compassing "sea and land to make one proselyte," who, when he was made, was two-fold more the child of hell (gehenna, the valley of Hinnom) than themselves. Were not these the angels or Messengers of Moloch? It will likely be objected here that "the fire is called everlasting." But this can be no real obstacle in the way of him who understands the scriptural use of the word rendered everlasting. When it is recollected, that the Jewish covenant is often called everlasting, and, that, long before its establishment "the abomination of the children of Ammon" was set up, it will appear, that the latter is as well, if not better, entitled to the use of the term everlasting, than the former. "A." may object again that "here our Lord is giving an account of a general judgement at the end of this world." But this needs proof. Comp. Matt. xxv. 31, and chap. xvi. 27, 28. Besides, if "A." will take the pains to examine, attentively, the 24th and 25th chapters of Matt. in connexion, as they truly are, I think he will be persuaded at once, that the passage we are considering has no such allusion. It may be objected again—"were the wicked punished in the valley of Hinnom?" Let it be remembered, it is not said they should be punished after getting there, though it was literally the place "where their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched."—Comp. Isa. lvi. 24, and Mark, ix. 44. And there too, they were to be "meat for the fowls of heaven and for the beasts of the earth." Jer. xix. 7.—Let it be farther observed, that the Jews are charged with "burning their sons with fire for burnt-offerings unto Baal." Again, it is said "The children of Judah have done evil in my sight, saith the Lord; 'they have set their abominations in the house which is called by my name to pollute it!'" Jer. vii. 10. From all which, it appears, that the figure by our Lord, was drawn from the literal place, "prepared" originally, for Moloch and his angels, by which he represented the downfall of Jerusalem and the miserable state of her inhabitants, as a prophet had done before him—"Thus will I do unto this place, saith the Lord, and to the inhabitants thereof, and even MAKE THIS CITY AS TOPHET." Jer. xix. 12. This prophecy, may, in part, have been fulfilled when the Jews were led captive to Babylon, yet no one will say it had its entire accomplishment at that time.

But it is farther evident, that the Jews punished offenders by burning them alive in "the valley of Hinnom." See Matt. v. 22, and Dr. A. Clarke and Mr. Parkhurst there, on the words "in danger of hell-fire." This mode of punishment among the Jews was, no doubt in compliance with the infernal laws and practices of those idolators for whom the place was originally fitted up, as there was nothing in the law of Moses to authorise it, but the reverse.—To "A's" question, "What fire is prepared for the devil and his angels," we think the above remarks contain a sufficient answer. And as to the inquiry "How shall accused man be associated with them in punishment," let it be remembered, that Jerusalem became Tophet figuratively, Jer. xix. 12. Besides, the Jews were deposited by thousands in the literal Tophet, verses vi. 11. "They made void the law of God through their traditions. And "A." will recollect, that "it is written, CURSED is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them." Gal. iii. 10.

4. "If the wicked are sent to hell" ("A." takes for granted, that hell means endless misery) for sins committed here, and continue there "under the influence of all their unholy and rebellious passions, will their increased guilt purchase exemption from punishment?"

"Increased guilt" will exempt no man from punishment, but will sink him deeper and deeper in it. We can scarcely think "A." was sincere when he penned this question, but we wish to be charitable. Let "A." and all to whom these presents may come be assured, that the whole body of universalists believe and teach, that "there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved" than Jesus. Acts, iv. 12.

We have said enough about hell, as it regards "the valley of Hinnom," and that men were cast into it, and punished in Jerusalem its antitype. But all this has nothing to do with another state of existence. As to hell, translated from the Hebrew sheol or Greek hades, the state of the dead literally, we believe it is the house appointed for all the living. And where it is used figuratively for distress or torment of mind, we hear of persons being delivered from the lowest hell. Ps. lxxxvi. 13. Jonah was there, chap. ii. 2. But did he "increase his guilt?" No—he PRAYED, was heard and delivered. The "rich man" or high priest was there. Comp. Luke, xvi. 23, and Isaiah, v. 13, 14. Did he "increase his guilt?" No—HE ALSO PRAYED. As "A" cannot reasonably call on me to produce a negative, if he will produce a single passage of scripture from the Old and New Testament, showing, that people go into a state or place of active existence, called hell, and there remain "under the influence of all their unholy and rebellious passions," after the dissolution of the "members" which contain the law which wars against the law of the mind and captivates the subject to the law of sin which is in the members; (Compare Romans, vii. 18, 23,) I will publicly renounce my present sentiments, and declare a belief in future punishment. But this, "A" will not be likely to do very soon by merely asking questions.

5. "If universalism be true, seeing we are liable to various evils in this world, would it not be wisdom in us to commit suicide? And are not war, pestilence, and other causes of premature death, blessings instead of evils?" As "A," it seems, is no universalist, he may think himself free from all danger of committing suicide, on that account. But if he will point one instance where the belief of universal salvation has caused self-murder, I will produce a dozen where the belief of endless misery has had that deplorable effect. But if "A" should ever become a believer in the salvation of all men he will think differently, and be ashamed of this insinuation. Every true universalist prays to be reconciled to God and his providence; and knowing that he has a work to perform under the divine government, he hopes to be willing to remain in this "vale of tears" till the best of beings shall call him hence to be no more. As to war, &c. we must consider them evils though like all other evils, in a limited sense. "From whence come wars and fightings?" Jas. iv. 1. If the cause be evil the effect must be evil.—And as the cause is limited, the effect is finite. But He who "rules in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth," Dan. iv.

35, will "disappoint the effect of every vic," "finish the transgression and make an end of sin." chap. ix. 2, 4. Hence, "war, pestilence, and other causes of premature death," together with all other evils will finally be brought to a perpetual end. "For death, the last enemy shall be destroyed," and "mortality swallowed up of life."

REPLY TO "G. W. B." IN OUR LAST.

It will have been noticed by our readers, that we are fairly at issue with G. W. B.; he having assumed the position that there is to be a "day of judgement" after the resurrection of mankind, and we having taken the ground that there is not to be such a day of judgement.

He attempts to bring forward proof from reason, to substantiate his opinion; but we are not able to find, as yet, any thing that corroborates his general proposition. We cheerfully admit that mankind must receive a knowledge of the truth, before they can be happy; but are unable to discover how it hence becomes necessary to have a day of judgement after the resurrection. We also admit that if mankind are all finally to be made holy and happy, and do not receive in this life a knowledge of the truth, they must on that ground, receive this requisite knowledge after the resurrection, or at all events in another mode of being; but even then, we do not discover the necessity of a future general judgement after the resurrection. Thousands may die ignorant of God and his love, and yet may be made acquainted with the saving realities of truth, without being brought before the "bar of God" in eternity (according to the common acceptance of the terms) to receive such information.

G. W. B. will doubtless acknowledge that some men do receive a knowledge of the truth in this life; and nothing can be more evident than the fact that they receive it without the aid of a day of judgement. And if they do, or can receive a knowledge of the truth in one place, or in one state of existence, without a day of judgement, it is hard to conceive why they may not in another, in the same or a similar way. Not finding any thing conclusive in the argument of our correspondent, as drawn from reason, in support of his theory, we shall wait with patience for something more weighty from the same or some other source.

"WANTS OF THE AMERICAN BOARD."

An article under the above title appeared in the "Rochester Observer" of Saturday, in which it is stated that the "Board" are in want of "TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS PER MONTH, to relieve their present embarrassment." This is a round sum for "these hard times;" but we presume it will be furnished without unnecessary delay! The priests must be relieved at all hazards! But, query:—The sum required to relieve the “embarrassment” of the “Board” amounts to $120,000 a year,—how many fatherless children would this sum ‘relieve?’

“A.” in reply to W. I. Reese, is received.—We hope our correspondent will take no offence, but courtesy, if nothing else, requires that he and the publick, should read the reply to “A’s” interrogatories, before a rejoinder is inserted. Prudence, we should think, would suggest the propriety of waiting for an opponent to get fairly through before an attack upon what he is saying is commenced. Whenever W. I. R. has finished his remarks on the subject proposed by “A,” the reply shall be inserted.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

From what has been said, it appears, that the object with those who are most active in promoting Sunday Schools, is to secure to themselves an ascendancy over the mental faculties of the children and youth of our country, and thereby ensure the perpetuity of the cause of limitarianism. To this end, the teachers make use of every means in their power, to impress the mind of the pupil with the dogmas of modern theology. Such constructions are put upon the scriptures as accord with those views; and every thing calculated to awaken in the mind suspicions of their incorrectness, is carefully kept from the child. Tracts, in themselves frequently false, and always favourable to the views of those who manage the school, are put into their hands; and it often has been the case, that children have been induced by their instructors to look upon their parents as heretics, and to resist their commands, on the ground of its being more safe for a child to obey the godly, than to reverence and respect a parent who is reputed to be heretical in opinion, or ungodly in practice. We do not mean that this is always the case, but that such instances have come to our knowledge. If direct measures are not adopted to produce such results, it is well known that those pernicious ideas have been insinuated into the minds of children, and that the effect has often been deplorable. We cheerfully admit that the instructions of the truly pious are of more consequence to the rising generation than those lessons which sometimes come from the mouths of the ungodly—even though the child who receives instruction is connected to the latter by the ties of near relationship; but we are not yet prepared to give those who assume the exclusive privilege of determining what is right or wrong, decide for others in any such case. We would have every parent determine for himself whether he is capable of guiding the mind of his child in the way of truth; and if not, then it may be proper to select some person to take his place. But if the parent thinks himself capable of selecting books for his children, we know no law, human or divine, that requires him to relinquish the right so to do. But the man or the woman who without permission from the parent, presumes to tell the child, either directly or by implicating the faith or doctrine of the parent, that it is unsafe to listen to his instructions, should be had in detestation. Whether the person who does so be a professed saint, or a sturdy beggar—whether he be a priest, a pope, or a layman, he is an hypocrite, a dishonest man, and consequently is not entitled to our fears, or our respect.

After a candid examination of all that has been said in favour of Sunday Schools as they are now conducted, we are constrained to consider them the nurseries of sectarianism, and productive of very little, if any, good. On the whole, we cannot but view them as among the evil inventions of those who desire to obtain the supremacy. There may have been instances where good has been produced by them; but if bigotry, intolerance, and clerical domination, are evils, then surely the evil preponderates.

With one word of advice we dismiss the subject for the present. We would entreat our readers to consider the subject in all its bearings, and then decide. If on examination the preceding remarks should appear correct, parents who are interested, will, so far as their influence extends, prevent the progress of the evil; but if, after all, we are wrong, we pray that some one acquainted with the matter, would use means to enlighten our mind and thereby remove our objections. E.

MISCELLANEOUS.

FROM THE NEW-YORK TELESCOPE.

EDUCATION SOCIETY.

The plausible pretence of the founders of this Society is two-fold: the education of the poor, and the spreading of the gospel. An object so benevolent at once attracts the attention of every philanthropist; and without delay, each feeling person is ready to bid them God speed, and so casts in his mite; never doubting but that good will result from their undertaking. The duty to contribute freely to this noble object, is publicly and constantly pressed upon the minds and consciences of people by the clergy, and by others whom they have associated with them; and likewise enforced with promised rewards of salvation, or threats of damnation if they refuse to cast in to the Lord’s treasury.

All these things they affect to prove from Scripture, and hesitate not to brand with the epithet of infidel or ungodly, every person who dare say any thing against their proceedings. But thanks be to Him who ruleth over man, and who is just, that he enableth some of his creatures to see and understand, and inspireth them with confidence to speak against those practices, which, under the garb of charity, are undermining and so tending to destroy that religion which they at first seemed calculated to support.

Will not this be the result of educating poor and pious youth, so called, for the Gospel Ministry?

In answering this inquiry, let the following things be observed :

1. Any society or person who will pay into the treasury a certain specified sum of money has the right to select a candidate ; in consequence of this provision, several persons, of very small abilities, and of no gifts calculated to win souls to Christ, have to my certain knowledge, been taken under the care of the society, with a view to the ministry. Some of them were good mechanicks, having passed through a regular apprenticeship, and might have done well for themselves and others, if they had not been drawn aside by so great a temptation, the love of fame, and a desire to live more at ease. Besides many poor, but aspiring youth are tempted to make professions of religion without grace in their hearts, and so an ungodly priesthood is the result.

2. All who are so educated being taken from a vale of poverty, and accustomed to be submissive to their masters, will be doubly so when brought forward into public notice.—They will feel it to be their duty to be subject to their benefactors, or those who have promoted them, and so be fitted for tools for aspiring men to work with, to enslave the people, or to cause an established religion. But if, on the other hand, some of them should, perchance, possess a more independent spirit, they will, most likely, be as the scriptures represent,—“Servants on Horseback,” or, as the poet expresses it, “Grow wiser than their teachers are,

And better know the Lord.”

3. They divide and distract the community. By their heated zeal, want of judgement, and experience, they obtrude themselves upon the publick in such a manner as to disgust many well disposed and moral people to that degree, which has a tendency to prejudice them against all pretences to religion. They not unfrequently turn aside from the highway, from the wilderness where the heathen dwell, to whom they are sent, and enter into parishes where there are settled ministers, and go from house to house, exhorting, praying and speaking of their pastors as cold, negligent, unfaithful, and worldly minded ; and if they dare not say directly they have no religion, yet they insinuate that they are unworthy to hold the place which they occupy, because they have no greater zeal and love for the souls of their people : thus by fair words and flattering speeches, those misguided fanaticks set the people against their fathers in the ministry, who are much wiser, more learned, and experienced in the work, and better able to instruct the people than they are.* In almost every congregation, some disaffected persons may be found ; such are sure to be set to work to procure a dismissal of their minister. In this way, many congregations which might be named, which were peaceable and happy until this new leaven was infused among them, have been divided and broken up. Their former pastors whom they respected and loved, have been removed to give place to boys, whose inflamed zeal is, for substance, like the “crackling of thorns beneath the pot.” So that in many instances more ministers have actually been driven from the field of labour, (and are compelled to seek their bread by other employments,) than have been made to fill their places by expending thousands of dollars contributed for their education.

4. Churches are filled with ungodly members, as well as ungodly ministers.

To carry on their pretended designs in hastening the latter days’ glory, by awakening the people to a sense of their duty, anxious meetings, or meetings of inquiry, so called, are attended weekly, when each individual who happens to be present is interrogated as to his experience and attainments in godliness. Many young persons assemble at first out of mere curiosity, who by the manner of proceeding, eventually have their feelings so awakened that they weep, talk seriously, and express a desire to be saved, when their hearts are in no sense changed, nor their judgements altered from what they were before. The zealous young men who have effected this by their art, (and there are some older persons as weak as they,) mistaking zeal for godliness, and pathetic feelings for convictions of sin, pronounce such converted, and advertise directly in some newspaper or magazine that there is a revival of religion began amongst them. To make good their assertions, and to prevent their converts (for theirs they are, not the Lord’s, because he worketh in the heart, rather than upon the passions) from returning back to the former state of apathy, they almost immediately baptise and introduce them into the church, and then enrol them in their catalogue with the saints.

Thus the work of man’s devising is carried on under the patronage of the Education Society, and the churches will have to mourn at last, as some have already done, over drunkards, card-players, gamblers of every description, profane swearers, sabbath-breakers, &c.

*This remark holds good in cases which have fallen under our own observation. The respected presbyterian clergyman of this village was not long since publicly accused of criminal coldness and indifference, by a hot-headed imitator of Finney ; and if report speaks the truth, even the subject of his censure was induced to believe and openly acknowledge the fact—Ed. Gos. Adv.

who have been to hastily brought into participation in her ordinances.

DR. BEECHER'S LETTER.—A curious letter has made its appearance in the public prints, written confidentially by Dr. Beecher of Boston to the Rev. Mr. Nettleton in the western part of New-York. The amount of it in short, is this: That the leaders of the orthodox party in New-England and New-York, among the principal of whom are Dr. B. and Mr. N. have no confidence in the ultimate utility of those "revivals of religion" which they encourage publickly and labour to promote. There is a very powerful revival in the interior of N. York, as also another at this time in Boston, in the benefits of which Dr. Beecher's Society, in which it originated, shares very largely. But Dr. B. it seems, though rejoices to have numbers added to his society, has not been long uninstructed by the past history of these excitements, and looks forward with trembling anxiety to the effects of this outpouring. He is aware that he has been "sowing the wind, and that he will reap the whirlwind;" and wishing to regulate the business properly, he has written a letter to another fellow-labourer, Mr. Nettleton, in which he lets his own private ideas fully out. It is plain to be perceived that he has but a small opinion of these revivals himself, though he finds it necessary to encourage them at home. What his converts will say when they come to read his letter, and what he can say to them when he finds that some treacherous friend has revealed the secret by publishing it, we cannot imagine.

It appears that the leaders have a perfect understanding, as it relates to planning and putting in motion the machinery for producing these excitements. "They remind me of Eolus," said a respected friend to us the other day. "They seem to have the holy spirit as Eolus had the wind in a bag. They let out as much as they find necessary for their purpose, and restrain it when their ends are answered. But some one in New-York, it seems, has let out too much! He has caused a hurricane there, and Dr. B. knowing that it will lay waste both reason and propriety, and thus bring a reproach upon the authors of it, has kindly written to that quarter ordering it to be stopped."

Mr. Nettleton, the person to whom the letter is written, we believe, is the preacher who, some year or two since, according to the papers of that time, to get up an excitement, wrote a letter signed "Jesus Christ" and had it mysteriously dropped in a company of young persons in New-York. His object was to make them think that the letter was written in heaven by Jesus Christ and sent to warn them to get religion forthwith. His blasphemy was exposed at the time, but it seems he is still at work and has other means of success within his command.—Chris. Int.

ANECDOTE.

There was once an illiterate but wealthy man in New-Jersey by the name of Beach.—He resided in a remote corner of a Presbyterian Parish, of which Dr. Dickinson was the pastor.—It happened that a minister of the church of England came that way and organized a new parish in the limits of which Mr. Beach was included. Highly delighted with the new order of things, he became very much devoted to the new minister and to the novel services of the Church. His zeal led him to make a visit to his former minister Dr. D. for the purpose of shewing the latter his error.—"I come Dr. Dickinson to tell you that you are wrong sir." Ah! in what am I in an error Mr. Beach? "Why, in keeping Saturday night as holy time." You will have the goodness then to tell me what authority you have for saying I am wrong in this? Why, the bible, sir, says, "The evening and the morning were the first day. Don't you see that?" I see the text indeed, but really cannot perceive what bearing it has upon the subject; please name another, that shall be more obvious to my understanding. "Well, sir; 'For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.'" There, sir, I presume you understand that?" No, Sir, I confess I cannot see what either of these texts have to do with Saturday night.—"Possible! What, the great Dr. Dickinson—President of a College, and cannot see the force of that text?" No, Sir, I confess I am not able to understand your idea in quoting it. "I wish you to understand this thing distinctly and I will therefore quote to you one more text. 'On these two hang all the law and the prophets,' therefore it is the will of God, that all lawyers and prophets should be hung. Don't you see that?" I must give you the argument Mr. Beach,—I confess I am not able to argue with you. Mr. B. retired, proclaiming his victory over Mr. D. telling his astonished neighbours that the latter acknowledged to him, that he was not able to hold an argument with him!

Whenever we see a man of this description who quotes much scripture which he does not understand, and thinks that he thereby refutes the propositions of his opponent, we generally feel disposed to tell him this story, and give him the argument.—Rel. Inq.

"City ladies boast of being more delicate, than country maidens. The one breathes an air polluted with many thousand breaths; the other inhales the breeze freshened over the new mown hay. The one drinks water from the sewer-mingling pump, or through impure pipes from the open horse-pond; the other pours it from the moss-covered bucket, or dips it from the pure spring. The one walks over the hard pavements, along the dusty pile of bricks; the other trips over the soft grass, along the graceful rows of trees. The one is pale and sickly, from watching at the evening concert; the other is ruddy and healthy, from rising with the morning birds. The one is the lily of the green house; the other is the rose beside the stone wall. In the city is seen and admired the ingenious handy-work of man;—in the country are traced and hallowed the stately steppings of the Almighty.

What did DR. FRANKLIN mean when he said in his letter to Miss Hubbard written after the death of his brother John,—“He who Plucks out a tooth, parts with it freely, since the pain goes with it; and he who quits, the whole body, parts at once with all pain, and all possibilities of pains, &c.”? Did he mean that there is no suffering after the death of the body?

Papists withhold the Bible from the laity, because there is no need of their troubling their minds to ascertain its meaning, since the priests are authorised to understand it for them. Protestants give the scriptures to the laity, but the latter are not permitted to understand it differently from their dictators under penalty of excommunication for life and everlasting misery after death. Which prohibition is the most consistent and humane?

The following picture of Woman, taken from an essay in the Quarterly Review is recommended to the attention of our country-women.

Speaking of the middle ranks of life, the writer observes: “There we behold woman in all her glory; not a doll to carry silks and jewels, a puppet to be dangled by coxcomb children, an idol for profane adoration; revered to-day, discarded to-morrow; always jostled out of the true place which nature and society would assign her, by sensuality or by contempt; admired but not respected; desired but not esteemed; ruling by fashion, not affection; imparting her weakness, not her constancy, to the sex which she should exalt; the source and the mirror of vanity.

The Majesty and Supremacy of the Scriptures.

I will confess to you, that the majesty of the Scriptures strikes me with admiration, as the purity of the Gospel hath its influence on my heart. Pursue the works of our philosophers with all their pomp of diction: how mean, how contemptible are they compared with the scripture! Is it possible that a book, at once so simple and sublime, should be merely the work of man? Is it possible that the sacred personage, whose history it contains, should be a mere man? Do we find that he assumed the tone of an enthusiast or ambitious sectary? What sweetness, what purity in his manner! What an affecting gracefulness in his delivery! What sublimity in his maxims! What profound wisdom in his discourses! What presence of mind, what subtlety, what truth in his replies! How great the command over his passions! Where is the man, where the philosopher, who could so live, and so die, without weakness, and without ostentation? When Pluto described his imaginary good man loaded with all the shame of guilt, yet meriting the highest rewards of virtue, he describes exactly the character of Jesus Christ: The resemblance was so striking, that all the Fathers perceived it.

What pre-possession, what blindness must it be to compare the son of Sophronicus to the son of Mary! What an infinite disproportion there is between them? Socrates dying without pain or ignominy, easily supported his character to the last; and if his death, however easy, had not crowned his life, it might have been doubted whether Socrates, with all his wisdom was any thing more than a vain sophist. He invented, it is said, the theory of morals. Others, however had before put them in practice: he had only to say therefore what they had done and to reduce their examples to precepts. Aristides had been just before Socrates defined justice; Leonidas had given up his life for his country before Socrates declared patriotism to be a duty; the Spartans were a sober people before Socrates recommended sobriety; before he had even defined virtue, Greece abounded in virtuous men. But where could Jesus learn, among his competitors, that pure and sublime morality, of which he only hath given us both precept and example? The greatest wisdom was made known amongst the most bigoted fanaticism, and the simplicity of the most heroic virtues did honor to the vilest people on earth. The death of Socrates, peaceably philosophizing with his friends, appears the most agreeable that could be wished for; that of Jesus, expiring in the midst of agonizing pains, abused, insulted, and accused by a whole nation, is the most horrible that could be feared. Socrates in receiving the cup of poison, blessed indeed the weeping executioner who administered it; but Jesus, in the midst of excruciating torments, prayed for his merciless tormentors. Yes, if the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus are those of a God. Shall we suppose the evangelic history a mere fiction? Indeed, my friend, it bears not the marks of fiction ; on the contrary, the history of Socrates, which nobody presumes to doubt, is not so well attested as that of Jesus Christ. Such a supposition in fact, only shifts the difficulty without obviating it : it is more inconceivable that a number of persons should agree to write such a history, than that one only should furnish the subject of it. The Jewish authors were incapable of the diction, and strangers to the morality contained in the Gospel, the marks of whose truth are so striking and inimitable, that the inventor would be a more astonishing character than the hero.—Rousseau.

HERMOGENIANS, a sect of ancient heretics ; denominated from their leader Hermogenes, who lived towards the close of the second century. Hermogenes established matter as his first principle ; and regarding matter as the fountain of all evil, he maintained that the world, and every thing contained in it, as also the souls of men and other spirits, were formed by the Deity from an uncreated and eternal mass of corrupt matter.

Æsthetic Department.

FROM THE NEW-YORK TELESCOPE.

Verses composed on reading the "Indian Anecdote," in the 42d number of the Telescope.

Some years ago, the preachers met
All of the calvinistic sect,
Pretending that their object was
To promulgate their Saviour's cause.

That they received divine commands
To spread the truth in heathen lands ;
And one was chosen from the rest,
To travel forth unto the west.

Then he set out in pomp and pride,
And went unto a certain tribe,
Expecting that the simple race
Would all his principles embrace.

He soon appointed them a day,
To meet and hear him preach and pray ;
They soon their gratitude exprest,
Their Chief appeared amongst the rest.

The Priest with joy, beheld the sight,
Their numbers did him much delight,
He arose the audience to address,
And such like language did express.

Behold there is a God above,
Whose attributes are peace and love,
And I'm commissioned from his throne,
To make these glorious tidings known.

This God is of such mighty power,
Could crush whole nations in an hour,
And yet, he condescends to show,
His Sovereign will to men below.

This God has built a Heaven above ;
And all on earth that he doth love.

He'll call them to his heavenly rest,
Where they will be forever blest.

Likewise, he has built a dreadful hell,
Where all he hates will surely dwell,
On burning torments, they there must lie,
And yet are not allowed to die.

He said to satisfy their minds,
He'd read it in the sacred lines,
That God had chosen his elect,
And all the rest he did reject.

He said there was a pair of twins,
That never had committed sins,
Jacob and Esau, were their names,
From whom, a numerous offspring came.

Yet long before that they were born,
Or had beheld the light of morn,
God to a person then relates,
That one he loves, the other hates.

Such is the God I preach to you ;
Although he's not within your view,
Yet you must bow and kiss his rod,
And choose him for your only God.

The natives listen'd with surprise,
To hear such tidings from the skies,
But when dismissed they then appeared,
Reflecting on what they had heard,

The Chief address this self divine,
And ask'd him home with him to dine,
No costly viands deck'd his board,
'Twas what the forest did afford.

A simple but a wholesome fare,
Procured by honest toil and care,
When seated round this homely feast,
The Chief, he thus address'd the Priest.

Dear sir, it was the other year,
My wife brought forth two children dear,
As lovely twins I dare to say,
As those you told us of to-day.

The one she nursed day and night,
And seldom went out of its sight,
The other on the ground she left,
Of food and nourishment bereft.

And when I heard the infant cry,
I told my wife it would surely die,
She never minded what I said,
And soon alas, the child was dead.

Now as you teach the rule of life,
What shall I do unto my wife ;
The Priest replied, with flash of eye,
Your wife has caused your child to die.

Now hang her up without ado,
For she's a wretch and murderer too,
My judgement I do freely give,
For such a monster should not live.

The Chief he turned, and with a nod,
Said, "Sir, go home and hang you God ;"
You say my wife was much to blame,
You say your God has done the same.

For such a God we can't revere,
So you shall preach no longer here.
The Priest with shame, from them withdrew,
And to his mission bade adieu.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

The doctrine of a future and general judgement, when all intelligent creation, that have lived and died since the foundation of the world, shall be raised to life—two characters recognized, a final and eternal separation made, the one consigned to a state of torment while God exists—the other received to an endless and glorious immortality, is a doctrine, which has so long been believed and advocated by limitarian orthodoxy, that he who dares to call in question the truth of it is considered by some not only an heretic, but an infatuated monster! Should he attempt to prove the doctrine erroneous, he is at once identified with all unrighteousness—one who is fast “spreading infidelity,” especially if he give encouragement to such publications as are calculated to bring this darling tenet to disrepute; and though he acknowledges and fully believes all the judgement days, which have taken place since the creation of the world, as recorded in the scriptures of the old and new Testament; although he fully believes a day of judgement to the old world with a flood; a day of judgement to Sodom and Gomorrah; to Tyre and Sidon; to Pharaoh and his host; to the children of Israel by bondage, by famine and pestilence, a day of judgement to the city of Jerusalem and the land of Judea, by desolation and destruction; and although he believes that all the days of judgement which were threatened to the Jewish nation, are or will be inflicted in the manner, and according to the time specified by the Prophets, by the Lord Jesus and by the Apostles; yet, still he must believe in a future general judgement after mankind have been dead several thousand years, he must believe that their bodies will then be raised and judged, and receive in them according to the goodness or badness of their characters while they were alive on the earth. If he denies this, he is guilty of a most heaven-daring presumption. Far better is no belief according to orthodoxy. Limitarians would have us believe at one time, that the destinies of mankind are fixed at death for eternity, either happiness or misery—that when they die, they will immediately appear before the judgement bar of God, to give account for the deeds done in the body. At another time, they are represented as rising from the dead, with the whole human family, to receive the sentence of life or death for eternity. But if the destiny of man be fixed at death for eternity, why this general judgement again? Shall the blessed in heaven leave their blissful abodes, come down to this lower earth, and be tried the second time? or shall the damned in hell come forth and be judged, and sentenced to the same place of torment from whence they came out? Or will some of both characters receive a different judgement, a different destiny? Peradventure some virtuous person may have been suffering with the miserable, who ought to have been blessed.—Or perhaps some hell deserving wretch may have been all this time with the blessed in heaven, who ought to have been with the miserable in hell. Is this the God of the whole earth, who needs to review his past conduct? Nay, it savours too much of the god of Baal’s prophets, whom Elijah affirms must be asleep and ought to be awaked. If the prophet Elijah spoke disrespectfully of the god of Baal’s prophets, because he needed so much noise and misery, by yelling and cutting the flesh, before he could hear and answer, why may not we with the same propriety speak disrespectfully of the god of modern orthodoxy, because he needs to review his former judgements—his past conduct? But this doctrine of a future judgement, when the whole human family shall be raised and receive the sentence for life or death for eternity, is a doctrine which is sacred, and must be true; it must be so, because it must be so, and because so many great men have long believed it so. It is enough for us to believe it without inquiring why it is so, or in what part of the earth this great assemblage is to take place—whether in Europe, Africa, or America—whether on this or the opposite side of the earth—whether at London or New-York, at Buffalo, or farther west in the Michigan Territory—we have only to believe it.—If we demand when this judgement is to take place, we are told “when Christ shall come to judge the whole world, and reward every man according to his deeds.” But what appears to be the most astonishing and surprising to us is, that when we demand the testimony for proof of this eternal destruction of mankind in a future state, we are referred to those very passages of scripture, the contexts of which fix the time of judgement to a period more than fifteen hundred years ago. We are referred to those passages which speak of the coming of Christ. Probably the one in Matt. xvi. 27.

"For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works."—This is one of the passages which is quoted to prove the common notion of a judgement in a future state; whereas the next verse fixes the time of this judgement, or coming of the Son of Man in the following words: "Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." Or again, we are referred to Matt. viii. 38. "Whosoever, therefore, shall be ashamed of me and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels." At the time of this coming is expressed in the next verse. "And he said unto them verily I say unto you, that there be some of them that stand here which shall not taste death till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power." Or if the parallel passage in Luke ix. 26, is referred to for proof, the time is specified also by the Saviour, and fixed to the generation in which he lived.

John, v. 28, 29, is also referred to. "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming in which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation.—This passage is repeated as indisputable proof that God will in a future state make an eternal separation and distinction in the human family. But a little attention to its preceding context will convince the unprejudiced mind, that the Saviour alluded to a spiritual and not to a literal resurrection. He had just testified to the Jews, saying, "For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will;" and "verily, verily, I say unto you, the hour is coming and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live."—With the context in view, we have no more authority for giving this passage a literal construction, because the terms resurrection and graves are employed, than we have to say the literal flesh and blood of Christ is meant when he says, chap. vi. verse 53. Except ye eat of the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.

With the same authority we might contend for the literal interpretation of Ezekiel, xxxvii. 12, 13. "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves." "When I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves." Daniel, xii. 2, is frequently clipped from its connexion, and carried into a future state for proof of the common notion of a future and general judgement. "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." But let this and the preceding chapter determine the time of this prediction. In the preceding verse, we read, "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of the people, and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time; and at that time the people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake," &c. Here is a time of trouble spoken of by the prophet. This same time of trouble is noticed by our Lord Jesus, in his prediction of the severe chastisements which God was about to inflict on the Jewish nation and people, recorded in the 23d, 24th and 25th chapters of Matthew. The prophet speaks of a time of trouble, such as was never before paralleled; nor ever should be afterwards. What the prophet calls trouble, the Saviour calls tribulation, Mat. xxiv. 21. For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no nor ever shall be. In this prediction our Lord had reference to the prophecy of Daniel, verse 15, he says, "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place. (Whoso readeth let him understand) a caution very necessary at the present age of the world, and I would to God it were better observed.

Thus we discover that the Saviour, in describing the time—the signs—the calamities:—Or in other words, in answering the questions proposed by his disciples in the 3d verse of this chapter, referred them to the prophecy of Daniel. These questions seem to have been proposed in consequence of what their master had previously related in the preceding chapter—the woes denounced upon the scribes and pharisees—that they might fill up the measure of their fathers—that they should suffer the damnation of hell (gehenna)—that upon that generation should come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom they had slain between the temple and the altar—that their house should be left unto them desolate—that there should not be left one stone upon another that should not be thrown down. This was the language, which caused the disciples to ask these questions privately, saying, "Tell us when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming?" that is "thy coming" to destroy the temple, Jewish nation and polity, "and of the end of the world." (age or dispensation), or end of the world according to the scriptural use of the terms in Hebrews, ix. 26, But now once in the end of the world hath he appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.—1 Cor. x. 11: "Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come. Of the signs which preceded this coming of the Son of Man, Jesus gave a particular description, but of the precise day and hour none but his Father knew. That his coming should be as the flood in the days of Noah, verse 39, "And knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. On this account he forewarned his disciples, saying, "Watch therefore; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." And "therefore be ye ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." verse 27. "For as the lightning cometh out of the east; and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. For wheresoever the carcass is there will the eagles be gathered together. Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken, and then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory.

It will not be forgotten that this language is applied to the coming of the Son of Man.—Similar language is used in the next chapter. "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." In the 24th chapter, all the tribes of the earth are represented as seeing the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with great power and glory; to send his angels with a great sound of trumpets to gather together his elect from the four winds of heaven, from one end of heaven to the other, Now could we determine when the Son of Man was to come in his glory, with all the holy angels, to sit upon the throne of his glory; to gather before him all nations, and separate them one from another; to gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other; the question concerning time—the time of the coming of the Son of Man, of the general judgement, would be settled at once. Preachers of modern orthodoxy, at the present day, tell us the time is still future, or rather the time is in eternity! when the general judgement shall take place. But what saith the Saviour? What saith the scriptures? "To the law and to the testimony; If they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

After our Saviour had spoken to his disciples of the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven, with great power and glory, to send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, to gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of the earth to uttermost part of heaven;

He says, "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree, When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled" Here we have the testimony of Jesus; the testimony of him who spake as never man spake, that the period when he should be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels to take vengeance on the Jewish nation, was in the generation in which he lived in the flesh. But preachers at the present day, after a lapse of several hundred years, tell us the time of this coming is still future. This is what passes for orthodoxy. They tell us the second coming of the Son of Man to judgement, is a truth which they fully believe, but that the time is not arrived, that it is still future. So say the Jews. They fully believe in the first coming of the promised Shiloh. But they say he has not yet come, that his coming is still future; so that one is about as orthodox as the other.

GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."

To the Editors of the Gospel Advocate.

I send some reflections which occurred on reading an article signed T. G. on "Election and Reprobation," in the Advocate of 17th March. A.

Your correspondent states the doctrine in a light in which I presume no one believes it. He says, "If some are elected to everlasting life, the rest of mankind are as certainly reprobated to everlasting misery," and by the predetermination of God, independent of their character. The scriptures represent men as being rewarded according to their works; that "the vessels of wrath" are fitted by their wickedness "to destruction;" and that God "endures them with much long suffering;"—but that "he afore prepared the vessels of mercy unto glory" by renewing and sanctifying their hearts. An reprobation of individuals, independent of character, is not any where taught in the Bible; but it is a "perdition of ungodly men," who persevere in a course of rebellion, and "die in their sins." His scripture quotations in that paragraph are irrelevant, as their object is to prove God's desire, and command that "the wicked should turn from his ways and live;" which no one doubts.

The other texts which he has forced in to support the doctrine of universal salvation will be easily understood by taking them in connexion with the context, viz. Eph. i. 19, 20; 2 Cor. v. 18, 19; 1. Tim. ii. 8, 4; Titus ii. 11. Their obvious meaning is that God's special favour was no longer restricted to the Jewish nation, but that their religious privileges were equally extended to all the Gentile world. I might enlarge upon each quotation, if room would permit; but the candid reader need be at no loss if he will carefully examine them in connexion.

I will now compare some of the assertions of your correspondent with the Bible.

T. G.—“God wills, purposes and determines that all shall be saved.”

Bible—“Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many, I say unto you, shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able.”

T. G.—“The requirements of the law prove to demonstration that God loves all.”

Bible—“God is angry with the wicked every day.”

T. G.—“The whole family of man is included in Christ's Church.”

Bible—“Ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you.” “They are not all Israel which are of Israel.” “Many are called, but few chosen.” Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? &c.—then will I profess unto them I never knew you; depart from me ye that work iniquity.”

The reader will see what a difference exists between the declarations of your correspondent and those of the bible; and whether T. G. or the spirit of all truth, shall stand convicted of falsehood, the day of God's righteous retribution will determine. But, as in days of old, we have reason to believe that “God sends many who receive not the love of the truth, strong delusion, that they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned who believe not the truth.” “That evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived.”

And now having seen the fallacy of these doctrines, let us consider the uses and effects which will accrue from their promulgation.—What good can result from exertions to propagate them when their disbelief is attended with no evil consequence? Their legitimate effect upon him who believes them is to throw off all restraint, and to induce him to do all that he desires. The fraudulent man need no longer be agitated by a silly fear of future retribution. The midnight assassin who meditates revenge, may now plunge the dagger into the bosom of his foe. The robber may gratify his desire of plunder. The blood-thirsty tyrant has nothing to fear. The careless sinner who fears not God, nor regards man, may sleep on in quiet security, without being distracted by the word of the Almighty. “Repent or perish.” The bold blasphemer may vent his bitterest curses against the God that made him, with impunity, and defy the thunderbolts of his wrath. By suicide he may in a moment launch into eternity, and revel in all the joys of elysium.

This is a picture which must shock us; and what good man could approve of the conduct of a being who would thus give a most unreserved sanction to vice of every description, by conferring eternal joys upon its polluted doer. A.

REPLY TO THE FOREGOING.

We are now to consider the objections of A. to the arguments of T. G. on the doctrine of “Election and Reprobation” as published in our 11th number. If we fully comprehend his meaning, the objections urged by him may be stated thus: 1. T. G. has erred in saying that “if some are elected to everlasting life, the rest are as certainly reprobated to everlasting misery, and by the predetermination of the Almighty.” 2. The scriptures teach that mankind are fitted to destruction by their wickedness, and not by the predetermination of the Almighty, and the righteous prepared for everlasting happiness by a renewal and sanctification of their hearts. 3. That the quotations of T. G. designed to sustain the doctrine of universal salvation, when read in their connexions, do not prove the doctrine, but otherwise. 4. That T. G.'s assertions and arguments are opposed to certain plain passages of scripture, as exhibited in the contrast drawn in the foregoing article. And lastly; That the doctrine of universalism is pernicious in its effects; inasmuch as it takes away the restraints of the gospel, and holds out to the vicious, incentives to do evil.

The foregoing statement, we believe, comprehends the sum and substance of A.'s objections to the arguments of T. G. and the doctrine of universalism generally, and we shall now proceed to show the incorrectness of his opinions.

1. That T. G. has not erred in saying that “if some are elected to everlasting life, the rest are as certainly reprobated to everlasting misery, is as evident as it is that God is almighty.” For it would make no difference whether God should decree that some should be endlessly miserable, or determine that some might be, while at the same time he knew that some would do just what he decreed they might. It matters not, whether an omniscient and almighty God decrees to-day, yesterday, to-morrow, or a thousand years hence; for if any are eternally damned, they will be damned by the decree or purpose of God; and whether God decreed before creation or afterwards, it does not alter the case in the least. It is therefore an unavailing variation of the position, to say that mankind are damned to all eternity, for their wickedness; because, if God did not decree that they should be damned, he having almighty power, would prevent their being led on to hell by their evil propensities, which he knew would be the means of their endless misery. But T. G. is accused of having stated the doctrine of election and reprobation in a light in which no one believes it. A. sets off with this assertion. But he does, or should know better. Every calvinist be-believes the doctrine in the same light represented by T. G. and he who assumes to accuse us or our correspondents of misstating the sentiments of our opponents, should be prepared to make good his assertions. Whether A. be a calvinist or not, was unknown to T. G. nor did he aim his arguments at any other opinion but that of election and reprobation as maintained by calvinists. It was calvinism—old fashioned orthodoxy, which T. G. undertook to expose and refute; and, if we mistake not, he did what he undertook, to the satisfaction of the "candid reader." T. G. has formerly been acquainted with, and has preached the doctrine of election and reprobation, for more than twenty years; consequently, knows what it is, and was. That he was correct in his positions is evident from the "First Point" of calvinism, which follows. "They maintain that God hath chosen a certain number of the fallen race of Adam in Christ, before the foundation of the world, unto eternal glory, according to his immutable purpose, and of his free grace and love, WITHOUT THE LEAST FORESIGHT OF FAITH, GOOD WORKS, OR ANY CONDITIONS PERFORMED BY THE CREATURE; and that THE REST of mankind he was pleased to PASS BY, and ORDAIN to DISHONOUR and WRATH for their sins, to the praise of his VINDICTIVE justice." See Buck's Theo. Dict. p. 72. It is true, they say that mankind are "ordained to dishonour and wrath for their sins;" but they strenuously contend that all this election, passing by, &c. is "without the least foresight of faith, good works or any conditions performed by the creature." Consequently, T. G. was right, and A. is wrong. T. G. is not accountable for that holy legerdemain by which the God-dishonouring points of calvinism are concealed from the gaze of the simple, and protected from the indignation of every man of sense:—His plan was to strip the monster of its mask, and exhibit its unseemly deformity! His positions were correct and his conclusions logical; therefore, A. must bring forth something besides assertions, with which to impeach his reasoning, or leave the public to draw their own conclusions.

2. That mankind are fitted for destruction by their wickedness, according to the scriptural sense of the terms, we cheerfully admit; but that such destruction is not "endless misery" is evident from various considerations, among which we mention the following. 1. The term destruction does not imply a continuation of life, or misery, but the contrary; hence, may be applied to the present existence, but not to the next. 2. The gospel, the promises, and even the threatenings of God, all go to prove that man shall neither be annihilated, nor punished to endless duration. This is made to appear from the passages quoted by T. G. and will be further noticed in the proper place. Should these reasons appear unsatisfactory, we have only to remind A. that he has not yet brought forward any proof in support of a contrary opinion.

3. That the quotations made by T. G. prove the doctrine of an universal salvation from sin, will be evident to the candid reader on a careful examination. He first quoted certain texts wherein it was shown that it was not the will of God that any should be passed by and ordained to dishonour and wrath to all eternity, but the contrary; and then proceeded to show from plain scripture declarations, that it is, was, and will be, the will of God, which he had purposed in himself to save all mankind.—Among the texts referred to, are Eph. i. 9, 10. and Acts iii. 21. which, to say nothing of other similar declarations, prove beyond controversy the truth of his positions. A. informs us that "their obvious meaning is that God's special favour was no longer restricted to the Jewish nation, but that their religious privileges were equally extended to all the Gentile world." Well, here is the assertion of A. and the testimony of holy writ before us; let us see how they agree.

Paul. "Wherein he [God] hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence; having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he had purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one ALL THINGS in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth; even in him." Eph. i. 8—10.

"A." The "obvious meaning is that God's special favour was no longer restricted to the Jewish nation, but that their religious privileges [here on earth of course] were equally extended to all the Gentile world!"

All the holy prophets. "Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of ALL THINGS, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Acts iii. 21.

"A." "The obvious meaning is that God's special favour was no longer restricted to the Jewish nation, but that their religious privileges were equally extended to all the Gentile world!"

Paul. "For it pleased the Father that in him [Christ] should all fulness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile ALL THINGS to himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven."—Col. i. 19, 20.

"A." "The obvious meaning is that God's special favour was no longer restricted to the Jewish nation, but that their religious privileges were equally extended to all the Gentile world!"

Paul. "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved, and come unto the knowledge of the truth." 1. Tim. ii. 2, 4.

"A." "The obvious meaning is that God's special favour was no longer restricted to the Jewish nation, but that their religious privileges were equally extended to all the Gentile world!"

We might enlarge, but the foregoing is enough to satisfy the unprejudiced mind, that A. is in danger of being condemned by his own words. "The reader will see what a difference exists between the declarations of our correspondent and those of the bible," &c. Let A. clear his skirts of the charge of having attempted to limit the Holy one of Israel—let him bring forth his strong reasons in support of his unwarrantable assumptions and he shall be heard.

IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTEND FOR THE FAITH."

UNFEELING OUTRAGE.

The following communication gives a detail of circumstances, which, we presume, are almost without a precedent in the dark ages of the world. Individuals belonging to nations guided only by the "dim light of nature," have a degree of sympathy for the distressed. With them, a parent's loss, a sister's grief, is mitigated by the tear of generous humanity, and a barbarian would blush to acknowledge himself capable of wantonly wounding the feelings of living relations by speaking reproachfully and falsely of the dead. But we are compelled to say, though humanity shudders at the recital, that in this country, even in the county of Monroe, among a civilized, yea, a christianized people, a being is to be found whose tongue has slandered the dead and abused the living! But the worst is not yet told. This person is a professed follower of Jesus of Nazareth—a pretended minister of Christ and the gospel! Yea, he is one of those who preach the doctrine of an endless hell! Let him take his portion of the condemnation with which he threatens others, and may a merciful God renew his heart.

EDITOR.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

There is a young man by the name of Geo. P. King, who resides in Henrietta, Monroe co. and is employed by the Presbyterian Church in that place as their minister and teacher.—He is a violent opposer of Universalism—has said much against the doctrine—and has likewise slandered the character of Universalists generally, by saying that they are dishonest, liars, drunkards, sabbath-breakers, profane swearers, &c. &c. This is not all. He has attempted, and that in the most disgraceful manner, to slander the character of a young man by the name of Lewis Barnes, who died in Henrietta on the 29th of Oct. last.

Mr. King has made assertions respecting the character of Mr. Barnes which are as false as the declaration of the old serpent to Eve, when he said "ye shall not surely die." On hearing of the conduct of Mr. King, I concluded to call and see him. I accordingly did, at which time the father of Mr. Lewis Barnes went with me. I also requested a Mr. Church to accompany us, to introduce us to Mr. King, as we were neither of us acquainted with him. We found him in his study and I was first introduced to him, and extended my hand towards him in friendship. But he held back his own; upon which I observed to him, "will you not shake hands?" His answer was, "I think not." We then stepped out of the study into the parlour, where we all took seats. He then said, he would explain the reason why he refused to shake hands with me, as follows. "I understand, Mr. Roberts, you are a universalist preacher—I have no fellowship for universalist preachers; nor have I any friendship for them whatever; I abhor them!"

After the above had transpired, I told Mr. King that the object of my visit was, to inquire concerning what he had said relative to universalists generally, and more particularly relating to his declarations as to the religious character of Mr. L. Barnes. I then told him, that if he did not make some retraction, of what he had said, I should publish his name to the world.—He replied, "publish my name as soon as you please; what do I care about your publishing my name." He refused to make any retraction whatever. Hence I have thought advisable to publish his conduct to the world; and it is the desire of Mr. Barnes, who is an aged man, and the father of the young man whose character Mr. King has traduced, that it should be done.

As to Mr. Lewis Barnes who is dead, and gone we trust to the mansions of peace where "the wicked cease from troubling," I never saw him. I am acquainted with his father, and believe him to be a man of excellent character. He is a firm believer in the final reconciliation of all the ransomed creation of God.

I am also acquainted with the sister of the deceased, who I believe to be an amiable young woman. I have conversed with many of the most respectable inhabitants of Henrietta, and with some in Pittsford on the character of the deceased, and their united testimony is that he was a young man of the very first respectability. He too, with his aged father, was a firm believer in the salvation of all men.—He was called to leave this changing and transitory world when young, being twenty-four years of age. His sister who waited upon him during his illness, when she saw that to all human appearance, he must shortly die, inquired of him what he then thought of universalism? He answered, "it will do to live by, and, GLORY TO GOD, I have found it will do to die by."

It is a truth, that Mr. King has wounded the heart of an aged parent by traducing and abusing the character of a beloved son, who is dead and gone; but all this will not affect the spirit of Lewis Barnes: That has ascended to God who gave it—while his body is returning to its kindred dust.

I send you with the foregoing statements, a certificate with sixteen names attached to it, which testifies what the character of Mr. Lewis Barnes was. I wish you to publish the certificate and the names, as an evidence of the incorrectness of Mr. King's statements. I also send you an extract from Mr. King's sermon, which was delivered about three months after the death of Mr. Barnes. The "extract" I received from Mr. King's own hand and wish you would publish it entire, as it is. Relative to that part of the extract which says "he had not read the bible much, and did not know much about it," it may be proper to remark that it is very doubtful whether Mr. Barnes ever made such an expression. Mr. King says he had his information from Mr. Gold, one of the members of his church. I called on Mr. G. and asked him if he would qualify that such was the fact? He said, in reply, his opinion was, that Mr. Barnes did say so, or words to that effect. I do not charge Mr. G. with having intentionally misrepresented the conversation which took place between him and Mr. Barnes about the time he was taken sick; but I think Mr. G. either misunderstood him or has forgotten the amount of the conversation. When I called on Mr. G. he appeared very candid, and said that when he conversed with Mr. King and related the conversation that passed between Mr. Barnes and himself, he never expected to hear any thing more about it; and of course, did not charge his mind with particulars. Mr. G. is an aged man, and probably his memory is not as good as it once was. Besides all this, it is more than six months since he had the conversation with Mr. Barnes. Another reason I have for believing that he never said what was stated by Mr. King, is, his sister informed me that her brother told her that he had a conversation with Mr. Gold on a religious subject at which time Mr. G. made some quotations from the bible which were incorrect, and he (Lewis) had to send for a bible to correct the old gentleman.

There is another declaration of Mr. King, in which there is not even the shadow of truth.—He said in his discourse while speaking of the deceased, "this man was seldom seen at any house of public worship." Now the fact is simply this, Mr. Lewis Barnes believed in Christ and in the precious gospel of God our Saviour, and whenever he had an opportunity to attend worship where the gospel was preached, he was careful so to do. He frequently attended the Baptist meeting. He attended a funeral but a few weeks before his death where the unmerciful doctrine of endless misery was preached; but so abhorrent were such sentiments to his benevolent soul, that he said to some of his friends, after the funeral was over, "when I die, if you cannot obtain a Universalist preacher to attend my funeral, I had rather you would bury my body without any ceremony at all." And on his dying bed, just before he "gave up his spirit," he requested his aged father to obtain brother Knap to attend his funeral. I sincerely believe, that what Mr. King has said relative to the religious character of Mr. Barnes, is a base falsehood.

Mr. King says when he makes use of the word hell, he means an endless hell—he knows of no other. Let him take heed to his steps, or it will require the great mercy of God to deliver him from the "lowest hell."

I have also obtained the testimony of R. Wickwire, Esq. a gentleman of the first respectability, living in the town of Henrietta. He informs me that he attended one of Mr. King's meetings and heard him say in substance what follows. He declared "that sometimes universalists pretended to be moral and honest men, but that it is not so:—they are dishonest—they are liars, drunkards, Sabbath-breakers, and profane swearers." He continued, "They don't read their bibles; they don't pray in their families; the pharisees leave them altogether out of sight as to prayer, for they make long prayers: they are wretches, with whom no good man ought to associate," &c. &c.

The foregoing is an unvarnished statement of facts, which I have felt it a duty to communicate to the publick. It is designed to expose the conduct of a professed minister of Christ, to serve as a warning to him and all others.—May a merciful heaven deliver the world of mankind from such impositions as are above related; and may erring mortals learn, that it is their duty to comfort the afflicted, instead of inflicting pain upon the wounded hearts of God's mourning children.

HENRY ROBERTS.

REMARKS.

On a second perusal of the foregoing narrative of facts, it occurred to us, that a case so extraordinary ought not to be passed over in silence. He who violates the grave, or disturbs the mouldering ashes of the dead, is entitled to all that distinction which his infamous conduct requires to render it entirely odious to every feeling soul. The wretch—whomsoever he may be—whether a preacher of hell, or a fisherman of Billingsgate—Whether a lord over God's heritage, or the tenant of a dung-hill,—the wretch, we repeat, who can wantonly sport with the reputation of the dead, or the wounded sensibilities of the living, should be taught by the indignation of every parent, wife, husband, brother or sister, that his seat in the scale of being is below the throne of a beggar! Are we to be insulted by being told that such beings are sent forth as heralds of the cross? Are the followers of Jesus to be distinguished by those infernal credentials which entitle them to practice such unheard of cruelties with impunity? Great God! have we come to this! Are the feelings of surviving relatives to be sported with by such impostors, merely because they are clothed with the garments of the sacerdotal office? No, thank heaven. The good sense of the people will not fail to discountenance such outrageous impositions.

The statements of Br. Roberts carry along with them evidence of their authenticity; and Mr. King must rest under the imputation of having betrayed his sacred trust, in causing additional grief to the mourning relatives of the esteemed and virtuous

Mr. Barnes. Let him reflect upon the cruelty of his conduct when his head is laid upon the pillow; let him bring to view the spirit of the deceased;—and while it hovers o'er his guilty head, let him repent! If he have one tender string to his heart; if there be one good feeling in his soul; if there be yet lurking around his earthly tabernacle, one principle of justice, or one item of a good man's conscience, then we shall be satisfied that his hell on earth will be sufficiently severe!

We are truly grateful for the favour conferred upon the publick by brother R. in furnishing the foregoing narrative of those facts. We shall only add, may the afflicted relatives of the deceased, be comforted with the assurance that Jesus is their friend; and may they remember that God loves his offspring, even those that hate him. Let it be also remembered that the immortal part of their relative is beyond the reach of the wicked who delight to trouble.

In confirmation of the foregoing relation of facts, and as a bold and effectual refutation of the aspersions of Mr. King, we give the extract from his sermon alluded to in the foregoing, followed by the certificate, signed by sixteen respectable persons, showing the falsity of his slanderous accusations and the respectability of the deceased.

EXTRACT FROM KING'S LIBELLOUS SERMON.

"Let not that man, therefore, who would avoid that vengeance, which will come upon bold blasphemers, say there's no hell. And doubtless, those who do believe there's no hell, are given over to strong delusion to believe a lie, that they may be damned. Such a horrible instance of delusion and depravity occurred in this very town about three months since. This man, after a sickness of two or three weeks, died. He had lived like a heathen in this christian land: said he had not read the bible much, and did not know much about it, but had come to the determination of giving it a thorough reading; this was at the beginning of his sickness, when he was not aware that he was so soon to appear before God to answer for his sins. This man was seldom seen at any house of publick worship, and was eminently destitute of any regard whatever to the subject of religion. And what think you such a sinner said, a few days before his death, when he himself had given up all hope of recovery, and expected soon to be in eternity. The deluded wretch said, the doctrine of a hell was all priestcraft and ridiculous: and this sinner, who, by his ungodly life had become so eminently fitted for destruction, appeared to be honest in saying that he believed there was no hell—he appeared to be in no more fear than a brute of experiencing any punishment for his sins. Do you perceive then my hearers, how great may be the delusion of a hardened sinner? And do you suppose that God does not in this age, as well as in former times, send strong delusion on some of the ungodly, that they may certainly be damned? There are some such men, beyond all doubt. If you wish to know who they are and what they believe, you cannot probably come nearer the truth than to fix your eye on the hardened wretch who believes there's no hell."

CERTIFICATE,

IN VINDICATION OF MR. BARNES' CHARACTER.

Henrietta, April 5th, 1827

We, the undersigned, do certify that we have been intimately acquainted with Mr. L. Barnes, a young man who died in this town, on the 29th of October last, for two years previous to his death, and we have no hesitation in saying that he was a young man of the very first respectability. We have ever found him to be a sober, honest and industrious young man, and an ornament to the society in which he lived: he died much lamented by all who knew him.

LITTLE CHARLES.

Well, Charles is highly pleased to-day,
I gave him leave to go and play
Upon the green, with bat and ball;
And when he heard his playmates call,
Away he sprung across the plain,
To join the little merry train.
But here he comes—why, what means this?
I wonder what has gone amiss,—
Why, Charles, how came you back so soon?
I gave you leave to stay till noon.
"I know it sir, and I intended
To play till every game was ended;
But, to say truth, I could not bear
To hear those little fellows swear—
They cast such frightful, horrid oaths,
From their abominable mouths,
And cursed so bold and fearlessly,
That the cold chills ran over me—
For I was seized with awful dread
That some of them would drop down dead—
And so I turned and came away,
For, Pa, I was afraid to stay!"

Good boys never will stay among those who curse and swear, but will run away from them as fast as they can.

O RIGOROUS C RIMINATIONS.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

One thing very remarkable with regard to preachers of modern orthodoxy is, not so much that they believe in a future general judgement after death, but the scriptures which they adduce to prove such a judgement. It is very common for them to assert from the desk, that the judgement is to take place in a future state; that is, after death, and for proof they repeat as scripture the following:—"It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after this, the judgement." Thus mutilating, garbling, and interpolating a passage of scripture, or as Paul expresses it, "handling the word of God deceitfully." They thereby cause many to believe there is such a passage of holy writ, and of course a judgement as is by them represented. This has been done frequently by one who has officiated as Pastor of the Presbyterian church in this place, for two or three years past; and on a certain occasion, a funeral occasion, this verse was selected as his text, and every time repeated care was taken to add the word all, and end the word judgement with a full period; and also, frequently to omit the words and as, related to the word so in the next verse. Thus repeating the text, conviction was carried to the mind of the hearer, or to those who pay but little attention to the study of the scriptures, that the death spoken of in the text, related to the natural death of all mankind; and the judgement to a period after the natural death of all mankind.

The reader is now requested to take his Bible, set down and turn to Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews and candidly review the 7th, 8th and 9th chapters, and see if he is then prepared to give the 27th verse this "private interpretation"; or to disregard the relative use of as and so; or to read, "It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after this the judgement." If he reads with candour he will soon discover who those men were, who were appointed once to die, and what this death was, and why the apostle was led to speak of this death. He will also read it as it is written. "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgement; so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many: and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Let him then see if it would not be more agreeable with the reasoning of the apostle, after drawing a parallel between the old dispensation and the new; or the Abrahamic covenant and the Christian; the Priests under the law who were the type of Christ, and Christ our great high Priest, the anti-type of those Priests, under the law: I say is it not more agreeable with the reasoning of the apostle to say that the death of those who were appointed once to die, alluded to the typical cleansing, or death of those men who were high Priests, under the law, that is dying in their sacrifices for the justification of the children of Israel; that typifying the death and resurrection of Christ, "who gave himself a ransom for all" for the "justification" of "all men" unto life—for every man" the propitiation for the sins of the whole world" 1 Tim. ii. 6; Rom. v. 18; Heb. ii. 9; 1 John, ii. 2. That the word "judgement" in the text, signifies the same that it does in Exodus, 28th, 29th, 30th, on the same subject, is as evident as it is that the apostle is treating upon the same subject. He who can lay aside this interpretation of the text, and substitute the notion that it respects the natural or temporal death of all men, and a general judgement after that death for the deeds done in this life, is prepared not only to mutilate, garble, and interpolate the text, but also to deny or contradict the following passages of scripture. Heb. ix. 5, 1 Cor. xv. 51; 1st Peter iv. 17; 2 Cor. v. 10; Eccl. iii. 16, 17. A few more remarks on the common notion of a general judgement after death, and we will dismiss the subject.

First then, those who pretend to believe that God will render to every man after death, according to deeds done in this life, are the very persons who deny the doctrine. For say they, though a man sin as with a cart rope, until he is ninety-nine years of age and then dies, if he breathes out a penitent prayer five minutes before his exit, God will pardon him; which is about the same as to say, God will not render to him according to his deeds, for his deeds have all been wicked, and of course deserve endless misery. For "every sin deserves God's wrath and curse, both in this life and that which is to come," and "the pains of hell forever." But say they, the man has repented; ah indeed! and what is this repentance? Why it is faith in Jesus Christ. And how does he obtain this faith? O it is the gift of God, to be sure. Then the amount of the whole story is this, God will render to him according to his deeds, if he does not grant him faith and repentance. But if he does grant him faith and repentance, and makes him the recipient of eternal blessedness, then God will not render to him according to his deeds. So that a day of judgement in a future state for the purpose of rendering to this man according to his deeds in this life, (whose whole life has been one scene of wickedness and deserving of endless misery)—is entirely laid aside. This then is complete orthodoxy—believe in a future judgement—talk much about it—say it is to be in a future state, for the purpose of rendering to every man according to his deeds done in this life; and then in reality deny it. While the universalist, who believes that “every transgression and disobedience receives a just recompense of reward.”—that he that doeth wrong receives for the wrong which he has done”—that unto the Lord belongeth mercy, for he renders unto every man according to his works” in this life—that a heaven of immortality is the free favour of God, and not dependent on any good works performed by man in this life. This is Heterodoxy.

RECIPROCATION.

“And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.”—LUKE VI. 32.

The above is justly entitled “the golden rule of our Saviour.” It embraces every thing that is good, virtuous, and godlike. There is not an exceptionable feature about it. It may be applied to all our relations and concerns in life. As none of us “would, that men should do” us evil, so, we should be careful, ever to “recompense to no man evil for evil.” And, as we are often seeking and obtaining favours of others, of various kinds, we should always reciprocate, according to our abilities “for this is the law and the prophets.” Hence I think myself justified in propounding a few questions for “A.’s” consideration, hoping that he will give them all the attention they deserve. Let the merits and importance of the several subjects proposed, be fairly and candidly considered in the light of scripture and reason whatever may be the result, and let our only object be to know “what is truth.” In bringing forward my questions I shall accompany them with quotations from the holy scriptures which “A.” is requested carefully to notice. I exhibit, then, the following:

1. Had the Almighty, ‘from the beginning,’ any purpose, will, counsel, design, or pleasure, in regard to mankind, his offspring? [“DECLARING THE END FROM THE BEGINNING and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, my counsel shall stand and I will do ALL MY PLEASURE.” See the connexion. Isa. xlvii. 10.]

2. What is the will, purpose, or pleasure of the Almighty respecting mankind? [Having MADE KNOWN unto us the mystery of his WILL according to his GOOD PLEASURE which he had PURPOSED IN HIMSELF, that in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together IN ONE ALL THINGS IN CHRIST, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him.” Eph. i. 9, 10. Who WILL HAVE all men to be SAVED and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.” 1 Tim. ii. 4.]

3. Will the purpose, will, or pleasure of the Almighty be accomplished, or prosper in the hands of the Messiah? [“The PLEASURE of the LORD shall prosper in his hands.” See the context. Isa. liii. 10. “I the LORD have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thy hand and will keep thee, and will give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the gentiles.” xlii. 6.]

4. Did the Almighty purpose, foresee or decree from all eternity, the endless misery of a part of mankind? [“I will declare the DECREE: The LORD hath said, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron, thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter’s vessel.” Ps. ii. 7—9.]

5. Will God be as much glorified in the endless misery of a part of mankind as in the salvation of the whole? [“For my NAME’S SAKE will I defer mine anger and for my PRAISE will I refrain for thee, that I cut thee not off: Behold I have refined thee, but not with silver, I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction. For MINE OWN SAKE, even for MINE OWN SAKE will I do it; for how should my NAME BE POLLUTED; and my GLORY I will not give to another. Isa. xlviii. 9—11.]

6. If God loved the world and sent his Son, the fruits of his love (Rom. v. 8,) to taste death for EVERY MAN,” (Heb. ii. 9,) [and if he loved the WORLD of mankind he must have loved the individuals composing the world. Ps. cxlv. 9.] will he ever change, or cease to love the objects whom he once loved? [“God is love.” 1 John, iv. 8. With “the Father of lights is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.” James i. 17.]

7. If God loves the world and his love be immutable, will he suffer any part of mankind to be endlessly miserable whom he can save as well as not and still love them? [“The Lord will not cast off forever. But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.” Lam. iii. 31—33. For I will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth; for the spirit should fail before me and the souls which I have made," Isa. lvii. 16.]

8. Are the punishments or chastisements inflicted upon mankind vindictive, or corrective? ["Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." Heb. xii. 6. "Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept thy word. It is good for me that I have been afflicted, that I might learn thy statutes. I know, O, Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me." Ps. cxix. 67, 71, 75.]

The above interrogatories are humbly submitted, hoping, that "A." will give them as much attention as I have given his, and oblige one who is desirous to know the truth. The quotations accompanying each question are only a specimen of what might be adduced.

My next inquiries will be on the subject of immortality which I will forward in due time.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

REPLY TO THE OBJECTIONS OF "A."

We have considered the objections of our correspondent, as embraced in his three first particulars, and come now to review the contrast he has exhibited between the arguments of T. G. and the bible. His comparison is as follows.

"T. G." God wills, purposes and determines, that all shall be saved."

"Bible." Strive to enter in at the strait gate:—for many, I say unto you, shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able."

"T. G." The requirements of the law prove to demonstration that God loves all."

"Bible." God is angry with the wicked every day."

"T. G." The whole family of man is included in Christ's church."

"Bible." Ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you.—They are not all Israel which are of Israel.—Many are called, but few chosen.—Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? &c.—then will I profess unto them I never knew you; depart from me ye that work iniquity."

On the foregoing comparison we remark; first: T. G. proved from 1. Tim. ii. 2—4. that it is the will of God that all men should be saved. This fact A. will not pretend to deny. 2. He also proved from Eph. i. 8—10. that it is the purpose of God, that all shall be gathered together in Christ—in other words; that "all" shall be made obedient to the divine authority of the Son, and regenerated by his wonder working grace. That God's purpose, or his "will," which he had purposed in himself," is one and the same with his determination, is too evident to admit of a reasonable objection. Hence, it follows, from premises which A. has not called in question, that "God wills, purposes, and determines, that all shall be saved." It remains only to be seen, whether the passage quoted by A. and urged as an objection to the foregoing statement, contains anything at variance with it, or not. To show that it does not, we have only to remark; 1. There is nothing in the passage itself which at all impeaches the proposition of T. G. or relates, in the least, to the will, purpose, or determination of God, as referring to the final salvation of mankind. 2. The text quoted, when taken in connexion with other testimony of the "lively oracles," proves the fact, that all those spoken of in the text as not being "able" to enter into the kingdom of God, shall receive help. "Ask, and it shall be given you;—seek, and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened," is the declaration of our divine Master; and although none are able of themselves to knock, open, or enter the true door, yet help is promised by one who cannot lie. So far, therefore, as concerns those who "seek and are not able" to enter in, the case is perfectly clear—they shall be blessed with the needed help.

But A. evidently designed to bring forward the passage under consideration to show, that some shall never enter heaven; and he must maintain, that the only thing that can prevent, is the purpose of God. How will this idea correspond with a declaration made by him, as noticed under our 2nd general particular? Then he contended that mankind are not doomed to hell, by any decree or purpose, or "predetermination" of God; but are fitted by their own wickedness for destruction. But here he seems to have lost sight of his former objections, and we find him contending that those who seek to enter heaven, shall not be able! T. G. is accused of misrepresenting the doctrines of the bible, and of the orthodox, in saying that if some are elected from all eternity, and others are passed by and ordained to be damned, the damnation of the non-elect is brought about by the predetermination of the Almighty; and the next thing is, A. contends that those who seek to enter into heaven, shall not be able! 3. That the words under consideration had no allusion to another mode of being, but only to the kingdom of heaven, here on earth, is evidently implied in the text itself, and plainly demonstrated by the nature of the case. Beside all this, the fact that it does not plainly assert any thing contrary to the doctrine advanced and defended by T. G. is enough of itself to render it obligatory upon A. to show wherein it impeaches his argument. When, therefore, we take the passage in connexion with those quoted by T. G. we learn that it is not in the power of man to save himself, but that it is the will, purpose and determination of God, to save him, by sending Jesus Christ to seek and save that which was lost.—Thus, then, we find, that a merciful God hath vouchsafed to help those who want help, and save those who desire to be saved here; and hath purposed in himself to gather together all things in Christ, hereafter. Well may it be said, therefore, that his Grace which bringeth salvation to all men, "is extended, not only to the Jews, but in a very unlimited sense, to all the Gentile world."

Again, T. G. maintained that "the requirements of the law prove to demonstration, that God loves all." As an objection to this statement A. quotes Ps. vii. 11. "God is angry with the wicked every day." Now, although we have enough in the very text quoted by A. to overthrow his objection to the doctrine he attempts to bring to nought; yet we prefer, for the present, to reason upon the subject. How are we to understand the term anger when applied to the Deity? Are we to say that he is angry as men are angry? Are we to believe, that wrath or anger, dwells in his bosom? Let the christian beware how he answers these questions. "Anger resteth only in the bosom of fools!" God is not a fool, that he should be angry after the manner of men. In what sense, then shall we understand the term? Ans. He disapprobates and disapproves the wickedness of the wicked; and the term anger is used to convey an idea elsewhere expressed, that He "will by no means clear the guilty." It signifies, that his very nature, his holiness, his love, his goodness—are all opposed to the iniquity of man—so much opposed, that evil can never be reconciled with his attributes, or suffered to exist to endless duration. Hence, then, this very fact argues that there will be an end of transgression, and all, and every, of the evils produced by it. Say, if the reader please, that there is an infinite devil, an infinite hell, and infinite sin to qualify its tenants; say, that there is a predisposition in God's rational offspring to rush down to the infernal abodes of the fancied devils of orthodoxy—what then? Does all this prove that God's anger or wrath will be satisfied with such a result? If an answer be given in the affirmative, it proves that God can be reconciled to an eternal evil*—that he and the devil will both be fed upon the same food—will both rejoice together on viewing the direful catastrophe—and that the nature, perfections, and love of God, assent to what all good men desire to avert, and what none but devils could pray to have accomplished? The reflecting mind revolts at the picture thus held up to view; and reason, as well as revelation, condemns the gross absurdity of A.'s proposition!

Anger, when ascribed to God, in its most unlimited sense, is put for his just displeasure with sin.—It no more proves that his love is limited, than it does that he is a changeable, fretful, petulant being; and he whose creed leads him to suppose the almighty Disposer of all events, to be subject to wrath or anger, according to the modern acceptation of the terms, is to be more pitied than despised. Hence, then, for all that yet appears to the contrary, the requirements of God's holy law, "prove to demonstration," that although God disapprobates sin, yet that he loves all men. Like a kind father, while he chastises a froward son, he loves him. Yea, "whom he loveth he chasteneth," &c.

But, farther—without appealing to the Law of God, for a confirmation of the argument of T. G. there is enough to sustain his position, in the design of sending the Redeemer into the world. "God so loved the world" that he sent his only begotten son into the world, to be the propitiation for our sins. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us." &c. Hence, "we love him because he first loved us."—Now observe; the world, not the elect, not the pious, not the godly—the world, we repeat, were those whom God loved.—Sinners, like A. and ourselves, were the objects of his affection. We sinners, were beloved of God before the law was ever promulgated. This love was the moving cause of all that has ever been done for the sinful race of men. Love, induced God to promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent;—Love, dictated the promise that in Christ all nations, kindreds, and families of the earth shall be blessed;—Love dwelt in the mind of God when he covenanted to give the heathen and the uttermost parts of the earth to Christ for his possession;—Love caused the Son of God to suffer for the sake of sinners;—Love constrained the angelick host to shout "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will towards men;" yea, Love directed the pen of the apostle, when he declared that "God will have all men to be saved!" The Law, which was 430 years after the promises made to the patriarchs, was never designed to destroy all this work of grace—it never can disannul these glorious promises.

But farther:—That the law of God itself proves to demonstration that God loves all, will be evident when we notice a few particulars. 1. The law of God "is perfect, converting the soul." A perfect law must be so enacted, that its object shall be attained. The object in giving the law, was, to have all men love the Lord our God with all their heart, mind and strength. If, therefore, this law is perfect, and if it shall be administered, and enforced, in a righteous manner, it will effect the grand object in view, and all men will be finally constrained to love God. The object, then, in giving the Law was founded in benevolence, in love itself; and the fair conclusion is, that God would never have given man a perfect law for this benevolent purpose, if he had not loved him. 2. God only requires of us to imitate his divine perfections; hence it is that we are required, in his Law, to love him, and our fellow-beings. There is no other foundation, therefore, for those commandments on which hang the Law and the Prophets, than the eternal and impartial love of God. See Matt. v. 43—48. God requires that mankind should be holy as he is holy, and unless all are holy in the end, his requirements will never be complied with—his law will be proved imperfect—and his love will be impeached. Hated, we are told, induced the Almighty to make a hell for his children; and if such were the fact, we should think he would have amended the law, so as to have it require that some should hate him to all eternity!

* That endless damnation is an evil, will never be denied by any rational being. It is considered an evil to profane the name of God here; and it must be a still greater one to blaspheme his name to all eternity hereafter. Unless, therefore, sin shall be destroyed, it will follow that God is placed in that kind of dilemma which requires him to be reconciled to that which is opposed to his very nature.

Farther:—The passage quoted by A. to impeach the argument of T. G. when examined, will be found to contain nothing to his purpose. See Ps. vii. 11. "God is angry [with the wicked] every day." Now, A. knows that the words printed in italicks, and enclosed above in brackets, are supplied by the translators; and are no more a part of the sacred text, than of the Koran. The text, when the interpolation is expunged, reads thus—"God is angry every day!" If, therefore, A. insists that it impeaches the argument of T. G. at all, he will be candid enough to admit, that it proves just as clearly, that God is angry with every body, every day! Indeed, we think it will be as easy to prove that God hates all mankind, as that he hates any, (according to the import of A.'s objection;) and we are ready to show, that if any are hated of God, they are such as have a "comfortable hope" for themselves, and piously doom "the wicked" to hell.

It remains to consider the other particulars of A.'s communication, which we intended to lay before our readers in this number; but want of room prevents.

[REMAINDER NEXT WEEK.]

"Mr. Fanshaw, printer for the New York Tract Society, has one or two printing-presses, which are put in operation by horse-power, applied by asses. The editors of the "Gospel Advocate," speaking of the circumstance, remark, that they have often wondered at the stupidity and worthlessness of some of the tracts issued from these presses; but could never assign any good reason for this characteristic, till they discovered that the tracts were the work of jackasses! We do not quote the language precisely, as we have not their paper at hand; but we give it substantially.—Are the editors of this paper truly gospel advocates? If so, they are no great acquisition to the cause of Christianity."

The above article is copied from the "Canal of Intelligence," a paper, published by Levi Huntington Young, at Norwich, Conn. It constitutes the leading editorial article in the "Canal," of April 18, which was politely forwarded to us by a friend in Rhode Island. Coming from the "land of steady habits" it deserves a passing remark, which we give in manner following.

The article itself, short as it is, contains two miserable puns, and as many misrepresentations.—The puns are as follows. "Mr. Fanshaw, printer for the New York Tract Society, has 1 or 2 printing-presses, which are put in operation by horse-power, applied by asses!" This is pun the first! The second followeth. "Are the editors of this paper truly gospel advocates? If so, they are no great acquisition to the cause of christianity." This is pun the second! Reader, the sagacious editor of the "Canal of Intelligence," informs us, that if we are TRULY gospel advocates, then we are "no great acquisition to the cause of christianity." Surely the good people of Norwich must be signally favoured, to have such a Canal of Intelligence amongst them! Why, it is surprising that the editor of this useful paper is not employed by Mr. Fanshaw at the press! So much for the puns—now for the misrepresentations.

The aforesaid editor accuses us of having said, that "we have often wondered at the stupidity and worthlessness of some of the tracts issued from those presses; but could never assign any good reason for this characteristic, till we discovered that the tracts were the work of jackasses." Now, the truth is, we never have said that these tracts were the work of jackasses; nor have we intimated any such thing. In remarking upon the circumstance, we said, that, "we had often wondered at the stupidity of the tracts with which our land is inundated, but never till now have been apprised of the fact, that the most stupid of all animals are instrumental in producing them." These are our words, and if the sagacious editor of the "Canal" can distinguish between being the author of a tract, and being instrumental in "producing" one, he will discover his mistake.

He next declares that he gives our remarks substantially as they were made by us. This is a mistake; he has not presented our ideas as they were expressed by us, as will appear by a comparison. Mr. Levi Huntington Young, in all probability never saw our paper containing the article to which he alludes; and betrays a degree of ignorance on the subject, which, in a publick journalist, is unpardonable. Most likely, he thought to gain the favour of some tract maker by giving a random shot at us, and so let fly! The circumstance illustrates the truth of the remark made by the N. Y. Reflector, which first occasioned our own on this subject—"that it is by no means uncommon for animals of this kind to be connected with the press."

ARGUMENT

Messrs Editors: In your reply to my last, you cheerfully admit that mankind must receive "the knowledge of the truth" before they can be happy. You also state, that thousands may die in ignorance of God's love; and farther; that if they do not receive the knowledge of the truth in this life, they must receive it after the resurrection. Thus far, then we are agreed.

But you say you are unable to discover how it becomes necessary to have a day of judgement after the resurrection, to give them this knowledge; although you must admit they must receive it after the resurrection, if they do not obtain it before. The reason you seem to give, why there is no necessity for a day of judgement to give them this knowledge, is, there are some that do obtain this knowledge in this life, without a day of judgement. You hence draw the conclusion, that, as some come to a knowledge of the truth in this life, without a day of judgement, others may obtain the same knowledge in the same way, in another mode of being. I can see no propriety in such a conclusion, unless you believe, and make it appear, that a future state of existence is to be like this, which I am confident you will not pretend. For, if there is no other way to bring those that die ignorant of the truth to the knowledge of it in a future state, than that pointed out and adopted in this life, it is at least probable that many will remain ignorant of it eternally; and popery, mahometanism may be thus perpetuated, which I presume you will not admit. And if you argue that there will be means used to bring them to the knowledge of the truth in a short period of time, or at any particular time, you then admit what I contend for, viz. that there will be a day or time of judgement, to give them such knowledge.

G. W. B.

REPLY.

The reader will bear in mind, that the question in debate is, whether there is to be a day of judgement (according to the common acceptance of those terms) after the resurrection of mankind.—G. W. B. has undertaken to sustain the affirmative, and we the negative of the question. We are by no means bound to make out the negative; but have only to examine his arguments in the affirmative.—G. W. B. has assumed that there is to be a day of general judgement, after the resurrection mentioned by Paul I. Cor. xv. and has attempted to sustain himself by arguments drawn from reason, &c. How has he succeeded? He has told us that mankind cannot be happy without a knowledge of the truth; and, that if they do not obtain such knowledge here, they must hereafter, or not be happy. Now, nothing can be more evident than all this; but we are yet unable to discover why there is to be a general judgement, of necessity, to communicate the necessary knowledge. One after another are here brought to the knowledge and acknowledgment of the truth, and yet we have no particular day of judgement. Truth we admit, is ordinarily communicated to the mind by the use of means, here; but in ancient times it was often sent home to the soul instantaneously and miraculously. For example, the case of Saul. On his way to Damascus, he heard a voice which convinced him that he was wrong, and had done wrongfully in persecuting the christians. In a moment he became another creature—a follower of that Jesus whom he had persecuted. Why, then, is it “probable” that some will remain ignorant of the truth eternally, even admitting no other means will be used hereafter than have been used heretofore. The same power that could humble a Saul of Tarsus in a moment, can, “in the twinkling of an eye,” convince, convict, and regenerate any other sinner, either here or hereafter. Nor does it by any means follow that all mankind shall be thus wrought upon at one time. The work may be successive, and progressive; or it may be at one time, and effectual in all alike, and yet we find no necessity for a judgement day. Suppose we should admit that all this shall be done in “a short period of time,”—does it necessarily follow that this short period is the judgement day contended for by G. W. B.? By no means. For, admitting all that to be true, it would remain for our correspondent to show that the “short period” would possess all the essentials of his judgement day. After all; therefore, we are unable to discover that our former concessions either impair our own arguments or strengthen those of G. W. B. We wait therefore for our correspondent’s “strong reasons,” or a “thus saith the Lord,” to convince us.

In the following letter from brother R. Streeter, of Portland, Me. the reader will find many judicious remarks on the subject of “revivals,” and a candid refutation of slanderous reports put in circulation by sectarian zealots, prejudicial to the cause of truth, and designed to bring into disrepute a doctrine more frequently misrepresented than argumentatively opposed. The circumstance brings to mind instances which have fallen under our own observation; in which it has been said, of nominal universalists, that they had “got religion” when they embraced the doctrine of endless misery, and discarded universalism. Now, we do not believe that a well informed, and sincere universalist, ever did, or ever can embrace the wicked doctrine of endless misery; nor do we believe that all fahsofo who pretend to have once believed in the salvation of all men, and afterwards to have been “converted” to some other faith, always “get religion” of the right kind. We remember once having been told by a flaming professor of endless torments, that he once believed in the doctrine of universalism; but on being interrogated, he was unable to tell what universalists do believe! Another thing; the various denominations all unite in palming off upon us all the unbelievers in christendom; who are no more entitled to the appellation of universalists, than they are to that of limitarians. Since our opponents find so many real defects (as they suppose) in our faith and practice, we should be glad to be hereafter exonerated from such undeserved imputations; and in return for all the favours we ask of our accusers, we promise to do all in our power to convert them to a love of the religion of Jesus and the truth of God.

FALSE REPORTS CONTRADICTED.

Mr. Editor—If you should deem it proper to publish the following extract of a letter from BR. STREETER, of Portland, I hope you will give it as early an insertion as possible. The publication of it would have a tendency to stop the circulation of several false rumors. The extract is from a private communication; but the views of the writer are exhibited in that respectful and kind disposition, to which no christian heart could object.

LOVER OF TRUTH.

S——, April 6.

THE EXTRACT.

Portland, April 2, 1827.

DEAR BROTHER,—Yours of the 27th ultimo, was received this morning, and I hasten to give you the earliest reply in my power. I am certain that your ‘astonishment’ could not be greater on hearing what you relate, than my regret is, that such groundless stories should be circulated by people professing christian godliness. Such reports will operate to the discredit of religion in general. It will be discovered by non-professors, that these stories are fabricated to answer sectarian purposes.— But, brother, I would by no means recommend a violent and hasty retort upon the retailers of such worthless merchandize. Treat them with moderation and calmness. Many of them are sincere and honest in the thing, and really suppose they are “doing God-service.” Meet them, therefore, with an ingenuous, christian spirit, and gently demand the evidences for such incredible reports. As they will find themselves unable to produce any, seize the moment in which they pause to study out a reply, and kindly show them the impropriety of giving countenance to such idle tales. By this means, you may hope to become instrumental in bringing them to a sense of their duty, and prevent their persevering in a course, which in their rational moments, they would heartily despise. Great allowance must be made for the fervor and fury of their religious zeal; and we must remember that we are all liable to err in devising means for the promotion of our favourite systems. I hope this consideration will have a tendency to make us charitable, humble and patient. We must employ no weapons in this warfare, but those of reason and persuasion.

But, to come more directly to the main points of your letter.

1. You say, it is currently reported that I have publicly declared my conviction, that the revival which is going on in Portland, is the supernatural work of the Holy Ghost; and that I dare not oppose it, lest I should be found fighting against God. In reply, I do assure you, the report is incorrect. I do not believe there is any supernatural or miraculous work, in this place. My language has uniformly been, that I did not admit that any miracles, on mind or matter, had taken place, through human agency, since the days of the apostles.— And, indeed, I can, to my own satisfaction, account for all the excitement which exists, on the common principles of causes and effects.— The means employed are naturally calculated to produce the consequences which follow.

But, that I do not oppose, (i. e.) interrupt and hinder my religious neighbours, in the prosecution of “their own work, in their own way,” is readily admitted. They have an unquestionable right to meet for religious exercises, as often as they please; and if people wish to attend, who make no profession of religion, I have no right to complain. They will probably do some good. It is said that several persons, of very suspicious character, as well as others, have been reformed; and instead of wandering the streets for corrupting purposes, spend their evenings at the lecture or prayer meetings. And a number of young people, whose attention has never been called to religion, are serious, and appear disposed to reform and follow Christ. Now, so far as these excitements do good, I rejoice; but when carried to excess, so as to produce derangement or insanity, as has been the case, I believe, with several, in this town, I lament. The meetings for singing, praying, exhorting, kneeling, sighing, groaning and screaming are kept up every night; and for my part, I wonder they do not produce a much greater “stir” among the people, than what is visible. All means are employed, and all the passions artfully addressed and perseveringly tried.

2. It is reported that the most substantial members of my Society, have experienced religion and left my meeting. As to this experiencing religion, as the phrase is, I hope all the “substantial members” of my meeting continue daily to experience the influence “of pure and undefiled religion, before God and the Father.” At any rate, I am free to confess, that I regard none as being “substantial who do not do it. But there are doubtless some, in all societies, who are not experimental christians, and I should as heartily rejoice as any man, to have a true christian experience take place in the hearts of all such. But I know nothing of the “overturn and flocking off” from my meeting, of which you speak. It is very possible that a few young people, of volatile spirits, who have occasionally attended at the house where I preach, have joined the “reformation meetings;” and if they derive any good from it and actually reform, I do most sincerely hope they will remain steadfast, where they are. If they reform and live righteously, they will only comply with what I have uniformly enjoined upon them. Indeed, I challenge any person to come forward, and say he ever heard me encourage any body, old or young, to continue in sin. If any wicked people expect to be tolerated in such a course, by sitting under my ministry, they will certainly be mistaken; and whether they flock in one direction or another, is to me a matter of concern, only, as I regard their moral welfare. I take a scriptural, strait-forward course, exposing the enormity and consequence of all manner of crimes, regardless of the applause or frowns of such as would wish me to pursue a different one. For, at all events, I am determined to do my duty, and preserve a clear conscience in the sight of God and men.

3. You tell me, it is believed by many, that I have changed my sentiments, but am ashamed to confess it in Portland; and have therefore, asked a dismission, to go to some other place and preach a different doctrine. Now, brother, you excite my surprise! If I understand you the people who would claim me as a believer in their doctrine, are making out, that I am changed to a hypocrite; and am ashamed to own my real sentiments. Well, if they should produce such a change in me, it would be a great work indeed; greater I apprehend, than ever you will witness. It would be a change of heart; for, I have no incentive or disposition, to act hypocritically. And let it be, once for all, distinctly understood, that should I be convinced of the truth of endless misery, I should esteem it a privilege,—not a disgrace, to acknowledge it. There is no crime in declaring the convictions of one's mind, even, should it prove on further examination, to be wrong. It affords me great pleasure to regard most people, of all denominations as sincere in their professions, though many of them must, of course be in errors. And may God grant, that the time may never come when I shall feel differ only, or be unwilling, honestly to declare my sentiments. As respects the people who are carrying on their work of religion and zeal, in this town, I need only say, that I desire to have no misunderstanding or contention with them;—I must wish them prosperity in all that is good, and hope, that, wherein they are wrong, they may all be enlightened by the great flame of truth and love.

TRUTH CONFIRMED.

Messrs Editors: I think the following certificates, in addition to that published in your last number, will be acceptable to your readers. They have reference to a part of Mr. King's slanderous declarations against Mr. Lewis Barnes; and pointedly condemn his graceless reviling of the dead

H. ROBERTS.

I do hereby certify, that I was personally acquainted with the late Mr. Lewis Barnes of this town, for six months before his death; that his character was truly moral; that he spent much of his leisure time in reading; and that it was his common practice to read a chapter or more in the bible before retiring to repose. He boarded and lodged in my house for about six months previous to his death.

MOSES WARRINER.

Henrietta, April 22, 1827.

I boarded and lodged in the same house with Mr. Lewis Barnes, for about two months previous to his death; and during that time I can certify the same facts stated by Mr. Warriner in the above.

NEW PUBLICATION.

We have received the first number of the "Evangelical Repository," published at Troy, N. Y. and edited by Br. Lemuel Willis. #### DIED.

In Avon, N. Y. on the 18th inst. Mrs. ELIZA, consort of MANSON PAYNE, aged 20 years. She was beloved and esteemed in life, and deeply lamented in death. She was endeared to her relatives and friends, by the tenderest ties, which, as all others this side of immortality must be, were sundered by the insatiable king of terrors. Perhaps no one acquainted with the circumstances of Mrs. Payne's sickness and suffering, can recollect a more perfect example of christian patience and submission, than she exhibited. Besides being separated from a kind and tender husband, affectionate parents and other interesting relatives, she left behind her an infant daughter, who, though it had been distinguished previously by a name, she requested, some time before her death, should be called Eliza! May the Almighty keep and bless the interesting charge, and cause it to possess all the ennobling virtues of its departed mother! And may the same Almighty hand sustain all those who in this bereavement have lost what earth cannot restore.—Com.

SECTARIAN CORPORATIONS.

The following article deserves the serious attention of our legislatures in every state of the union. The practice of granting acts of incorporation to societies and institutions under the controul and management of the clergy, has proceeded with rapid strides, a few years past, and unless arrested by the voice of the people or the good sense of our legislators, ere long, as formerly in England, and now in Spain, a great part of the wealth of the country will be in the hands of ecclesiasticks, and their power and influence will be in proportion to their property.—Ed. Refor.

FROM THE MAINE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER.

In addition to the reasons given last week why we believe that those societies which are formed and continually forming in our country, soliciting money from all classes of community and applying it to sectarian purposes, are calculated to prove injurious to the publick, we would take the liberty here to add another which deserves, what we believe it has not yet engaged, the serious attention of the guardians of the publick weal. We object to giving any class of men the privilege of accumulating—no matter by what means, whether by begging or taxation—unlimited sums of money and other standard property, and permitting them to hold such property forever, independently of the demands of government, and without contributing any thing towards the publick burdens.—This objection we confess was suggested to us on reading the late message of the governor of Massachusetts to the House of Representatives of that state. He has advanced an idea, which seems to have been heretofore overlooked by politicians; but one which is obviously weighty and important. He objects to those incorporations “where a mere trust is to be executed, coupled with no personal interest,” unless they are of a character to “alleviate the wretchedness of human infirmity,” &c. and even then he suggests “there should be some limited time, when the legislature might exercise the power of revision or revocation.” “There are,” he says, “two descriptions of corporations known to our laws.—The one, in which a pecuniary concern is created, and exists in the members—the property of which is made to contribute to the publick burdens and is liable to be disposed of,” &c. Such corporations cannot be objected to. But the other description is dangerous. It includes all the sectarian institutions of which we speak.—“In them,” says he, “the property is locked up from individual controul, is subtraced from the mass of transmissible wealth, and is held in perpetuity to be applied only to the purposes and objects” of sectarian ambition and party proselytism. Such institutions have “a tendency to absorb individual property in the capital of corporations, and thereby to destroy its future divisibility and voluntary distribution to an extent which, says he, I believe, is hardly apprehended by the community. It may well deserve regard to what consequences an unrestricted indulgence in this policy may lead.

The worthy and able governor of that commonwealth has here laid the axe, where it ought to have been years ago, at the very root of all those orthodox institutions which have fattened upon the indulgence of the people. He has shown, in a manner which cannot be resisted, that they are robbing both the government and country of the very means of existence, and building up a privileged aristocracy absolutely dangerous to equal rights. Heretofore it has been uniformly customary for our legislatures to throw their protecting arms around those sectarian money makers; giving them the desired act of incorporation, and authorizing them to hold property forever, secure from taxation. “And it has been done,” says he, “to an extent hardly apprehended by the community.” Our legislatures, wishing to patronize whatever is calculated to improve the moral condition of the country, have suffered themselves to be blinded by the appeals of men professing to be engaged in the cause of benevolence. They seem not to have looked to the consequences which an unrestricted indulgence in this policy may lead.” They were not aware that they were authorizing a set of aristocratick men to drain the country of almost all the money there is in it, and thus enabling them, in the midst of their sacred influence, to look down upon the poverty of the government and people, bidding defiance to all their attacks.

Our readers will now perceive with us the injurious tendency of these corporations.—They obtain immense sums of money that never can return again to the body of the people from whom it was extorted. Their institutions are made rich and can never become poorer. The influence of wealth which they possess can never be lessened. The publick treasury may become impoverished, the arm of government may be paralyzed, the country may become poor, still they must be rich. The strong hand of government can never enter their consecrated chests. On them no taxes can be assessed, and though the formers should fail, their power cannot be impaired. The time may come when these orthodox institutions will have absorbed a majority of the actual property of the Union, and when, therefore, the supreme power will be in their own hands. "These apprehensions," says Gov. Lincoln, "are not idle or visionary." They may yet be fatally realized. Grants, bequests, and contributions will occasionally fall in, and ultimately the mass will be accumulated. There is here no countervailing principle to apply. Death executes no statutes of distribution. What is once received is held forever! And although each one of the corporations may be restricted in the extent of its acquisitions, yet the continued increase of their number (the number of such institutions) operates to an unlimited and infinite accumulation." And, unless government declines granting such incorporations, by which they are allowed to hold the money they extort from the people, he says the time must arrive when violence and revolution will be the only means of bringing the state of things back to its original equality. This worthy government deserves well of his country. He has had the courage to broach a solemn truth in political science, which we devoutly hope may be improved in all our states. Hereafter we hope our legislatures will be more cautious how they authorize a set of ambitious men to drain the community of its circulating medium which can never return again, or contribute its proportions to the public burdens.

It has been well said that the people hardly apprehend to what an extent these societies have already robbed the nation. What is given to them might as well be annihilated; for it is taken effectually and forever from the public. And we suspect that they have been in no small degree the cause of the complaint of the present scarcity in the circulating medium throughout the country. Hear what Gov. Lincoln says, "within five years only, more than thirty millions of dollars have been authorized to be held" in Massachusetts alone by corporations of this description. Suppose, what is perhaps not unlikely, that the other states have extended an equal proportion of this kind of misplaced indulgence; the result would be, that in the United States within the short term of five years only, authority has been given to certain institutions to take forever from the public, property which can never return again or be taxed, to the enormous amount of six hundred millions of dollars! Let this policy continue, and how long will it be before all the wealth of this nation must be under the command of a certain number of corporations.

The orthodox are continually petitioning for acts of incorporation. They are permitted to hold money in trust—property which must descend forever to their disciples only. They obtain money by begging and extortion which they are authorized to hold. Government cannot tax it. The public can never reap any advantage from it—unless it be an advantage to have the country over-run and enslaved by their priests. In this way a religious aristocracy is growing up among us, which threatens destruction to the very vitals of national and individual prosperity.

This is another reason why we are opposed to the patronage of those numerous sectarian corporations, which, like the horse leech's daughters, are continually crying, give, give, and never say enough. Those who encourage them, however innocent may be their motives, are but contributing to create a power that is already dangerous, and may yet prove fatally destructive to our national freedom and independence. And we hope that our fellow citizens will give this objection at least, a serious consideration; and not suffer their confidence in a few religious leaders, to make them forget or neglect a paramount duty which they owe to their country.

We now come to notice the last of those passages brought by A. to disprove the arguments of T. G. Against the statement of T. G. that "the whole family of man is included in Christ's Church, A. urges the following texts: "Ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you."—"They are not all Israel which are of Israel."—"Many are called, but few chosen."—"Many will say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? &c.—Then will I profess unto them I never knew you; depart from me ye that work iniquity."

On this subject we remark, 1. T. G. contended that all mankind are included in the invisible church of Christ. By this church he undoubtedly intended those who shall finally be subjected to Christ, and become the recipients of the joys of immortality in heaven. That some are, and some are not members of the visible church of Christ, is a fact which T. G. did not deny. It remains, then, to be seen, whether the passages quoted by A. disprove the sentiment advanced by T. G. Hence 2. it is worthy of notice, that neither of those texts relate at all to the concerns of a future state. Observe; our Saviour declared that certain persons were not of his sheep at that time; but he did not say they never should be: The apostle said, they are not all Israel which are of Israel; but he did not say they never should be Israel: Our Saviour declares, many are called but few chosen; but he did not say that he few were chosen to the eternal exclusion of the many: He also said to certain persons of old, that at a certain time he would profess to them that he never knew them; but he did not say that such time, or period, was to be in eternity, or after the present life had terminated; nor did he intimate that the final salvation of such persons was not secured by the "will, purpose, and determination of God." All those passages referred to then existing circumstances, and related to this life only. If A. does not assent to this fact, we call on him to prove the contrary "if he can."

Again: It will not be denied, that the invisible church of Christ includes all those of whom he is the Head. He is the head of the church—and of that only. See Eph. v. 23. "Christ is the head of the church; and he is the Saviour of the body."—To know, then, how many are to constitute the church, we have only to inquire of whom is he the Head? An answer is furnished in the following passage from the writings of the same eminent apostle. "But I would have you know, that the head of EVERY MAN is Christ; and the head of the woman is man; and the head of Christ is God." See 1 Cor. xi. 3. See also Col. i. 18—20, and Eph. v. 25—27. Again: Our Lord gave his life for the members of his invisible church; and we are told by limitarians that he died for the church only. We admit the fact; and ask how many he died for? Ans. He died and "gave himself a ransom for ALL to be testified in due time." He is the propitiation, saith an apostle, for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world.

But the objection of A. is virtually against the doctrine of universalism, inasmuch as we hold only to the salvation of the church, and suppose that to include all men. Does our correspondent think the passages quoted by him will overturn the doctrine of universalism? He must be quite ignorant of the sentiment he opposes if he flatter himself with such an idea. The texts quoted, neither prove the doctrine of endless misery, nor disprove that of the universalists; hence, A. must search again for something with which to overturn our sentiments. And while he is doing it, we would thank him to give the public something beside assertions, or passages which by the wisest commentators are acknowledged to be quite irrelevant.

To conclude: If we may hazard an opinion, the reader will have found, on examining the subjects proposed by our correspondent, that the objections urged by him against the arguments of T. G. are far from being conclusive. So far as we are able to determine, the truth of T. G.'s propositions stands firm on the foundation of the scriptures and reason. The conclusion, therefore, which A. has deduced, unfavourable to the moral affect of universalism, "vanishes into thin air." Truth will always have a salutary effect upon the morals of him who believes it; and error will ever have a contrary effect. We are therefore willing to ascertain the relative value of the doctrines of endless misery and universalism, either by an appeal to the scriptures, or by reference to their different effects upon society or individuals. That the notion of endless misery abstractly considered never has, and never can do any good, is evident from the nature of the case and incontestible facts. On the other hand, that universalism never has, and never can do any harm to the morals of community, is as evident as it is that we cannot gather grapes of thorns nor figs of thistles. We challenge A. to produce an instance wherein it has appeared that the doctrine of universalism has ever led to an immoral act; and we promise to show when called upon by any respectable antagonist, that the fundamental principles of the limitarian faith—those on which it stands, and without which it cannot be sustained, have been the cause, either directly or indirectly, of every crime from the commencement of the world to the present day.

With the foregoing facts and statements we submit the matter to our readers, and shall not add any thing farther on the subject, until A. finds it convenient to refute what we have advanced, or make an attempt at a refutation. By confining himself to facts and logical arguments, he will be entitled to our most respectful attention, and to our thanks for his friendly attempts to enlighten our mind and benefit the publick.

Our readers will bear in mind that "A." is absent on a journey, and therefore will not reply (if disposed) until his return.—Ed.

FANATICISM EXPOSED.

Many of our readers have heard of the "Finney revivals" in Utica and in other towns of Oneida co. In Trenton, the inhabitants are favoured with the ministerial labours of Mr. I. B. Pierce, an Unitarian clergyman, of liberal mind, correct deportment, and extensive literary attainments. He has laboured with his people to good acceptance, for ten or twelve years, during which time, if memory serves us, a church has been established, respectable in number and character. This society of believers in one God has long been an eye-sore to the trinitarians in that part of the country (especially the Presbyterians) and during the rage of the "Finney-revival," Trenton was selected as the subject of their operations. In carrying on the farce, the brood of "poor and pious" students, let loose from Auburn "Theological Seminary, who at that time were brought into the field and marshalled by Finney, (who styled himself the Brigadier General of Jesus Christ) frequently designated persons by name, and prayed for them in a most outrageous manner. Amongst others Col. A. G. Mappa, a respectable member of the Unitarian society, was prayed for in that singular manner; and the society to which he belonged was denounced as the "synagogue of Satan—a nest of vipers—a nest of serpents," &c. &c. Such conduct, as well it might, excited a degree of opposition to their unhallowed encroachments, and led ultimately to the publication of a pamphlet entitled "The Bunker-Hill Contest," in which the foregoing, with many other facts were disclosed relating to those matters. This pamphlet, it seems, has brought out a reply on the part of Finney and his coadjutors in which they deny the statements in the pamphlet and attempt a justification of their proceedings. This reply of the presbyterians, is met with a letter to the "presbytery of Oneida county, and their committee" by the author of the "Bunker-Hill Contest," Mr. Ephraim Perkins, in which he vindicates what he had before published, and disproves their declarations in a summary manner.—He styles himself "A Plain Farmer of Trenton," and sustains what he had before stated, not by assertions, but by the affidavits of unimpeachable witnesses. We cannot better subserve the cause of truth than by giving them to our readers. They follow:

Oneida County, ss.—JOHN STORRS being duly sworn, depose and saith, that having uniformly attended the Presbyterian Meeting (with but few exceptions) in the village of Trenton, of which the Rev. Oliver Wetmore is Minister, during the Spring of 1826; and having read the account of some of the proceedings of said meetings, as given by Mr. Ephraim Perkins, in a pamphlet recently published by him, entitled "A Bunker-Hill Contest." He is constrained to say, from what he has seen and heard himself, and from information received from people reputable for truth and veracity the said statements are generally, substantially correct. That there are several inaccuracies in said statement, he has heard said Perkins admit; and also, that he regretted that he had not limited his remarks in said pamphlet generally, to the Clergy, and those strangers who apparently acted in clerical style, with Mr. Wetmore in the revival.

The Unitarian Society were frequently denounced as being the "seat of the Devil, the Synagogue of Satan, a nest of vipers, a nest of serpents; and on one occasion adders and rattle snakes." Eight or ten different persons attended the revival, some of them a longer and some a shorter length of time. From whence they came, or by whose request they came here, he does not know. It was generally reported however, that some or all of them were from the Theological Seminaries.

1st Question by Mr. E. Perkins to this deponent. Did you understand and suppose that those who attended from abroad had had intercourse with Mr. Finney.

Deponent.—I did so understand.

2nd.—Have you ever heard any one say that the Rev. Mr. Pierce the Unitarian Minister in Trenton, had, during the revival noticed in his public performances, any of the conduct of the Presbyterians towards them?

Deponent.—I have no recollection of having heard any thing of the kind.

Oneida County, ss.—Personally came before me, Warren Dodge, Esq. and Anne Brooks, who, being duly sworn, depose and say, that they were present at a meeting at the Rev. Mr. Wetmore's and heard the prayer of the Rev. Mr. Smith, and think that Mr. Perkins has not, in his Bunker Hill Contest, exaggerated the prayer respecting Col. A. G. Mappa, but has come short in their opinion. That the prayer was made after an exhortation given by the Rev. Mr. Smith, setting forth that it was practised in Utica, and other places, to name people and pray for them, which he should do this evening; and said you are pretty good folks in Trenton, not very wicked in this village—you are not more wicked than they are in Utica and other places, and they are worse than the devil, because the devil has had no offers of money: and the observations and expressions connected with the prayer, made such impressions as we never felt before. And he also, in his prayer, prayed that God Almighty would send flashes of hell fire and strike them in the face, and knock them down in the streets.

Oneida County, ss.—Came before me, Nancy Post, who, being duly sworn, saith that she belongs to the Unitarian Church in Trenton, and that she was visited by the Rev. Messrs. Smith, Clarry, and Goodell; and in the course of half an hour's conversation, they told me repeatedly that I denied the Bible, and that I denied Jesus Christ; that I trembled and quaked every time I looked into the Bible; and said "you do not love God—unless you repent you will go to hell." Mr. Smith observed, that he knew the heart of a person in the house better than he did himself. The person told him he had no right to make such observations; to which he replied, he had a commission from God.

Oneida County, ss.—Came before me, Geo. Kelsey and Edmund Wolcott, who, being duly sworn, depose and say that they were present at a meeting on Holland Patent, called an Anxious Meeting, and heard the Rev. Mr. Norton ask Joseph Pride what his name was, and he made no answer; he then asked the audience what this young man's name was, and being told, he asked him a number of other questions, and he answered but one; he then said to the audience that this Joseph Pride has a dumb devil, and when you hear of the death of Joseph Pride, you will hear of an awful death, and when we are called to judgment we shall hear the awful sentence, depart Joseph Pride down to Hell. And furthermore the deponents say not.

Oneida County, ss.—Personally came before me, Elizabeth Parker, and, upon oath saith, that in the month of May, 1826, while attending her daughter, Mrs. Johnson (now deceased) in her last sickness, in a very low stage of consumption : a Mr. Goodell, said to be under the support of the Eastern Education Society, and was then said to be itinerating ; and assisting the Rev. Mr. Wetmore in the height of the "Revival," followed Mrs. Johnson's father-in-law into the house, and pressed himself into the room where she lay, and awoke Mrs. Johnson, by some alarming representations of the condition of one just leaving the world. Mrs. Johnson having previously heard of Mr. Smith's prayer for Col. Mappa, and many other attacks on other individuals, had requested that none of the young Ministers or itinerants should be permitted to approach her.—I asked Mr. Goodell repeatedly, to leave the room—he said to me, I shall not be hurried out of the room by you, I shall take my own time for it—I am concerned about her soul ; and soon stepped out of the room and said, come out old woman I am concerned about your soul too. Mr. and Mrs. Thomson were both Unitarians.

Oneida County, ss.—Personally came before me, Levi Thomson, who being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that the language of a young man in company with Mr. Tanner, in the latter part of June, 1826, whose name was called Clarry, and who exhorted and prayed in Presbyterian meetings, and was said to be from the Theological Seminary at Auburn, was as near as I can recollect, as follows : 'The first salute was, have you any christians here ? After being answered that we did not judge for ourselves on that point : he began to ask questions and make affirmations, which led to a quotation from the Bible, upon which he replied that he would not argue upon the scripture for his soul's sake, and said, you had better lay down your bible and repent of your sins, you may read your bible all your lifetime and go to hell at last, you think of going to Heaven by reading your Bible before you repent, and by so doing you are heaping sin upon sin, and you will all at last go down to hell together.

POPULAR OPINION.

The following articles, which are copied from two periodicals, either of which bear a comparison with any others in America, do but speak the sentiments of a vast majority of our fellow citizens.—The Christian Register, is a highly respectable journal, devoted to the cause of Unitarian Christianity, published at Boston, Mass.; and the Boston Spec- tator and Ladies' Album, published in the same place, deservedly ranks among the best publications of the kind in the country. In the way matters and things are going on, "revival-makers" will soon be out of employment! "Which may heaven grant," &c.—Ed.

From the Christian Register.

We have often had occasion to notice the ill effects of the Religious Phraseology of the day, on the minds of the young. We have, however, rarely had so striking a practical illustration of this, as is presented in the following original anecdote, which a much respected friend in a neighboring town has sent us, and which, he informs us, actually occurred in the place of his residence, a few days since.

At a female school a little girl said to the instructress, ma'am if I always speak the truth, and tell you when the other girls tell lies, a'nt I a better girl than Betsey? No replied Betsey pertly, not a bit better unless you have met with a change.

We are not told what reply the instructress made to the question, or what reproof, if any, she administered to "Betsey" for her strange doctrines. The principal value of the anecdote is to show how readily children catch the language and imbibe and practice upon the principles of those with whom they live and associate.

Far be it from us to treat lightly, or to cast an odium on that reformation of character, (often only imaginary or pretended, but sometimes real and enduring,) which is known, in the technical language of the sects, by the term "meeting with a change." What we have to object to and complain of, is, that the meeting with this change is made an essential in the christian character. It is regarded, not as one step or stage only of the christian course, —but as a final and essential attainment, which places us on secure ground. Hence its influence and tendency is, by the feelings of security it imparts, to lessen the motives and excitements to exertion and watchfulness,—and, worse than all, it leads its subjects to regard with contempt, and to speak disparagingly of the still and modest practical virtues of the christian character, and to indulge uncharitable and censorious feelings and speeches in reference to those who attach a leading importance to practical goodness.

Who can consider without dread the pernicious paretical effects of such principles inwrought in the minds of children from infancy?

It is no apology on the part of parents through whose instrumentality these principles are instilled, that it is not by their approval or consent that such effects are produced on the minds of their children. It is speaking in quite too feeble terms to say, that it is as much a duty to look to the moral tendency of the doctrines they inculcate, as it is to the nature and quality of the food they administer for their sustenance. By as much as the soul is worth more than the body, or eternity more to be regarded than time, by so much, it seems to us, must every considerate parent regard the duty as more important, of guarding the minds of his children, against the reception of doctrines of a morally poisonous influence.

AMERICAN ADVOCATE.

The first number of the American Advocate, a newspaper just commenced at Williamstown, in this state, has this week come to hand. Amid the vast multitude of newspaper titles it seems strange that the proprietors, if they could not invent a new name for their journal, did not hit upon the union of two other appropriate words, which had not already been combined for the title of another paper. An 'American Advocate,' has for many years been issued weekly, at Hallowell, Me. and another publication in New-England with the same title will tend to produce confusion.—The Williamstown paper looks well enough, and probably deserves the customary compliments—conducted with talent, &c. &c. one part is to be devoted to religious intelligence, and to such articles on religious and moral subjects as will afford pleasure and profit to readers. This is likewise very well, and it gives us pleasure to find such subjects are interesting to the community. But when the prospectus goes on to state that the paper will contain accounts of religious revivals, it forfeits our approbation. It is not our intention at present to say more of what are generally denominated 'revivals,' than that we have witnessed several of them, and therefore know that their ultimate results are most vile and pernicious: but we do most heartily disapprove of having such a combination of nonsense and blasphemy as most of these accounts exhibit, trumpeted over the land. This assertion is calculated to stir the wrath and provoke the maledictions of bigots and fanatics, and we may by them be accused of hostility to religion; but we are convinced such persons have very little influence over that religion which teaches the fear of God, good will to all men, and love for our enemies, except, indeed, to cast on it ridicule and reproach and obscure its simplicity and loveliness, with fearful and disgusting deformities:—therefore one who attacks them, will scarcely find himself fighting against God. The truth is, the details of reformations are usually penned by the reverend personage who has been the cause of 'getting them up.' When his imagination is excited, his feelings heated, and the flush of victory on his brow, he sits down and produces a flaming account of the 'season of refreshing' in his region. Very often before his article has gone the rounds of the various prints which copy such nauseous trash, the 'season of refreshing'—or rather of unnatural and ridiculous excitement, has ceased, and his 'flock,' wondering they had been such simpletons as to allow their passions to be so wrought upon, have returned to their old ways, and become more hardened therein. Such boasting triumph as is frequently displayed in these accounts, come with an ill grace from men who teach us in the same breath, that Paul and Apollos may plant and water in vain. The humble—not unto us—not unto us the glory, is a scanty cloak for all this vanity. The circulation of such stuff through our country is one of the greatest absurdities of which an intelligent people can be guilty.

The following proclamation for a fast, issued by His Excellency Enoch Lincoln, governor of Maine, is entitled to a careful perusal. We understand the good orthodox ministers of that state were sorely displeased with it; and some of them refused to read it before their congregations, probably because it enjoins upon the people practical, instead of theoretical godliness. Every lover of sound sense will admire the proclamation for its brevity and the spirit exhibited in it; and, in proportion to the approbation bestowed upon it, will be the compassion entertained for those who dislike it.—Ed.

"By advice of the council and in compliance with a venerated usage, I appoint THURSDAY, the 5th day of April next for Humiliation, Fasting, and Prayer.

"I recommend to each citizen to observe the day as a christian; if he be under the influence of any vice, to banish it; if in an error, to correct it; if under obligations to others, honestly to discharge them; if aware of animosities, to extinguish them; and if able to do any benevolent act to any being, created by the Almighty Power to which he owes his existence and his faculties, to do it.

"And with a conscience thus prepared, may we visit the temple of God, to worship him with that humble and happy disposition which always belongs to piety and innocence; beseeching him that the religion he sent by our Saviour may not be perverted through the pride and prejudices of sectarianism, but may universally receive the homage of a correct faith and good works.

"Especially, I recommend that, being members of one great community, we unite as christian politicians, so that we may render perpetual the peace and prosperity of our country and of this state.

ENOCH LINCOLN."

"THE LORD REIGNETH LET THE EARTH REJOICE."

I was walking the street, contemplating on the dismal description, which are so often given by our learned clergy, of the general ruin of the creation, by what they call the fall of Adam, when I was unexpectedly met by a youth of my acquaintance, who presented me with a countenance, on which I could see no trace of the horrid catastrophe above mentioned. With an interesting look, which indicated desire, he pointed me to his habitation, which was within a few rods, and politely invited me to step in. I readily complied; for I had before desired to call at his house, but had not until now ascertained where it was. In a word, this youth is one whom I recently waited on at the sacred altar of matrimony, and who had requested me to call at his house.

On entering the door we were met by the angel whose hand he received at the altar, who now conducted us to a parlour, where every thing which met the eye rose up in evidence against the gloomy doctrine on which I had been contemplating. I looked, with careful inspection at the young man, and in his countenance I could plainly discover the heavenly image of content and satisfaction. I as carefully turned my eye on the blooming companion of his peaceful bosom, who expressed in every comely feature the innocence and complete satisfaction which she enjoyed in her heart.

Being comfortably seated, I inquired respecting the very neat and commodious house in which he found it convenient to live; and was happy to learn, that by his industrious habits he had been able to purchase the lot and to build his house. It was finished, not in a gaudy or unnecessarily expensive style, but in the very best and most convenient, and of course, in that style with which prudence and good economy are the best satisfied.

The furniture of the house was in all respects like the house itself. All indicated the good taste of the young bride, and some articles bore ample testimony of her industry.

After enjoying such a scene, on leaving this garden of innocence and happiness, I involuntarily and most fervently said, "peace be unto this house." I then cast my eyes abroad on creation and felt a perfect satisfaction that a Being of infinite wisdom, power and goodness still holds the sceptre of universal government. My heart leaped for joy, and I hastened home to taste the ever welcome sweets of domestick enjoyment; but not without feeling a sensible pity for those gloomy souls, who think the creation of God was ruined by what they call the fall of Adam. ### ORTHODOXY IN DANGER.

We received three or four weeks since, from a correspondent in Troy, N. Y. the letter, an extract from which we present below, and the noted letter of the Rev. Dr. Beecher, of this city, which also appears. The name of the preacher alluded to by our correspondent is given in Dr. B.'s letter. Mr. Beman is the Presbyterian minister at Troy, and Mr. Finney, we believe was of Albany.*

* Mr. Finney is not of Albany as supposed by the editors of the Magazine, but from Jefferson county, N. Y. He is the same fanatick that stiled himself the

"Mr. — is now on trial for several misdemeanors by his whole church. There are several indictments brought against him,—such as beating his wife, disturbing the peace of families, &c. The meeting is held publick, in his church, and continued last night until quarter past twelve o'clock, and commenced again this morning at seven o'clock. It is supposed that Mr. — will be turned adrift—indeed the whole population of this city, except those belonging to his church are up in arms. One or two of his deacons, and a number of other respectable people have left the church, and all is in an uproar. This Mr. —, I am told, makes nothing of visiting families when the husbands are out, and telling the women and children that they will all go to "hell," unless they enlist under his banners—he also boasts, that he obtains none but those whom he sifts to the bone, marrow and all.

I have just heard that a letter is in town, from your Mr. Beecher, (some extracts of which were laid before the church to day,) in which he lashes — and —. He says they have caused, and are now causing, more disturbance than the King of Hell himself. He says, unless they mend their ways and move their steps to another tune,—there will be put in force a most thundering excommunication from him and his, against the whole posse comitatis. It therefore appears that Mr. Beecher does not approve of these doings, and although at such a distance, threatens to make them feel the length of his arm.

What name do you think these pious Presbyterians give the Universalist Church in this city? Why, no other than that of the most amiable and christian-like appellation—"The Hell Insurance Office." Weep and blush for poor human nature! I dare say, many there are, who would like to carry their risks to this office, if they could pay the premium—an honest conscience."

"Extract of a letter from Doctor Beecher to the Rev. Mr. Nettleton."

"BOSTON, JAN. 30, 1827.

"We are on the confines of universal misrule and moral desolation, and no time is to be lost in forestalling and holding publick sentiment correctly, before the mass shall be put in motion by fierce winds; before which nothing can stand, and behind which, when they have swept over the land, nothing will remain. The fear of opposing a work of God, if it prevails, will ruin us: for if it were in its commencement a work of God, and is now the occasion of some conversions, it is rapidly changing its character and will become soon, one of the most powerful and successful assaults which Satan ever made in the church, in so prosperous a condition as she now is. I do not believe that God will permit such a scourge to pass over us; but he will not work miracles to stop it; and if ministers and christians will not be warned by the past, nor use their own eyes and ears and hands; if all whom he has set to watch, sleep on their towers, and cry peace with their presumptuous hope, then I say it will come and come with a vengeance. You will perceive that I have made the same distinctions that you have between the immediate and remote effects of a revival; and it is desperation not to make them, or to fear to lift the voice and make a stand against present temporary good, which brings in its train certainly universal and permanent evil. It may benefit my fallow ground to burn it over in a dry time; but shall my neighbours, and the country around allow me to do it, when it is sure to involve a whole region in conflagration? God has given us reason to use, and he will not take care of the church in a way that shall supercede the use of it: let no man then be afraid to discountenance what he disapproves in a revival of religion when the general results are seen to be bad. Little temporary defects may be borne with for the greater good, but temporary good may not be purchased at the expense of universal and abiding evil. There is another danger; it is an infatuated confidence in the good sense of mankind, and the success of revivals to produce a remedy. But who ought to have more good sense to judge and act in this case than ministers and churches; and if these stand and look on silently, whose good sense will make a stand? You might as well trust to good sense to stop a hurricane, or to arrest a conflagration fanned by fierce winds in a great city. Let the spiritual pride and false zeal of man once gain the ascendancy, and they might as well have left reason to quell the French revolution, or drive Bonaparte out of Russia. There must be immediately an extensive correspondence and concert formed; ministers must come together and consult, and churches must be instructed and prepared to resist the beginnings of evil,—the mask must be torn off from Satan, coming among the sons of God and transforming himself into an angel of light. In the mean time no pains should be spared to save if possible brothers Finney and Beman, both on account of the great evil they will not fail to do on lawless converts and the great good they may do, if they can be kept within their orbit—should all these measures fail, then we must publish your letter to Aikin, and mine to Beman if it is thought best. We shall need both in New-England, as manifestos to stop the mouths of Socinians and others who would be glad to blast revivals by the evils arising from the West. Your letter to Aikin is highly approved here;—stand fast brother, and you shall have all New-England to back you in due time. If it become necessary, all our judicatures will speak out next spring, though I hope it will not be.

"Brigadier General of Jesus Christ." Sometimes he denominates himself "God's Hammer," &c. &c. He is famous for his impudence, and notorious for his impiety.—Ed. Gos. Adv.

*The same who once wrote a letter to get up a "revival," and blasphemously signed it JESUS CHRIST.

The revival here is still, to a miracle, but going on, I say to you not to be published.—In my society about 150 converts, and in the five orthodox churches together, about 400, and steadily increasing. I would try silent measures first, by correspondence and forming public opinion, and putting ministers and churches on their guard, publish only when it becomes manifest that there is no hope of reformation—not however delay publishing too long, because the letters should precede the storm.

REMARKS.—Is it not to be lamented, that men who are as well convinced as Dr. Beecher must be, that “revivals” are altogether the work of man, will endeavour to make the unsuspecting believe they are effected by the spirit of God? This correspondence and concert of ministers and churches to regulate “revivals,” and cause them to go rightly are a proof that these excitements are altogether the work of man, and that the ministers engaged in them know them to be such.

The injurious effects of these revivals, the orthodox themselves begin now to feel. The Dr. sounds the alarm. They must oppose this “work of God,” “which brings in its train certainly universal and permanent evil.” They have carried these things to the greatest length, breaking up the peace of families, and doing almost any thing else to promote their purposes. But now that a reaction has taken place, and they begin to feel the consequences of their conduct, they will oppose this false-styled work of God.

One thing more. Why is Dr. Beecher so zealous to get up revivals here? Does not the Spirit of God produce the same kind of revivals here that it does at Troy? If the revivals in the west produce permanent evil, why does the Dr., knowing this, wish to involve us in like evils?

NOTICE.—Those who desire to receive their volumes of the Gospel Advocate at the end of the year, are hereby informed that by sending us their names and the amount specified in our prospectus the numbers shall be preserved for them subject to their order; otherwise, as our back numbers are going off rapidly, they may not be accommodated. ### PRACTICAL.

EXPERIENCE.

In the following article the reader will find expressed the feelings and sentiments of one who has travelled through the labyrinth of error, and arrived at the rest that remaineth for the people of God. In the experience of our deist brother we discover many things which we ourselves have witnessed and felt. The disgusting errors which have been instilled into the mind by bigotted and superstitious instructors, too often drive the subject into infidelity and the soul to despair. Blessed be God—those errors, which in their nature and effect are so destructive of the native benevolence of the human breast are fast receding before the march of truth. Thousands are already set at liberty; and we pray God that the whole universe may speedily be emancipated from the bondage of anti-christian dogmas and antiquated theories of proud misnamed “systems of divinity.”

Although the introductory part of the following communication was not intended, by its respected author, for the public eye, yet the fact that it comes from a sister state, and from one who has rendered an essential service in extending the circulation of this paper, without being solicited or desiring any other compensation than the satisfaction of doing good, is a sufficient apology for its publication. It has brought to us the welcome intelligence—that the north is giving up, and “the south keeps not back,” and affords us encouragement to persevere in the good and glorious work to which our attention is devoted.

Dear brother in the Lord:—I greatly rejoice, and thank God, that we can yet communicate to each other, and through a safe medium receive a paper, which to me seems solely dedicated to the God of Sabaoth. I deserve no thanks nor encomiums from you for the little pains I have taken to circulate the Gospel Advocate in these parts. Please, brother, keep your thanks for those who are stimulated to act merely to enlarge your earthly interest and not bestow them on one who is a thousand times paid in the act, from a sense of duty thus disseminating the truth to a benighted world. It is a pleasing thing indeed, to be enabled to administer the living bread which came down from heaven, to a perishing world, who are striving to satisfy their hunger on the husks the swine do eat. O, could your unworthy brother who now addresses you, be instrumental, in any way, of aiding in the great work of breaking down those sectarian walls which serve to enslave in moral death nine-tenths of the human family, and substitute instead thereof, the year of jubilee—a year of release from sin and death, no task too arduous—no difficulties too great to encounter, and none but what would be richly repaid by the benediction of Heaven and a self-approbating consciousness of having promoted the same cause for which the blessed Nazarine agonized on Calvary.

It is customary amongst the orthodox of the day, before admitting a brother to the fellowship and communion of the church to have him relate his experience, either to the preacher or the church; so in like manner, as I am thronged with them on every side, you will pardon me for so far imitating their customs as to relate to you the past exercises of my mind. If you conceive it worthy of a place in the Advocate, you are at liberty to insert it. I do not, however, enter upon the following narrative with a view to gain admittance into any church, or to obtain the fellowship of any body of professors, but merely with the hope that my remarks may be profitable to some benighted traveller, who is wandering, as I have done, through the dark shades of modern orthodoxy.

I was early instructed in a calvinistick school. My parents were strict adherents to that doctrine. But at an early age my soul abhorred the doctrine of reprobation, as it appeared to me to be derogatory to the character of an all wise and merciful Creator;—and, that some better theory concerning the purposes of God in creating man, would in due time be made manifest I was convinced; but in what manner it would appear, I was not prepared to tell.—The prejudices of education caused me to respect calvinism as a scriptural doctrine; but my reason rejected it. That God foreknew all things from the beginning, was with me admissible; but that his premeditated and unprovoked designs were as cruel as they were represented by calvinism was not admissible.—Therefore reason and scripture were at variance with each other, and a disrespect for the latter was the consequence. My mind was thus left, to wander like a ship at sea without a rudder, liable to be driven on the first shoals that presented. The preaching of different sectarians induced me to believe that any thing and every thing could be proved by the scriptures. The decision of my mind then was, that the bible ought not to be trusted at all.— Here then at the early age of twenty I became a deist. Such was truly the effect that the popular preaching of the day had upon my young and uncultivated mind. In this situation I remained for several years, when at length sore disease fastened on my system, and the king of terrors seemed to have made fast his iron grasp. Pulmonick disease with all the train of symptoms was present, and even ulceration indicated a speedy termination of my mortal career. My physician, who is now alive to attest the truth of what I say, made known to me his opinion of my case, and which coming from a man famed for his skill in the art of healing, seemed to fix within me my fate as sure as though my death warrant had been signed, sealed, and delivered to the executioner.

It was there I bid adieu to all timely things; and turning my eyes upon my companion in life, and an infant in her arms, fancy would pursue them through the various vicissitudes and meanderings of this troublesome life, while I had taken my leave of all things that pertain to this life, in my imagination I could behold my eyes dim in their sockets, my fluttering tongue refuse to articulate, my body consigned to the silent tomb, to return to its mother earth. But is that all, said I. No. I have an immortal existence! What is to be my future destiny? cried I, in the anguish of my heart. To what region shall my immortal spirit be consigned in a few more rolling suns? It was then I began to tread over my back ground, taking every thing into consideration, as I marched step by step. The doctrines impressed upon my mind in infancy, still appeared as cruel and god-dishonouring as ever; the scriptures still presented to my mind nothing but contradiction and jargon! O thou God of nature! Where shall I fly for counsel, but to what I can behold of the works of thy hands, to learn of thee? The book of nature loudly speaks thy unchanging goodness to all thy created beings; nothing we mortals can do, can add to or diminish thy happiness; and nothing that we mortals can do causeth thee to step aside, that the blessings from heaven do not flow in common upon all thy created beings!! Surely, said I, man is his own torment, and the mercy of God are like the never failing fountain; if we depart from it we thirst, if we draw nigh we are filled. Then followed the awful, but conscientious conclusions, that the scriptures ought to be spurned from the world; and with the deepest sincerity of heart, I viewed them as derogatory to the character of Deity, and filling the world with confusion. And verily believing that a few more rolling suns would close my earthly existence, weak and emaciated as I was, I came to the following conclusion: namely, to collect together, some of the most palpable contradictions, enter my last and solemn protest against them, and have them read at my interment, as a funeral service! Deeply impressed with a sense of my duty, the bible, pen, ink and paper, were my companions for several days. But thanks be to God, who hath ordained this great light to shine into the dark and benighted hearts of the sons of men. As I began to compose scripture, my weapons fell down, and my warfare was ended. Well might the apostle say, these are able to make thee wise unto salvation; for when I made them the man of my counsel, unconnected with creeds and confessions of men, altho' at variance with them, yet the sound policy which I therein discovered, tore from my mind those fabricks of confusion and nonsense, which I had palmed upon the scriptures through the influence of false preaching; they tore from my mind the base idea of God the Father, the unchanging Jehovah, becoming so angry and displeased with his creature man, that he was determined to damn him eternally was it not for Christ the second person in the Godhead, (yet the self same God) who stands in man's behalf and strives to pacify (himself) the Father, by suffering in the sinner's stead, and thereby assuage his anger so that the contrite ones might approach him and find acceptance; and I substituted in its stead, that Christ was the beloved of the Father, the beginning of the creation of God, (Rev. iii. 14) and, that he descended to this lower world for the express purpose of manifesting to man the immutable love of the Father and thereby reclaim a back-slidden world. Secondly, by comparing scripture with scripture, it erased from my mind the idea of contradiction, where it is supposed by Moses' writing, that he, (Moses) talked with the immutable Jehovah face to face, as man talketh to his brother, notwithstanding it is afterwards said of God, "who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light, that no man hath seen him or can see him." (1 Tim. vi. 16.) I say, this apparent contradiction, was solved to my mind by their proving to me, that it was not the immutable God, to whom Moses spake face to face, as a man talketh to his brother, but was that being or God, to whom the immutable God spake in the beginning and said, let us make man. It was in my opinion the son of God, who was the beginning of the creation of the immutable Jehovah, and who became a God to us, in the same manner as Moses became a God to the children of Israel. This son was glorified with the father, before the world was; afterwards led the children of Israel through the wilderness; was the rock from which issued the waters in the parched land; was the cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night; talked with Moses, and gave him the law of commandment. But he was not the immutable God, for he often changed and repented of things which he had purposed doing, which corresponds exactly with his character and life whilst clothed with flesh and blood. He was a man of sorrow, and acquainted with grief, wept over Jerusalem, expressed the greatest anxiety to reform them, but they had power to resist him; he agonized in the garden of Gethsemane; was troubled in spirit; shrank from death, and did not know the hour of his dissolution. But to crown his travels with joy, it was necessary that the captain of our salvation should be made perfect through suffering, (Hebrews ii. 10—v. 8, 9.) Such is the character and standing of the god-man Christ Jesus; who was made like unto his brethren; and, as the scriptures declare of him, and in like manner I received him. Therefore, strictly speaking, no man hath seen God at any time; for to us there is but one God, of whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things and we by him. And it appeared to me as consistent, that there such a mediator, to reconcile man to God; such an avenue, through which the eternal love of the Father should flow into the hearts of degenerated man; such a light to the world, that he who walks therein, should not stumble and fall. I say it is just as consistent with sound philosophy, as it is that we should be blest with the light of the bright luminary which adorn the day; that being a secondary cause, or the means made use of by Deity, to diffuse light and heat to our terrestrial globe.

So, brethren, in like manner have all the objections to the scriptures, which I could possibly collect together, fallen prostrate before the ark of the testimony. The doctrine of election, that heart-cheering doctrine, shines brighter and brighter. When I take a view of the attributes of the great Jehovah, being strengthened by the evidence of his sacred word, which saith "whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his son," and that "known unto God are all his works from the foundation of the world;" but the doctrine of reprobation, that heart-chilling, god-dishonouring dogma appears as unscriptural, as it does unreasonable. The doctrine of man's agency and its bounds, seems to me to be perfectly solved by the vision of Ezekiel, in which he saw as it were the appearance, as if a wheel had been in the midst of a wheel, thus man's action, although voluntary, can not surpass the bounds marked out by Deity; being circumscribed by him who hath said to the great sea of human depravity, "thus far may thou go, and no farther," and there shall thy proud waves be stayed; for he delighteth not in the death of the sinner, but that they should turn and live. And we have every assurance to believe, that the infinite Jehovah will do all his pleasure.

In the above, you have the substance of my conversion to deism, and from deism to rejoice in the doctrine of reconciliation through the Redeemer, if the same does not correspond with those, who in their experience have been frightened by devils and liquid flames of fire, I cannot help it; those terrors have not been mine, since I have come to years of understanding; neither should I ever have embraced deism, had I not been driven into it, by the dark clouds of orthodoxy! And I pray God, that the day may soon arrive, when those dark clouds may all be dispersed, and the sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings; when, instead of nine-tenths of the human family being lost, the good shepherd shall have sought out and found, the best sheep that hath gone astray, laid it upon his shoulder, and gone on his way rejoicing. Dear reader, such contemplation constitute my happiness here below. Take away my assurance in the final restitution, my all is gone; but with it, my Zion is at hand, and my lips fail not to utter the sentiments of my heart in the following

LINES :

Praise ye the Lord, all kindred flesh,
Of high or low degree;
Ye animals, in open space,
And all things in the sea.

Praise him ye seraphs in the sky,
Ye men on earth revere;
The loving kindness of the Lord,
To all his works is near.

Praise him, who is unchangeable,
Who hath all might and power;
Who spake creation into birth,
Who is our God and Sire.

Praise him, who can do all his will,
In heaven, and earth, and sea;
Praise him, who wills that all his sons,
Should all salvation see.

Praise him, because we see his love,
Throughout the world displayed,
Praise him, because in heaven above,
Our better portion's laid.

Praise him, because within our power,
And joyous so to do;
Praise him, because, in praising him,
Our joyful moments grow.

Only one of these was in existence in 1809.—If such societies continue to augment in the same ratio they have a few years back, and are equally as successful in obtaining money, how long will it be before their revenues will bear a pretty handsome proportion to the whole revenue of the United States.

GOSPEL ADVOCATE

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."

HAVE YOU GOT RELIGION?

This popular and all important question, is asked so frequently at the present day, that professors ought to be ready at all times to give a reason of the hope that is in them, in meekness and fear.—But there is another question—what is religion?—We ought first to be able to answer the latter question, or we shall hardly know how to answer that which is at the head of this paragraph—What is religion? In days of yore, it was pure and undefiled religion to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep ourselves unspotted from the world. But at the present day—when the mind is so free from bigotry and superstition—at this enlightened period, these ideas are called dangerous—heresy, licentiousness, together with every other evil and false epithet, that malice can invent. At this day—the house of the fatherless and widow is visited to be sure—and for what purpose? Ask the missionary; he will tell you that the good of the never dying souls of the heathen, induces him to sponge (a harsh word, but it deserves no gentler term) the scanty pittance from the hard hand of poverty and distress. A case in point occurred at — during the last winter; it was told the writer of this article, by a person of unimpeachable veracity, and whatever may be said to the contrary, proof positive can be produced in support of the fact. A certain poor widowed female, who by patient and untiring industry had obtained a piece of cloth, with which she intended to clothe her children in a decent manner, to enable them to attend school. That day she was called on by a religious highwayman to contribute something to save immortal souls—she replied she was so poor, that it was with the utmost difficulty she could obtain bread for her children—that she wished well to the cause of missions, but had nothing to spare. All this went for nothing, the inhuman being cast his eye upon the cloth, and what with threats of endless damnation, &c. he took the cloth to his own house—and the result was the fatherless and the orphan lost the advantage of the winter's school!! This was visiting the fatherless and the widow with a witness! Is this religion? It is doubted. We doubt much whether it is an acceptable offering in the sight of him who is the widow's God—the Father of the fatherless—to wrest the hard earnings of days and nights of bitter toil and anguish—to take the bread from the mouth of children, and give it to a hireling priesthood to support them in indolence and extravagance. Could not the poor and needy more laudably and usefully bestow their money in training up their children in the way they should go, than in maintaining in luxury every idle shoemaker, who may find it more easy and profitable to spout nonsense and cobble souls once a week, than to cobble soles all the week round. This system of fraudulent villany and corruption—this filching money from the lone widow and helpless orphan, is in very truth the curse of our land.

But what is religion? Why in the days long since passed by, it was religion which thinketh no evil—meekness and kindness—liberality and gentleness—which judgeth not, condemneth not. But now in these halcyon days of joy and peace, fear and faith constitute the only pure, undefiled, genuine orthodox religion—all else is heresy. Fear of an angry God whose red arm of desolation hangs over the workmanship of his hands, and who waits but a fit opportunity to hurl them to damnation!—Fear of an endless hell that burns with sulphur and flame, indignation and despair—lighted up by the glaring eye balls of foul fiends; where smiling prattling babes, the mother's hope and the father's joy are to be crisped and roasted world without end! Faith in one infinite, eternal and unchangeable Devil, who with one foot like a man, the other like a beast—who though confined by massy chains to that place of interminable horror and desolation, yet is in Europe, Asia, Africa and America, at one and the same time, tempting poor souls to sin against God—and this is RELIGION! We were once taught by the blessed Saviour to believe in God and in Jesus Christ whom he had sent; but he never gave us the least intimation, that it was so very important, to believe in an Almighty Devil. He certainly never told men that they could not be saved if they did not thus believe; but at the present day his religion is so much improved, corrected and enlarged, that it is reckoned an unpardonable sin, to doubt the existence of the proud monarch of the universe. No wonder that some professors should be so tenacious of this holy faith, for it is by this craft they obtain their fat livings; the devil helps them to some fifteen or twenty hundred dollars a year, and they would most assuredly be reckoned very ungrateful to say the least, if they did not "give the devil his due."

But to speak candidly—what shall we think of that religion, which locks up all the tender charities of our nature, and makes our friendship towards our brethren cold and cheerless as the mid-winter's day-break? What shall we say to that miraculous conversion which asks, "John have you sanded the sugar—watered the spirit—then come to prayers?" We know not what to say to that religion, which prompts those who possess it, to speak ill of those around them—and to withhold the common civilities of life, from those who are supposed to be less holy than they? We know not what that religious state of mind is, which can at one moment slander and vilify those who pronounce Shibboleth differently from them, and then in a moment transfer their affections to "things above," and talk of foreknowledge, free grace and good works—from schemes of bargain, fraud and corruption to "eternal realities" and "dreadful consequences," "fire and brimstone!" What shall we say to that religion which compels the many to submit blindly to the dictates of the man who assumes the right of thinking for them: Men of honesty and conscience—and as conscientious too as the orthodox creed maker himself, are obliged to submit their reasons, feelings and conclusions, to the fancy of any and every enthusiast—to any and every preaching * * * *—who has got up a new light, or be branded with the name of infidel! But enough of such religion—enough of that religion which “separateth chief friends”—that induces the wife to abandon her once loved husband and family, and spout insanity at a conference or a whispering meeting. Enough of the faith that peoples bedlam with lunatics and darkens the page of history with suicide and despair—which holds perpetual warfare with all those moral duties of man—with justice, benevolence and humanity—and which subverts all the inborn feelings of the soul—and every thing honest and praiseworthy. True religion needs not the aid of fraud and artifice, to make it go smoothly down—it blushes not to walk forth openly in the face of day—and that system which requires any artificial means for its support, any twisting, turning, or prevarication, is very much to be suspected. We have abused and ridiculed the legends of the Catholic Church—but how much better or more to be desired are the legends and traditions and cant of sectarians at the present day!—What if Protestants imagine that it is superstition to respect the saints,—the fact is that Catholic Christianity is not “solely founded” in superstition!—The Catholics believe in more “mysteries” than the creed makers at the present day, that is the only essential difference; and if faith be the sole merit, then the Catholics have double merit—because they believe doubly! And all the cant about Catholic countries being “priest ridden” comes with an ill grace from a sectarian priest who in the ratio of respective countries and possibilities, has, and does exert all the power, that ever was exerted, by the priests of Rome. In both countries confessions are made; in one to the priest, in the other to their neighbours, at a conference! In both countries the chambers of death are beset with priests, in that dark and trying hour, when heart and flesh fail—when the soul seems to quiver upon the lip, they are questioned what is their particular creed; or articles of faith—in both countries, the pillow of the dying is the place to convert hereticks—in both the the weakened mind is often driven to despair—often to madness! Priests hang over the bed sides of the expiring sinner, with a fiery zeal, worthy a better cause; especially, if he is possessed of wealth. The colour and complexion of priestcraft is the same in all countries. The mussulman has his code of sectarian instructions for the couch of death, and it matters not, whether the would be apostles and evangelists of modern times, borrowed theirs from Catholics, or copied them from the Alcoran. But we forbear, and gladly turn from a subject, a cant, on which we have already wasted more words than it deserved. T. F.

OUR CAUSE IN THE WEST.

The writer of this article, having for the last few months, travelled in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky and Indiana, it will not, we hope, be uninteresting to our readers, to hear that the holy cause of God's impartial and universal grace, is going on prospering and to prosper, in almost every part of the western country. Long has this portion of the heritage of our God, been laid desolate, and the fruitful fields of Zion laid waste, by the hand of that spoiler—long has superstition, clad in her sable weeds of despair, trampled the fair blossoms of hope and joy beneath her feet—but the time of the avenger has come—light has dawned upon the moonless midnight of mind—and bigotry, bloated and pampered, already shrinks appalled before the brightness of its beams!—The mighty spell which has so long enthralled the world, is broken—the spirit of inquiry moves upon the dark waters—the God of nature speaks, and the sound thereof is heard along the shores, of our bright and sunny land!

I had prepared a brief, but minute account, of the progress of our holy religion, in all the various towns through which I passed; but owing to the press of matter now on file, we are under the necessity of making our remarks more general, than we could have wished. Most of our readers, have already been made acquainted with the cheering intelligence, of the abundant prosperity of our cause in Ohio; that the cords of Zion are lengthened and her stakes strengthened; that multitudes who have long ground in the dreary prison house of desolation have been visited with the day spring from on high—and we now have the unspeakable happiness of adding, that the other states of the west, are awakening from their deathlike slumber of delusion, and are flocking to the glorious standard of intellectual emancipation! The liberty of the mind will triumph; for men are taught

“To spurn controul

And fight the battles of the soul.”

Lovely indeed to the husbandman, is it to behold the barren heath converted into a fruitful field; and with what superiour joy does the lover of rational religion, see the wilderness of mind beginning to bud and to blossom with life and beauty—and barren hearts become a garden of delight, and bring forth fruits of righteousness and peace! Verily these are days of brightness and beauty, to the children of the Most High—perilous days of tribulation and despair, to the heartless grasp of tyranny and oppression.

From Chillicothe O. I proceeded on to Kentucky, preached in Maysville & Flemingsburg to crowded & attentive audiences. At Flemingsburg I met with some trifling opposition, from a number of Methodist preachers—had a public controversy, on the subject of the impartial and universal salvation of all men, some account of which, we may at some future period, lay before the readers of the Advocate. After leaving Flemingsburg, passed on to Fayette co. where our excellent friend Gen. Russel opened his house for preaching, which was filled to overflow.

ing. After spending some days very pleasantly with this excellent family, and with whom I parted with much regret, I pursued my journey to Lexington. Here I passed a week, in company with those whose light shines upon the house top.

In Lexington there are very many fearless spirits, who are not to be intimidated and put down, by the cry of heresy, and trampled under foot by a persecuting priesthood; but who shun not to declare that God is the rightful owner of all that does, or can exist. I had intended to have spoken at length of Lexington--its institutions; and more especially of the heartless opposition of orthodoxy, to President Holley, because of his honest independence of mind--also of the various curiosities in its vicinity; but for reasons before mentioned, must waive this subject for the present. One curiosity however we must mention--that is the "mouth piece" of orthodoxy in the West. Known by the name and title of "Western Luminary!" Such a luminary too--three lights like this would make a total darkness!

My next stopping place was Versailles--thence onward through Frankfort and Shelbyville to Louisville; and by their kindness and attention the people of those towns manifested their willingness to know the truth, as it is in Jesus. In each of the above named places, our preachers would receive a cordial welcome.

In Louisville it being thought "unbecoming, a moral and religious people," to allow the doctrine of God's goodness, to be preached in churches made with hands. I obtained the privilege of speaking in the Market Place--and although the weather was extremely unfavourable, yet an immense concourse of people gave their attendance. The refusal of my request for a church in which to preach, created no small degree of excitement, among the rational and reasonable--the consequence of which will probably be, that they will build a house without bolts and bars upon the doors--free as air or the goodness of God!

I should do injustice to my feelings, did I neglect to mention the liberality of Mr. D. M'Allister--a very respectable inhabitant of Louisville; who notwithstanding he differed with me in religious sentiments--yet with a spirit of benevolence and charity, that spoke the man and the christian, offered me the church, of which he is the owner, the moment he heard these circumstances, and that too, without solicitation! By their fruits ye shall know them.

In Louisville are many, very many, who have shaken off the trammels of popular prejudice, and glory in that truth, which makes men free--and hesitate not to believe the oath and promises of Jehovah, rather than the creeds and traditions of their forefathers. Notwithstanding many cry "the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are we; all else is dangerous heresy"--yet there are bold and fearless minds, free as the wild winds of heaven, who are not to be appalled, even at the hollow sound of EXCOMMUNICATION! Error and bigotry have here reached their zenith--the glorious lamp of truth, has relumed the darksome cells of woe and despair--it has shined and it will shine; not all the arts of men, or devices of the sons of men, can obscure its vivifying rays. T. F.

HOME---A FRAGMENT.

'Twas Sunday evening. The last rays of the setting sun had tinged the horizon with gold--the blue vault of heaven was cloudless, calm, and serene. Mingled sounds of the pearly rivulet, and the bird of song, came stealing upon the soul, sweet as the visions of youth--soft murmurs broke in upon the stilly silence, like music on the hour of repose. The lake unruffled by a single breeze, seemed to smile in its quiet rest, as if storm and tempest were a thing unknown--its boundless depths were glowing brightly as the polished mirror, with unnumbered trees and blossoms impressed upon its bosom. The gentle zephyr so lightly breathed upon the dewy bowers, that even the aspen leaf would have forgot its trembling. The glad earth, which I had seen but a few short months before clad in a wintry garment of fleecy snow--was now clad in cheerfulness and smiles, declaring that blight and frost had passed away.

Mingled recollections came crowded thick and fast upon the soul, when on turning an angle in the road, the village of B-- now my home, burst upon my view in all its peerless beauty--the much loved friends I had left but a few months ago, blooming with health and happiness--might now be slumbering in their narrow house in solitude and silence--and the bright blossoms of May might now be blooming over their resting place-- * * * * *

'Twas the hour of prayer. With countenances beaming with health and hope--with hearts beating high with gratitude to the author of all good--the children of the most high came up to the feast of the tabernacles. There before the altar--there in the Temple of the Eternal, was raised the anthem and the song to him who made the world--not to placate the wrath of Jehovah--not to appease his vengeance, did his children bow before him--but to thank him for that kindness and care which, knows no bound. At this hour so beautiful and bright--the type of that glorious world where tears and sighs are never known--when the soul is filled with joy and gladness--'tis there in that soft hour of peace, when communing with him who is invisible, that we have a foretaste of those unspeakable joys, that flow at God's right hand--'tis there we look forward to that bright period, when purged from every impurity and earthly frailty, we shall wing our way to a HOME of glory--where our praises will be without trembling, and our thanksgivings unmingled with tears. "EARNESTLY CONTEND FOR THE FAITH."

OUR CAUSE IN BUFFALO.

It may be gratifying to our distant friends to learn, that the "first Universalist Society" of this village, have succeeded in erecting and finishing a neat and commodious CHAPEL, to be used and exclusively appropriated to the worship of God. When compared with the splendid edifices erected by other denominations its appearance is humble; but it is occupied by those who are or should be humble followers of the meek and lowly Jesus. Suffice it to say, that the Universalist Chapel is neat, plain, and convenient; and may we not add, more splendid than the places of worship ordinarily occupied by our blessed Lord and his primitive followers? Thus, then, although four years ago it was with the utmost difficulty we could obtain any place to accommodate our religious assemblies; we are now permitted by our heavenly Father, to worship in our own way the God of our Fathers. We will only add, that the society and congregation are both respectable and laudably attentive to the great interests of Zion, and that the truth seems to have taken deep root in the hearts of many. L. S. E.

Through the blessing of an all-wise and kind Providence, the junior editor of this paper has at length returned from a tour through the states of Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana, which has occupied his time for more than four months, and is the messenger of "good tidings of great joy" from the several places through which he has passed. As time and space may permit, he will furnish the readers of the Advocate with sketches of the scenes he has witnessed as may be thought interesting and serviceable to our patrons and the publick. Truly it appears, that now, as in days preceding the spiritual coming of our divine Lord, many are running to, and fro, and knowledge is increased. The sketch presented this week under, the head of "Gospel Advocate," cannot fail to interest the reader; and may be considered as the commencement of a series, in which will be faithfully delineated more interesting and important facts.

A word relating to our home affairs, may not be altogether amiss. Four months and more have elapsed, since with trembling anxiety, we assumed the exclusive controul and management of this paper. It was then believed, that the condition of this section of God's heritage, required a more extensive circulation of some paper of this kind; but none beside ourselves appeared willing to stake their all, and risk the consequences. It was with deep solicitude that we requested our printer to furnish us with three thousand copies a week; but the event has already proved, that the bread which was cast upon the waters is sure to return—that after many days, we shall receive the only reward we desire, in addition to the approbation of our consciences, a subsistence for those depending upon us, and a remuneration for our expenses. We confidently assert, that the time has never been, when the prospects of our cause presented so cheering an appearance as they now do—there never has been a time, when the faithful labours of our ministering brethren were crowned with better success—the time has never been known, when in this region, and places far west, so much has been done in so short a time towards pulling down the "babel of modern orthodoxy" and building up the Zion of God, as within the last half year. However, vehemently our opponents may cry, that the cause we have espoused is "unpopular," stubborn facts prove that an overwhelming current of publick approbation is setting in its favour. Indeed, the fact that our opponents pretend, to their misguided followers, that we are "beneath their notice" is at least presumptive evidence that they themselves are already smitten with a consciousness of the weakness of their platform and the rottenness of their cause. It is a peculiar privilege they have (and which we desire not to take from them) to resort to popular prejudice to sustain themselves in the absence of reason and revelation to support their sinking cause; and we are quite willing to endure their reproaches for a while, if it affords them any satisfaction. But, for the comfort of all concerned be it spoken, "a door is open which no man can shut," and the enemies of our cause are contributing to no little extent, in building it up by using unfair means to pull it down.

The writer of this article, who for many weeks and months has toiled incessantly to disseminate truth and toiled almost alone expects to be absent a few weeks, on a tour to the east, to visit friends in the vicinity of that nucleus of orthodoxy, the "Auburn Theological Seminary;" during which time the home concerns of the Advocate will be attended to by our esteemed brother Fisk. In the mean time, information may be collected from abroad which will be communicated to our friendly readers; nor will a short absence prevent us from being "present in the spirit" with all who love the Lord Jesus Christ and delight to promote his glory in the earth. May Heaven grant, in answer to our prayers, that a suspension from the labours, anxieties, and trials necessarily devolving upon one acting in the capacity of editor of a work so extensively circulated, may tend to prepare us for future usefulness. It is stated of Sir Walter Raleigh that he entrusted Ben Johnson with the education of his eldest son. Johnson was a severe master and his pupil determined by means of his vices to free himself from his tyranny. Sir Walter had an utter abhorrence of drunkenness, a sin to which Johnson had no great aversion. One day, when he was intoxicated, young Raleigh sent him, in a large basket to his father, and the porters informed the knight that their young master had sent home his tutor! The following is an extract from Sir Walter's instructions to his son and posterity.—Raleigh Reg.

"Take special care that thou delight not in wine, for there never was any man that came to honor or preferment that loved it; for it transformeth man into a beast, decayeth health poisoneth the breath, destroyeth natural heat, deformeth the face, rotteth the teeth, and to conclude, maketh a man contemptible, soon old, and despised of all wise and worthy men hated in thy servants, in thyself and companions; for it is a bewitching and infectious vice. And, remember my words, that it were better for a man to be subject to any vice than to it; for all other vanities and sins are recovered, but a drunkard will never shake off the delight of beastliness; for the longer it possesseth a man, the more he shall be subject to it; for it dulleth the spirits, and destroyeth the body, as ivy doth the old tree, or as the worm that engendereth in the kernel of the nut."

SUMMARY.

Important foreign Intelligence.—By recent arrivals at New-York news is received from England to the 17th of April, announcing a change of the British ministry. Mr. Canning has been appointed Premier, in consequence of which, the following seven members of the cabinet have resigned: the Lord Chancellor Eldon, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Sidmouth, Lord Bathurst, Lord Westmoreland, Lord Bexley, Mr. Peel. Lord Lowther, son of Lord Londale, also resigned as one of the Lords of the Treasury.

Breach of promise.—Mary Morse brought an action, in the Baltimore county Court, against Henry Tomlinson, for a breach of promise of marriage. The issue was tried the forepart of this week, and the case was fully sustained by the proof—the defendant, after having visited plaintiff several years, gave a written promise to marry her in 50 days, and afterwards married another lady. Many circumstances of great aggravation were proved on the trial. The jury, without leaving the box, found a verdict for the whole amount of damages laid in the declaration—three thousand dollars.

Mr. G. Weed, merchant, of Buffalo, imports his supplies of cutlery direct from Europe.—Such, we believe, is the case with several houses at Utica and Rochester.

The completion of the Broadway Bridge over the Genesee river at Rochester was recently celebrated at that place. The bridge is 600 feet in length, stretching from Court to Exchange-street, and is the third bridge, besides the Aqueduct, which the enterprising citizens of Rochester have thrown across the Genesee within the space of half a mile.

It is said the contract creditors of the late Duke of York, will not realise a shilling in the pound.

O come, my own sweet lyre, once more,
This darkened soul soothe yet again;
One strain of pensive music pour,
One last, sad strain.

O sing the joys that once I knew,
Sing friendship's bright delusive dream,
And young hope's rising dawn, that threw
A faithless gleam,

I thought the fates had nought but bliss
In store for me, and wonder'd why
I saw, in such a world as this,
A tearful eye.

But soon the fairy dream was past,
Which my young heart so warmly cherish'd;
And hope, too bright, too fond to last,
Soon perish'd.

As some lone mariner afar,
While dark'ning tempests cloud the skies,
Longs to behold his fav'rite star
Kindly arise;

So would I greet thee, gentle Peace!
Thou stranger to this woe worn breast;
From pain and sorrowing find release,
And calmly rest.

Ye who have felt this world a wild,
And walk'd 'mid desolation drear,
I ken, for misery's lowly child,
Ye'll shed a tear.

2 Cor. iv. 18—The things that are seen are temporal—but the things that are not seen are eternal.

We who are but travellers and sojourners here below, encompassed about as we are with infirmities and afflictions, daily feel the truth of the saying, "that man was made to mourn." We have demonstration to prove that man is born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward. But though we are at present obliged to pass through many fiery trials, and grievous dispensations, yet we are to count it all joy;—knowing that tribulation worketh patience, experience, and hope. Who would not submit patiently and without repining, to what are called the ills of life, if they believed that it was but a preparatory means, by which they would experience more abundant good. This may seem a paradox, at the first view, that all our afflictions will in the end prove abundant blessings to us; but so it is. And how great are our obligations to love and obey Him who is so kind and so good to us.

It will perhaps be necessary to inquire, what is meant by the things that are seen, are temporal, &c. The things upon which we cast our eyes, are temporal, in their nature. The words temporal and eternal are adjectives, and are used to signify the quality or nature of things to which they are applied.

Look abroad upon the universe of the great I AM, and what do you see? Here a proud monument of feudal grandeur—there the sad remains of the pride, pomp, and circumstance of some warlike chief. Here a proud city with her lofty spires towering amid the heavens—but alas! a few short days, or years perhaps, and the places that now know them, will know them no more forever! The page of the historian, will be all that will be left, to tell the world, that such and such places, were once a name and a praise in all the earth. Look back to the history of by gone days—tell me where are the riches, of the haughty monarchs of the East—where now their honours and pleasures? they were temporal, and have passed away.—Ask the man skilled in legendary lore, where now are the cloud capt towers, and gorgeous palaces, of Babylon and Nineveh—those great cities of whom we have heard and read so much?—Where now the soul rousing shout of her warriors, and the shrill clarion of her victories—Where now her massy gates, impenetrable walls and strong towers—they have passed away like the visions of a night, and are remembered only by name! Her proud bulwarks were temporal and have crumbled into dust, from whence they rose! In those lofty halls, once lighted by the sunny eyes of her fairest and loveliest—where the maiden trilled her harp, to notes of joy and gladness, is now heard the shriek of the cormorant, and the gambols of the Satyr.

Ask the shades of Pompey and Cæsar, if the queen of the world, still shines in the meridian glory of an unclouded noon—they would sighing, say, the mouldering grasp of time has been laid heavily on the city of the hills—her glory and magnificence is now shrouded in the mist of oblivion.

Athens too—the seat of law and of learning would tell you, that the glory of man is but grass, and as a flower of the field. The mouldering shrines of Palmyra o'erspread the Syrian waste, tell us that time smiles on ruin and desolation—that at his harpy touch, the art of man sinks into the mute regions of forgetfulness—that genius, wealth, nor valour, can mock his sullen power—that in a few short days, the pomp and glory, of the things that are seen, will be clothed with the mantle of oblivion.—This would Venice tell you, once earth's, oceans scepter'd queen; the remains of her marble palaces and sea-girt walls, speak a language too plain to be misunderstood, that the things that are seen, are temporal.—The fishers as they dry their nets, upon the ruins of Tyre and Sidon, cities once glorious and great, would tell you that gilded halls, and oriental splendour, was no barrier to the inroads of the ruthless destroyer. They would tell you that this was not our continuing city, but that we looked for one to come, whose builder and maker, is God.

Look again, and what do you see—misery, ruin and despair—sickness, horror and distraction. Truth, honour and integrity all recklessly sacrificed—sacrificed too, without shame and without remorse. "Repentance with many, being a repentance, only over ill laid schemes of villany, blasted in the bud of iniquity."—Ah, why do men barter peace, for riches and greatness? "Though the eagle builds her eyrie upon the loftiest rocks, and looks proudly in the face of the sun, yet no note of joy, ever issued from its beak—the modest linnet perches in the lowly vale, and her song tells you she is happy !” What is earthly glory when possessed—a bubble—an airy phantom—a meteor that scintillates but for a moment, and is lost forever !

Go to the bedside of the pale emaciated victim of disease and death, whom but a few short months before, you saw glowing with health and hope—there read how transitory are the promises of earth, how futile the expectations of man ! Press the cold clammy hand of the dying—the painful shudder it causes—the chill which seems to curdle the warm blood in your own veins, will tell of temporal things that must pass away. Look around you—look at the pale, haggard countenance of dissipation and vice—see her palsied hands trembling like leaves in autumn shaken by an untimely blast—her touch a pestilence—her breath a poison. Ask her if she bears not a heavy burden—if her way is not hedged up and full of thorns—if she has not ever found gall, wormwood, consuming fire and heartburn in every draught of guilty pleasure ? if she has not ever found that to prosper in that which was wrong, proved her inevitable destruction ! But says one we have been often told from the sacred desk that there was pleasure in sin—how say you that vice is our destruction ? Yes, my loved friends, there is pleasure in the halting places of iniquity—such a pleasure as one would feel, who at night should make his bed amid flowers and perfume, and on awaking, should find himself reposing upon the burning sands of the desert, and the simoom’s blast sweeping over him. Such pleasure as the traveller would feel, who treads upon the flowery turf, beneath which a volcano slumbers. There is a joy in the bowers of vice—such a joy as you would experience, when grasping the lily from its watery bed, you found the fangs of the Scorpion fastened upon your bosom—such a joy as you would feel in the last struggle of expiring nature—such a joy as that liquor would create in which had been steeped the arrows of death ! Strange that Zion’s watchmen should preach pleasantness and peace to the transgressor, while he continues in sin, and then call us harsh names, and say we preach a dangerous doctrine when we tell men there is no peace to the wicked. Strange that men should preach that which every moment of their lives proves to be a mistake. To you, whether young or old, this solemn truth is advanced, that to be happy we must be virtuous ?

What else do we see that is temporal—we see the mouth of many very many filled with curses and imprecations—blackness, darkness and blasphemy. Where did men learn to blaspheme and take the name of God in vain ? we once told you that the priests cursed and damned mens souls to hell and the people went away and practised their language ! But blessed be God, the time will come when men shall be ashamed of this language—when they shall bow the knee and shall swear and confess that Jesus is Lord to the glory of God the Father—and swear that they have righteousness and strength in the Lord.

What else do we see—we have seen the steel of the assassin red with blood and dripping with gore—houses in flames—all around horror and despair—we have seen the angel of desolation stalk abroad in triumph—we have heard the groans of the dying, the cry of the vanquished—we have seen disorder, madness and confusion. And my brethren, what a glorious consolation it is to us to know, that the period will come, when all these things shall have passed away. In the new heavens and the new earth, we shall no longer see through a glass darkly, but shall see as we are seen and know as we are known—we shall see eye to eye, those things that are Eternal.

We here are frequently, pained with the sight of poverty, sickness and distress ; moanings and lamentations, frequently salute our ears with an unwelcome sound. We see pale, gaunt famine, staring men in the face, and the demon of desolation, marking them for his prey. But the reign of the destroyer is temporal—the time will come, when the starving prodigals, who have long fed upon husks with the swine, shall be brought home to their Father’s house, where are many mansions—where is bread enough and to spare. None need be turned away to make room—there is no want of provision, for the feast is made for all people ! Eternal wisdom hath prepared it, she hath mingled her wine—her fatlings are killed—and all things are now ready—the white robe is prepared washed in the blood of the Lamb. Then will all who have long lived upon east wind, and have spent their money for that which is not bread, shall buy wine and milk without money, and without price. Then those who were once afar off, will be brought nigh by the blood of Christ, purely purged from all their filth and uncleanness, and shall sit down in those glorious mansions eternal in the heavens.

We see trouble and affliction, care, sorrow, and woe—these things, are temporal, and will pass away when the fulness of time shall have come, and shall be no more known—sorrow and sighing must flee away, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it ! Though dark and cheerless may be our lot at present, yet God is Light, and in him is no darkness at all. Though our path may be beset with briars and thorns, yet there is a way of holiness where thorns shall cease to wound—a strait, glorious highway, where the wayfaring man though a fool cannot err. Sickness we see around us, and on every side—few, very few, escape its fearful grasp. Here one is burning with a raging fever—there the cold chills of the ague, freeze almost the very soul ! On the right, pale insidious consumption, is about to wither our hopes, and blast our fond expectations, by smiting the young and lovely. With her quiver filled with the poisoned arrows of death, with her bow drawn, she seeks her victim with insatiable eagerness; the arrow once sped never misses---though the poison is slow, her work is done!

On our left hand, we see one of our fellow beings, racked with excruciating pain---here suicide shortens the days of one---there disease carries another "to that bourne whence no traveller returns."

But in the unseen world, there no agues freeze, or fevers parch---there is no agonizing pang of horror and despair---no consumption to wither the fair buds of happiness and joy, for there the inhabitant shall not say, 'I am sick'---there disease will not exist even in name! There the great physician of souls will have cured every malady---he will then have borne away all our sickness and diseases and we shall be healed. The same hand that wounds can heal; he knows what remedy is necessary to purge away our filth and pollution, and he has an efficacious one for every sort and kind---though it may be a severe one, and cause grief and extreme sorrow, yet it will effect a cure.

Look again and what do we see---slander, backbiting, evil speaking, quarrelling, fighting, reviling, persecution, hatred, wrath, malice and revenge---these things are from beneath---are "earthly, sensual, devilish" and must come to an end---they are temporal and will cease; for "not one jot or tittle of the law will fail till all be fulfilled." The law saith "thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself;" when this glorious period shall have arrived, we shall hear no more curses heaped upon our 'poor wicked neighbour'; we shall see no more hatred, malice, or evil speaking, for then all enmity and strife, will have become extinct. Then the father will no longer lift up his hand against the son---nor the son rebel against the father; the brother will no more betray the brother to death, for then all will be peace, harmony and praise. Then all will be joy, love and good will, because the love of God will be shed abroad in every heart, and all will rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory.

What else do we see---nation rising against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; earthquakes, famine, and pestilence---carnage, bloodshed and desolation! cities in flames, and blood flowing like a river. But blessed be God, these things are temporal; for the time will come when nation shall no more rise against nation, but shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks, and shall learn war no more. Then will the lion lay down with the lamb, and the leopard, the fawning, and the kid, shall make their bed together.

Look again, see yon heavens overcast with thick clouds of darkness and gloom---hear the coming of the gale from afar, like the sound of many waters---hear the mustering winds deeply echoing from the far off mountains---the sea reels to and fro, like a drunken man! The proud oak, that has for ages stood a proud memorial, and reared its venerable boughs amid ruin and desolation, now bends, totters and falls beneath the freezing fury of the elements---Saw you the lightnings glare? the castle's dome is shivered and wrapt in flames! Heard you that shriek? 'Twas the cry of death---the bolt has fallen upon the strong battlements its pride is levelled with the dust, and its inmates are numbered with the sleeping! The leafy bowers are stripped of their foliage, and the warbling songster is trembling in the agonies of death---the bright hopes of the husbandman are crushed like a moth, and levelled with the ground!

But when these things shall have passed away, we according to his promise, look for new heavens, where the thunder never rolls---a new earth, where the rumbling of the earthquake is never known! Where, storms and tempests will cease their raging, and the sun of Righteousness will shine in the firmament of God's grace, in all the cloudless effulgence of a summer's sky. No chilling frost---no summers heat, or winters cold---no lightnings flash---no stormy skies, no night there---for there is no darkness in the holy pavilion of the Most High! There the Lamb of God, will lift up on all, the light of his countenance, with healing in its beams; then the darkness will be past, and the true light will shine, and those who have long sat in the dark prison house of death and despair, will be delivered into the glorious light and liberty of the children of God.

What else have we seen? We have seen the withered leaves of autumn, scattered by the wild winds of heaven; and the woods that but a few days before were covered with verdure, solitary and bare. But the Spring season has returned, and the earth is now robed in a mantle of green, that but a few short days ago, was bleak and barren. Yes, the season of flowers and perfume has arrived, and all is blooming with life and beauty---but do we reflect that the tall summer grass may wave over our resting place---that the pale flowers of autumn, may decorate the hillock beneath which repose our ashes!!

If we look back to the last season of joy and rejoicing, when all around was smiles and fragrance, we shall find many of the long known and well loved, who often met with us at the banquet and before the altar---at the social board, and in the temple of the Eternal, whose hands were then locked in ours, who are now numbered with the congregation of the sleeping. Many a fond and tender heart, which beat in unison with our own, is palsied by the frosty touch of the last enemy, and the ardour of their generous friendship lies quenched and buried in the dust. The busy tongue whose tones were music in our ears, is numbered with the silent! Friends have resigned those who were dear to them, and foes have buried their hatred, beneath the sod of the valley. Though their lives might have been of the utmost importance to their families, or to society, death regards not this—equally indifferent, cuts down alike the fairest flower, and the noxious weed.

OUR CAUSE IN THE WEST.

I left Louisville in the beautiful steam boat Geo. Washington, bound for New Orleans: passengers pleasant and agreeable—among whom was the Hon. Mr. Brent, from Louisiana, whose kindness to me will not soon be forgotten. After a delightful passage of two days I arrived at New Harmony, beautifully situated upon the Wabash. It is composed principally of brick buildings, consisting of manufactories of cotton, wool, breweries, &c. with large granaries, and other public buildings; and is laid out in regular squares. Of this place and its prospects, we shall speak at length when more convenient; suffice it therefore for the present to say, that many of the reports now in circulation respecting this place, are false as perjury!

Mr. Owen with that urbanity and generosity, for which he is so justly esteemed and celebrated, spared no pains to make my stay agreeable. During my short stay I attended, a weekly concert, which for harmony and sweetness, would not suffer by a comparison with those of our populous cities. Also, a military muster—and a public lecture by Mr. Owen. On Sunday attended service in the large hall, (otherwise called the temple of science;) and the candid and serious attention manifested by the numerous assemblage who were present, spoke volumes in contradiction to the foul calumnies that interested, priest-ridden libellers have uttered, respecting the manners and customs of the people belonging to this community. The motto of some of our hireling presses seems to be, "down with the system, right or wrong." Though we do not by any means go the whole length with Mr. Owen, yet we are fond of candour and impartiality—we are fond of "mental independence"—and the cowardly scribbler who calls harsh names, and heaps opprobrious epithets upon a man of whose character and designs he knows nothing, is justly deserving of censure. Our motto is "let Mr. Owen be judged by his acts." In this land of freedom, it would seem strange that any man or class of men, deserve to be slandered and vilified because of their honest opinions. Come now ye orthodox diviners—tell us—does Mr. Owen return railing for railing? Does the Gazette published at that place, ever come from the press stained with scandal and blotted with imprecations? We pause for a reply.

Ohio river. Here are many warm friends of that sober and rational religion, which knows no "mystery"—and friends too, who are not intimidated by that demon unpopularity which frightens so many women in men's apparel. Among our brethren in this place, as in almost every other which I have visited, we number the most respectable men in the country—who have put their hands to the plough with right good will. Here I preached to large and attentive congregations. After the evening service on one occasion "Dr."—rose in opposition to the doctrine that teaches us to deny all ungodliness, and to live soberly, righteously and godly—after speaking as long as he chose, he was asked some questions, to which he declined giving any answer—"he would not answer them, neither would he stay there any longer." As he was leaving, Judge—observed to him very mildly, that "he had barked up the wrong tree!"

Leaving Mount Vernon, I again returned to Louisville; and on the Sunday following, preached two discourses in the Circus to overflowing congregations. Meeting with some little opposition, I was induced to stay until Wednesday evening—when the great and all-important question "Will all mankind be saved," was publicly discussed. "Rev. Dr." Blackburn; and the "Rev." Geo. C. Light, were strongly called upon, both by me and others, to come out and oppose this "dangerous," "licentious," "damnable heresy"—they were called upon by their love of virtue—as a duty they owed to themselves, their congregations and their God, to come out like true and faithful shepherds and destroy this "wolf in sheep's clothing"—to associate themselves with my opponent, or come in any way—and what do you think, christian—they saw the wolf coming and fled! (By the way "Rev." gentleman we shall God willing come to see you again—"one of these days.")

After leaving Louisville which place I left with unfeigned regret, I crossed the river to New Albany—a flourishing town in Indiana—where are many, very many, who are bending their way to Zion, having their faces thitherward. Our friends in this place, are neither afraid, or ashamed, to vindicate the doctrines taught by the mouth of all God's holy prophets, though men call them accused! In Jeffersonville a delightfully situated village on the Ohio, our meetings were fully attended; and among the most intelligent and respectable inhabitants, we number those who believe that God is the friend, and not the enemy, of the work of hands.

In Charlestown, Madison, Vevay and Rising Sun, large and flourishing towns in Indiana, the people are extremely anxious to have preachers of "this great Salvation," come among them. In each of the above mentioned places, a large number of respectable names were added to our list of subscribers.—Throughout Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, the number of believers are increasing beyond all comprehension! And when we look back to the dark and perilous days of tears and blood, when the seed was sown in clouds and tempest—to only a few years ago, when our Father in Israel* was standing alone amid the whirlwind and the storm of bitter persecution, and compare those days of gloom with the present sunny days of peace and joy, when thousands are flocking to the light—we are led to exclaim “It is the Lord’s doing and marvellous in our eyes.”

Now in almost every corner of our unfettered land we hear the joyous cry of freedom—the sound has gone into all the earth—it echoes from our hills and mountains—songs of joy and gladness resound in our vallies—the days of sorrow and mourning have fled away, we hope never more to return. We sowed in tears, but the unclouded sun of a beneficent Providence is ripening a golden harvest of abundant joy. The God of nature has lifted upon us the light of his countenance, and in our peaceful and quiet homes is heard the voice of health, plenteousness and hope. But do we amidst our joy and rejoicing remember that the High and Holy One rode upon the whirlwind and the storm of that dark period? Do we feel our bosoms beating high with love and gratitude to the Great I AM because he has first loved us, and hath done such great things for us? Brethren, if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think of these things.

THE DREAM—A FRAGMENT.

It was a night of deep and sullen gloom—The sun had gone down in clouds, which were rolled together in sublime and awful grandeur, through which the red lightning gleamed almost every instant. The gathering winds swept by in fitful gusts which bowed the loftiest trees—the howling of the tempest mingled with the dismal moanings of the night bird—all conspired to bring many a frightful nursery tale, back to the recollection. I urged my horse to greater speed and was soon in a place of shelter. * * * * *

The storm had passed by, and the queen of night shone out from behind the watery clouds & shed upon the dripping herbage her silvery light. Seating myself in the portico, methought I heard the wailing of bitter anguish--I listened--a piercing shriek came borne on the night breeze, apparently from a house at no great distance--I needed not the second appeal but rushed forward, and without ceremony burst open the door--when such a sight--oh my God! the warm blood curdles in my veins at the bare recollection. There upon a bed in the farther corner of the room, lay a tender and delicate female who was rending the air with shrieks, groans and lamentations--on each side were two others who were exerting all their powers to sooth her wounded spirit.

At my entrance she sprang on her feet, her hands clenched in bitter agony---her eye rolling in the lurid wildness of despair, and with a voice of chilling horror she shouted “Glory to God! there---there---is my father---see the foul fiends heap high the fagot and the flame, now he groans---yes---yes---I rejoice---I am happy---yes this is heaven---that is hell---see the sulphur and the flame winding round my once loved Henry---this is all for me---how blest is the sight---these are the joys of that world whose temple is God---there, shout---glory---O my God this is bliss!” raising her clenched hands to heaven she burst into the hollow laugh of the maniac, and fell senseless upon the floor.

In speechless horror I assisted her worse than childless mother to raise her, while the attendant ran to call the physician: he soon came and restored to life this pale & melancholy victim of insanity; she soon sunk into a kind of stupor, when I drew the good man aside and from him learned the following:

Ellen R. was the only child of her happy parents, who were classed among the most respectable inhabitants of the village. Perhaps no one ever saw a brighter dawn than Ellen R. Surrounded by all the dear delights of this lower world, all above was sunshine, all beneath was flowers. She grew up her father’s pride, her mother’s joy; and so passing beautiful withal, that her loveliness was seen at the first glance, and felt at the next heart throb--seen, felt, never to be forgotten! Seventeen summers had thus glided smoothly on when the bright hopes of happiness that gilded her youthful horizon, faded in an instant--and the flowers that were strewed along life’s path, were crushed, blighted, withered! Her betrothed was laid low by the frosty hand of the destroyer and the damp clods of the valley covered him. He was a believer in the impartial goodness of the Most High, and died rejoicing in the hope of a glorious immortality

On the day of burial the being who officiated as clergyman, thinking it a fit opportunity to pour---not the oil and wine of consolation---but fire and brimstone into the wounds of affliction and distress--chose the words “thou fool this night thy soul shall be required of thee,” as the foundation of his discourse. He took occasion to denounce the most grievous and horrid judgements upon all who believed the doctrine of God’s impartial grace--“that the young man was no doubt in hell with the damned, and they would rejoice if they ever went to glory to see him weltering in flames of horror and despair.” His breath seemed a Sirocco, poisoning the very atmosphere with death and desolation! Its baleful influence more dangerous than the Bohun Upas withered the fair buds of hope, made of comforts and consolations all a desolation, and filled the bosom of the lone widow now a childless mother with pangs of grief and unutterable woe--- * *

But her the fairest and loveliest of the workmanship of the Almighty---speak she did not---nor weep---that was all past. The barbed shaft had pierced her bosom of tenderness and sensibility---still she murmured not---she followed the sable hearse as it slowly bore the manly form of the one she loved, to his cold couch of dreamless slumber. When the heavy clods tumbled upon his coffin---then it was that her eye rolled wildly--then it was that her countenance which so lately beamed with all the summer glow of peace and joy---became pale as marble. Her eye soon ceased its rolling, became glassy, motionless and unmeaning, and she sunk into the arms of her now comfortless parents, and was borne from the place--- * * * * *

"O," said the good man, "when I view the wreck of all that was once so lovely---when I see her struggling with unutterable pangs---with thorns of indescribable anguish rankling at her heart, I could call fire from heaven upon the head of him---the heartless monster---the fiend in human shape---who has thus strewed blight and mildew upon the fairest flower that ever bloomed in the bowers of joy---I could"-----

Here I was startled from my slumber, and awoke saddened with the reflection, that my vision was "AN AWFUL REALITY."

"EARNESTLY CONTEND FOR THE FAITH."

BLACK LIST NO. 1.

It is always a matter of grief, rather than joy to us, to be obliged to notice the dereliction of our fellow beings, from the path of honesty and integrity; more especially if it should happen, as is alas! but too frequently the case, that they are the professed disciples, of the meek and lowly Jesus. Situated as we are, we have ever felt it our bounden duty, whenever we have seen falsehood personified, whether it wore the guise of a beggar, or "for a mantle broad and large had wrapt it in religion;" whether clad in lawn or crape, to "unmask the hypocrite," and expose it in all its naked deformity, to the keen scrutiny of public opinion. We are frequently accused of too great plainness of speech; but our course cannot, WILL NOT, SHALL NOT, be a cowardly one. No. We are freeborn; the right of thinking for ourselves was purchased by our fathers' blood; and shall we, when we hear our friends---friends too who have borne the burden and heat of the day, unshrinking; shall we hear them vilified and abused, by those who have made "lies their refuge," and shall we be told to "sit still," and tamely submit to the most abominable calumnies?---to the malicious slanders of hypocrisy personified? Shall we tremble and quake at the outpourings of the vials of damnation upon our heads by those who lord it over God's heritage? When such men as Hosea Ballou are denounced and most foully calumniated, shall we cower under the maledictions of the enemies of intellectual emancipation? No, we say once for all, No! We should deserve to be that thing, our enemies would have us to be, should we pursue such a "high minded" and independent course. It is always an unwelcome task to meet and repel aggression; but one of two things we must submit to, either be trodden under foot by the heartless beings who assume the garb of sanctity, and bear all their vile epithets, obloquy, and scandal, or come out in defence of our rights. We choose the latter alternative; and shall continue to pursue a fearless course, unawed by frowns, anathemas, or denunciations. We have done with milk and water, and "soft soap"---plain truth, the public desire to hear, and plain truth they SHALL HEAR.

We were led to make these remarks from having on hand a list, of so dark a hue, that we could fix upon no name more appropriate than the one which stands at the head of this paragraph. Against No. 1. we have the name of

ELDER BIGELOW, OF CHILLICOTHE, OHIO;

A presiding Elder in the Methodist connexion, to whom we address the following note:

Buffalo, N. Y. May 26, 1827.

SIR---Having been informed that you have stated in conversation, with another person, that Mr. Ballou, of Boston, one of the Fathers, in the universalist connexion, was addicted to habits of intemperance, and  "THAT YOU COULD PROVE IT," and feeling some degree of interest in the case; this is to request you to forward us the FACTS in the case as soon as possible! We living in this bye place, are so little acquainted with the character and reputation of Mr. Ballou, that you would confer an unspeakable obligation upon the writer of this article to forward the necessary PROOF as soon as may be!

I have the honour to be yours, &c.

We have so long been accustomed to experience little else than contumely, misrepresentation, and every witless ridicule from the opposers of God's impartial grace and goodness---and have had such repeated instances of their extreme ignorance respecting the doctrine we profess, that we are not at all surprised at this pitiful attempt to dishonour the glorious cause of God and man. We have often been grieved to the heart when we have witnessed such hostility manifested towards that doctrine which the Saviour sealed with his blood. Indeed we must say that we consider the constant acrimony and traduction indulged in by those who limit God's grace, to be as opposite to the interests as it is derogatory to the candour and impartiality of christianity. It is operating to widen the breach between children of the same common family, who if left to follow the impulse of nature and the dictates of christianity would naturally coalesce; and among the sad changes of this transitory world, would be mutual supporters and comforters of each other.

But instead of this, the most unhappy collisions are indulged in; bitter invectives and harsh epi-ethets have long laid waste the heritage of the Almighty, and the bright blossoms of love, peace, and joy, lie blasted and withered by the hand of violence. Discord, animosity and revenge, have been allowed to roam abroad despoiling the fairest fruits of meekness and tenderness---with their hands dripping with blood, they have scattered "fire brands, arrows, and death," until the christian church has exhibited to the world a scene of wide spread desolation, madness and confusion!

Brethren, why are these things so? Why do we condemn our brother, or set at naught our brother, merely because he may not pronounce Shibboleth, just as we do, or as we think it should be pronounced? There are twelve gates to the New Jerusalem; therefore, why do we bite and devour others, because they may happen to choose a different road to glory from that in which we ourselves are walking? Why indulge in such acrimonious, inglorious, and unworthy denunciations? Why make use of slander and misrepresentation? Do you not know that the sentiment which is obliged to resort to this method to support itself is very much to be suspected? That falsehood is, at best, but a miserable foundation upon which to rest our hopes?

We know not what our honest and candid Methodist brethren can think of the course which has been pursued by Elder Bigelow to check our rising cause in Chillicothe---we feel persuaded that they will openly deprecate the unchristian like means that he has resorted to in these (to him) perilous times to destroy the dangerous heresies that are so fast multiplying around him; he might with as much propriety command the whirlwind to pause in its mighty rush of desolation, as attempt to bind the unfettered minds of the West in the chains of popular prejudice. We had heard that the Elder preaches much about "total depravity," but we are loth to believe that he preaches EXPERIMENTALLY!!

Our colums are open to Mr. Bigelow, he can at any time acknowledge his fault or forward the name of his informant. We shall forward him this by the next mail. T. F.

There are others that shortly will come in for a share of the favours which we have to dispense; so that No. 1. may be considered as only the beginning of sorrow.

SPRING--A SKETCH.

Lo the winter is past, the rain is over and gone. The flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come.--Solomon.

Sweet spring! I love thee---for life's young dream was within thy sunny bowers. Ere bitter thoughts had clouded my brow with gloom and care---when hearts and hopes were hallowed things---how dear was the blush that glowed upon the simple wild flower's bosom---how sweet to repose upon the green and flowery turf, on a cool bed of soft deep grass---a bank for a pillow, and for curtains the rose and honey-suckle---beside the fountain's gush amid the balmy fragrance of the opening blossoms.

* * * * * The icy chains of winter are broken---link after link has been dissolved---and nature, smiling, joyous nature comes clad in her flowery garments, rejoicing in her emancipation. Who can look abroad upon the Universe at this bright season, when this world seems a paradise of light and bloom; upon plants and flowers, those sinless, peaceful works of God---when from the lowly vale issues such sweet warblings---and call it a world of cheerless gloom! * * * * *

Oh! I do love thee---for thou art Nature's jubilee! From the unfettered brooks and newly peopled woods and groves, there comes the sweet harmony of inspiration; sweet as childhoods dream, and soft as twilight breathings---Now the bird that loves the morning's freshness, murmurs her music to the breeze, that brings of Flora's sweets, the choicest offerings---the bright King of day puts on his golden armour, and urges his flaming coursers up the steep meridian. Now the quick darting humming bird is seen hovering in almost motionless bliss, near some beautiful blossom---the blackbird is hopping from spray to spray, chattering in the abundance of his joy---the goldfinch chirps in the boughs of the laburnum---hidden amid the green foliage of the forest, sweetly warbles the nightingale---the robin too is heard in our bowers pouring forth a flood of song.

Bright showers of golden petals now bestrew our path---the willows wave their long green tresses in the southern breeze---the moss cup and tulip, the violet and primrose with a thousand nameless blossoms bedeck the earth as for a banquet. The goddess of this bright season in a flower wreathed, mantle made of the freckled cowslip, the daisy and the violet---lingers in the green bowers of myrtle and roses, listening to the sylvan songster as he pours forth a flood of bliss---dew-drops, gems and spangles welcome her appearing. Her feathery herald the lark soars aloft amid the fleecy clouds and with his melody hails her joyful coming. This is a season of pure and hallowed pleasure---a scene of unstained delight.

But where are the laughing eyes, the bounding footstep, the sunny ringlets, and the song of gladness, which we saw and heard around us at the last vernal season? where? and murmuring echo answers "where?" * * * T. F.

THINGS THAT WILL NOT BE DONE.

Christians will not, upon such excuses as they now offer, travel on the Sabbath. They will have no interest or part in any Stage or Boat that goes on God's holy day.

They will not purchase meat in our Market on Mondays so long as the butchers pursue their present practice of killing Sabbath evenings.

They will not rest in their beds later on Sabbath than other mornings.

They will not import, manufacture, buy, sell, give, or receive, Ardent Spirits.

They will not forsake their trust in God and turn to Lotteries to acquire wealth. They will not buy or sell tickets.

I am no prophet or a son of a prophet--- Yet I fully believe there will be a reformation in these things in 1827---and I do not hesitate to denounce, Woe, woe, woe to that professor of religion who does not go for THE WHOLE---

Christians will not, upon such excuses as they now offer, suffer their blood to circulate, or their digestive functions to operate, on the Sabbath---neither will they consent to receive the benefit of light and heat from the Sun, so long as that great luminary is suffered to travel on God's Holy day.

They will not purchase any potatoe, turnip, squash, or cabbage on Monday, so long as the aforesaid vegetables continue their present practice of growing on the Sabbath.

They will not import, manufacture, buy, sell, give or receive, any razor or razors, for with these destructive Engines, men have cut their throats!

They will not forsake their trust in God, and hazard their seed, by casting it into the earth---neither will they engage in mercantile or building lot speculations inasmuch as such speculations partake of the true spirit of gambling---neither will they buy or sell Lottery Tickets, unless such Lotteries are for the purpose of building meeting houses, or raising a clerical fund.

I am no prophet nor the son of a prophet---yet I fully believe that even now, bigotry is despised by some few---and that time will tear the mask from the brow of the Hypocrite---and I do not hesitate to denounce woe, woe, WOE, to that man, who eats bread, wet with the tears of the widow and the orphan---and quiets his conscience with the formalities of religion.

☐ Notice to Correspondents.—Our respected correspondent G. C. from Kentucky shall have a place soon; he is entitled to our thanks for the favours we have received.

A. C. shall appear in our next—we hope to hear from him often. ‘Observer’ is received; to say we are obliged to him for his kindness would be a poor return; we hope to have the privilege of ‘observing’ more favours of the same kind.

☐ WHOSO READETH LET HIM UNDERSTAND.

Now our respected patrons need not think that this is intended as a dun—oh no—we trust we know our friends better than to be guilty of writing such an ugly thing—we only intend to remark that if some of those little bills that now stand between us and them, could be removed by the Spanish mill’d ‘Dei Gratia,’ or by ‘The President and Directors,’ &c. we could pay our printer—that is all.—

CLOUDS.

HUMBLY ATTEMPTED

AFTER THE MANNER OF MRS. HEMANS.

Beautiful clouds in the quiet sky,
Whence come ye floating so proudly by?
‘We come from the land where the forest’s gloom
Frowns darkly around the old warrior’s tomb,
Where the ramparts he reared still their strength retain,
Though ye seek their defenders’ name in vain.
We have crossed the streams of the boundless west,
We have clustered in wreaths round the mountain’s crest
We have swept the prairie’s lonely green,
O’er buffalo herds we have hung a screen,
We have shadowed the path the hunters take,
And obscur’d the gleam of the sunny lake.’
Clouds that are skirted with golden light,
What have ye seen in your airy flight?
‘We have seen stern gloom on the Indian’s brow,
And the grief that stung him, but could not bow,
As he left the shore where his fathers rest,
To seek a new home in the far off west.
We have seen the desert from the wildness freed,
And the hardy yeoman scattering seed,
Villages rising by every stream,
And the white sail glancing in the morning’s beam:
Yet we saw that woes every scene deprave,
For we’ve looked on many a fresh dug grave.’
Say, what is the end of your pilgrimage?
‘We have seen the mountain oak scathed by age,
On the shivered crag there is writ—decay—
Shall we be more happy and strong than they?
Man’s labours and glories doth time obscure—
And shall we, things of vapour and shade, endure?
Beauteous and dense we seem to you,
But we’re vanishing fast from your wondering view,
For the sweeping gust and the sunny ray
Are hurrying and melting our fleeces away;
When the morning comes in its glowing sheen,
Not a mist will tell we ever have been.’
Beautiful clouds, it is ever thus—
Stern time is destroying our work and us;
And ye—though storms in your robes are rolled,
Though the thunders sleep in your dusky fold,
Though ye boast a heavenly home and birth—
Ye must fade away like things of earth!

A DISCOURSE.

Delivered at LOUISVILLE, Ky. on Sunday evening April 8, 1827.

BY T. FISE, JR. ED. GOS. ADV.

2 Cor. iv. 18—The things that are seen are temporal—but the things that are not seen are eternal.

But perhaps you will say, it seems bitter mockery to talk of ruin and decay, when all is blooming with freshness, fragrance and beauty; to those of us who are in the spring season of health and joy. I would not willingly check the generous flow of mirth and innocent pleasure—I would not willingly overshadow your bright meridian, with overhanging clouds; but it is our duty, nay, it is our highest privilege at all times, to contemplate that season of joy, when the Lamb shall carry us in his arms, and fold us to his bosom. It is the birthright of man to die—for this we were born, and for this we came into the world. And my loved friends, why do we, when we come around the bed of the languishing, dying, child of mortality—when the soul seems to quiver upon the lip, in that dark and trying hour when heart and flesh fail—why do we ask, what is his creed, or articles of belief? Why do we in the cheerless hour of dissolution, when all around is darkness—when the rayless vision is closing on temporal things, seek to proselyte him to our creed? This is no time for cant and mummery—the couch of death is not the place to convert hereticks! But it is the place, where every faculty of the soul should be employed, in pointing the trembling, shivering spirit, to the heart-cheering promises of the Eternal God! Where instead of planting thorns in the pillow of the dying, we should strive to bestrew their rugged pathway with flowers!

Death, the “gate of endless joy” the poor man’s last, best friend, who calls thee “King of terrors?” Not him who has struggled with a long life of sorrow and misfortune—not him who mourns the loss of all that man calls near and dear—he calls death any name but that of terror—with a smile of joy he would hail him as the genius of emancipation. The troubled soul can place his hand upon the tomb and say, “here is my quiet and peaceful home—here will all my cares, sorrows and woes be ended—though death yet retains his dart, he has lost his sting; his barb is taken away.”

But how often is the mourner’s heart made to bleed with indescribable anguish with the thought, that the much loved friends, who have gone down to a place of solitude and silence, are weltering amid interminable flame and wrath—horror, darkness and despair!

And even the fond mother is told that the smiling, prattling, tender child—which she has so often folded to her warm and throbbing bosom in all the overwhelming tenderness of a mother’s love—now shrouded with the chill mantle of death—is tossed by fiends in the dark mansions of horror and desolation! Professed Priests of the Most High, are ye idiots, and cannot feel, or demons and have none but those of a fiend, that ye thus blight the garlands of love, and strew blight and mildew in the path of those whom man is bound to protect? Oh is this a time, when the heart of the now childless mother is bursting with the fulness of grief, with the irreparable loss of her infant child, that so lately sunk into the arms of death, with the drowsy smile and half shut eye of sleeping innocence—is this a time to rend the heart with the unscriptural, blasphemous dogma, “that hell is lined or paved with infant skulls?”—How dare you curse those whom the Saviour took in his arms and blessed? How can you with a cold un pitying indifference thus plant a festering thorn of bitter agony in the ranklings of sorrow and affliction? If you have a spark of feeling or sensibility remaining—I charge you by all your nearest and dearest hopes, to think of these things! * * * * *

Soon will the passing moments in their noiseless flight bring us to the confines of the dark valley—and how many of us are there, if at the banquet and the feast, there should appear the hand writing upon the wall, who would not see against their names, written Tekel, Tekel? Perhaps it would speak a sterner language—that mortality was in our cup of joy—that soon a small white or grey stone and a little moss covered hillock, would be all that should remain to tell the world, that such names as ours, had once trod the stage of existence! This is our destiny, the grave will soon close over us, and we shall have gone that way whence we shall not return. How important then that we

Of that vast ocean, on which we sail so soon.”

There comes a voice from the tomb—it calls to us who yet linger upon the shores of time, and temporal things, to have our lamps trimmed and burning—and blessed be God we can say “our Redeemer liveth, and because he lives, we shall live also"---there is an assurance given unto all men, in that he rose from the dead, that, "as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall ALL be made alive." Though dark may be the road, that leads to the quiet mansions of the dead, we can look forward to the end of our journey without regret. For we know that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we HAVE a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. That he who once was cradled in a manger, who has a name that is above every name, will destroy death the last enemy of man. In the unseen world the stern destroyer, can never come---there the icy chain of the spoiler, can no longer bind the loved friends of our bosom, in the chill embrace of dissolution. When time with us shall be no longer, temporal things will all have passed away, and all things will become new---then sorrow and sighing shall flee away---and there shall be no more pain---no scalding tears of bitterness will then be shed---for there shall be no more death---no more curse! While time shall endure, while the things that are seen remain, tears will fall---sorrow and sighing will be heard---the idol of our hearts and hopes pass away, their places are blotted from the record of time, and they exist only in our recollection. Keen pangs of bitter regret will intrude amid the gay pleasures that surround us---feelings that have long slumbered bound again into being. Trees have again put forth their leaves, and the season of flowers has again returned---but the friends we loved have gone to "that bourne whence no traveller returns." How many of us who a few short days since, were the gayest of the gay, and the happiest of the happy, who now mourn over the wreck of proud expectations, desolated prospects, and disappointed hopes. True the face may wear a smile, the note of joy may be heard, but who can enter the secret sanctuary of the human heart---who can number the tears that fall in secret, and which fall unheard---who can fathom the bitterness of despair, that lies buried in the silence of a broken heart! The season of flowers, of joy and rejoicing, has again arrived: but there is something sad in the reflection, that many of us are left to rejoice, if at all, over the grave, of those we love. Many since the last season, have withered like flowers of autumn; and have sunk like leaves smitten by an untimely frost. But God be praised this is not our continuing city nor our abiding place---we have not an immortal existence here with temporal things. In the city that shall be our home when the old heavens and earth are passed away, and our enemy conquered by love, there will be no heart-rendings and trimblings of distress---no winding sheet, no funeral pall, no scalding tears, no bitter pangs of regret, for the last enemy which is death will then be destroyed! No more sorrow, no more pain, no more parting with friends!

We here see friends who part no more to meet---there they will meet, no more to be separated; for the Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into his hands; all the Father hath are mine---all the Father hath given me shall come to me, and him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out. The Lamb of God will lead all his ransomed ones to fountains of living waters---

"There we shall see, and hear, and know,
All we desired, or wished below
And every power find sweet employ,
In that eternal, world of joy."

"The things which are not seen, are Eternal." What are the things that are not seen---Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive of those blissful pleasures that flow at God's right hand! We have never seen the fountain of living waters---we have never seen the tree of life, whose leaves are for the healing of the nations---nor the pure river that flows amid the paradise of God---we have never seen the new heavens, and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. We have never seen every creature which is in heaven, and on earth, under the earth and in the sea ascribing glory to God. We have not seen tears wiped from off all faces---we have not seen every knee bow and every tongue swear that they were righteous and strong in the Lord. We have not seen that glorious feast of fat things prepared for all people---we have not seen death swallowed up in victory---we have not seen death, and him that hath the power of death that is the devil, utterly destroyed---we have not seen all made alive in Christ which died in Adam. We have not seen that glorious dispensation of the fulness of times when God shall have reconciled all things to himself not imputing to them their trespasses. We have never seen perfect happiness; there are pleasures forevermore in the unseen world. We have not seen uninterrupted felicity pure and without alloy, we have not seen the resurrection from the dead, when the great change shall come---the new birth, when all shall be born again---not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, when all shall be changed---this mortal shall put on immortality---then we cannot die any more, but shall be equal to the angels---and we have never seen as we are seen, and known as we are known, eye to eye, and face to face, changed from glory to glory into the same image---when he appears we shall see him as he is, for we shall be like him---he will change our vile bodies like unto his own glorious body. The glorious period will arrive when all shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest; and freed from pollution and earthly frailty shall be delivered into the glorious liberty of the children of God; when every knee shall bow in joyful adoration and shall sing the blissful song of Moses and the Lamb. We have not seen the law fulfilled, which commands perfect love to God, and to one another. We have not seen the God of love all in all—we have never seen that holiness, without which, no man shall see the Lord—we have not seen that city that hath foundations whose builder and maker is God. We have not seen that blissful inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, reserved in heaven.

There will be no howling waste, no barren heath, no pricking bramble, poisonous weed, or unwholesome fruit—but all will be love, harmony and peace. No more wars and fightings, jars and tumults—but then though we may have passed through great tribulation, we shall have our robes washed in the blood of the Lamb, and shall be admitted into that city which is the mother of us all—to an innumerable host of spirits of just men made perfect. Then the period will have arrived when the angel shall swear that time with us, shall be no longer.—Then will the veil be rent, then the covering that is cast over all people will be taken away—and we shall no more look on the things that are now seen, for they are temporal and must pass away. Sin must be finished—iniquity must come to an end—all tears must be wiped away, and every enemy destroyed; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it by all his holy prophets since the world began—and all flesh shall see the salvation of God. Then all nations whom God has made shall come and worship before him. All nations, kindreds, families and tongues made alive and blessed in Christ, and one glorious pan of joy shall ring through the firmament of God's impartial grace.

DOCTRINAL.

ESSAYS ON ELECTION, &c.

We have received from a highly respected friend late of London, among other valuable works an Essay on Election and Reprobation, by RICHARD WRIGHT, well known as an able defender of "the faith once delivered to the saints;" and the friend of rational religion—who with Dr. Belsham, Mr. Aspland, Fox, and a host of others, are engaged in England and Scotland, in levelling the partition walls of a sectarian hierarchy. It gives us unfeigned pleasure to be able to state to our readers, that the cause of liberal christianity is prospered abundantly in Great Britain—that the friends of "the restitution of all things;" number among their most zealous advocates, men who hold the first rank in science and literature. We might mention among many others Dr. Belsham, long known as one of the most able and highly gifted writers of the present day—who shuns not to declare that God is good unto all; and that his tender mercies are over all his works!

The friends in England are not known by the name of Universalists—they take the name of Unitarians; and we think are all, without a single exception, believers in the doctrine of universal benevolence. Mr. Wright has long been engaged as an evangelist preacher—has travelled in England and Scotland, preaching the word with abundant success. We understand that he contemplates visiting this country; should he do so, we should gladly "receive him into our house, and bid him God speed." T. F.

INTRODUCTION.

The subject discussed in this Essay, according to the light in which they are contemplated, will materially affect our views of the character, perfections and government of God, and of the dispensations of his grace; and will have a bearing upon the moral good and happiness of mankind. In the examination of them the leading facts and immutable principles of truth, which are evident, both from reason and revelation, as to compel universal assent, should be steadily kept in view; for no words of scripture can be designed to convey a meaning that is inconsistent with such facts and principles. No doctrine can be true, nor any conclusions just, which are inconsistent with the acknowledged character and perfections of God, and the plain and positive declarations of his word.

All that the scriptures teach respecting the sovereignty and decrees of God, the election of grace, and the reprobation of the ungodly; so far from being questioned, is fully admitted, and intended to be brought before the reader in this Essay. Those notions only are exploded, which, after the most careful and often repeated examination, appear to be contrary to reason and scripture, dishonourable to God, and injurious to man. On every religious subject an appeal lies to the sacred writings, and every man has an unquestionable right to judge of their meaning for himself. Neither the boasted antiquity of any doctrine, nor the countenance it hath received from learned and pious men, nor its still continuing popular, nor any thing else, can supply the want of rational and scriptural proof. Men of all parties are alike fallible; they have erred, and may still err.—Nothing ought to be received as divine truth on the ground of human authority. We ought ever to distinguish between christian doctrines, and the views which christians entertain of those doctrines.

To ascribe righteousness to his Maker;—equally to assert the absolute sovereignty and the unbounded goodness of God; to vindicate his ways to men; and to show the consistency of the peculiar dispensations of his grace with his love and mercy to the whole world;—are the things aimed at by the author in the following pages: that the infinite loveliness of the Divine Character may be more fully known, and God be adored for all his works and ways,

CHAPTER I.

ON THE SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD.

As the Sovereignty of God is generally made the foundation of Election and Reprobation, it will be proper, in the first place, to consider that subject, and lead the reader to rational and scriptural views of it.

SEC. 1. Perfection essential to the absolute Sovereign of the universe.

He who possesses uncontrollable power, and supreme and unbounded dominion, must be self-existent, and independent of all other beings, he must be capable of doing all things of himself. Such Sovereignty requires universal presence; for nothing can act where it is not. He whose dominion and influence are unbounded, must himself be unbounded; he must be every where at all times, or he could not continually operate in all places, and govern all things with unlimited authority. The absolute Sovereign over all must be perfect in wisdom and power; otherwise, something might occur to derange his plans and interrupt the exercise of his authority. He must be infinitely good; or some of his operations and the measures of his government might be inimical to the greatest good of the universe. None but a being who is infinitely wise, powerful and good, can be qualified to exercise absolute, universal, and eternal, dominion. He who is always to rule with unlimited authority, must be immutable and eternal; as the preservation and order of the universe, and the well being of all creatures, depend on the stability and perpetuity of his government. Absolute power cannot safely be trusted with those who are liable to err, fail, or change. As God, and none other, is acknowledged to possess all the perfections we have mentioned; he only is qualified to exercise absolute Sovereignty.

SEC. 2. Grounds of the Sovereignty of God.

God is the supreme and absolute Sovereign, because he has no equal; but is infinitely superiour to all other beings. He is unrivalled in all excellence and perfection. He possesseth in himself, all fulness, glory, and blessedness. He is the source and giver of all life, power, and blessings. As he is the maker of all, authority over all must of right belong to him. As all live, move, and have their being in him, they must owe him unlimited subjection and obedience. As all creatures are his absolute property, he has an indisputable right to do with them whatever he pleaseth. As all are, and must eternally remain, dependent on him, they must be always at his disposal; and so long as they exist, must be subject to his supreme will. Thus the Sovereignty of God is founded on his supreme excellence, his relation to his creatures, and their entire dependence on him. As the Creator, it must depend on his will what creatures shall exist, and what powers and capacities they shall possess. As the Being who preserves and provides for all, it belongs to him to choose and determine where and in what circumstances, they shall be placed. As the giver of all blessings, he hath a right to distribute his favours as it pleaseth him. As he is no man's debtor, but all owe existence and every enjoyment to his free bounty, no one can have a right to find fault with his plans and dispensations. Gratitude and praise are due to him from all creatures, and it is their duty cheerfully to resign themselves to his will.

SEC. 3. The Sovereignty of God indisputable.

That the dominion of God is supreme, unbounded, and eternal, and none will venture to question. He operates throughout the universe, with uncontrollable power; and none can stay his hand, or alter the laws he hath established. What his soul desireth, even that he doeth. None can say unto him, what doest thou? There is no tribunal where he can be arraigned; no being to whom he is accountable. There is no power in the universe that can counteract his designs, or prevent his doing whatever he pleaseth. "His council shall stand; he will do all his pleasure," "for of him and through him, and to him are all things."—"He is the great and only Potentate."

SEC. 4. The Divine Sovereignty to be distinguished from every thing tyrannical.

Though God is an absolute Sovereign, his power is not guided in its operations by a merely despotic will, without regard to what is most wise, and just, and good. In his government there is nothing capricious, nothing arbitrary. Though his will is supreme law throughout the universe, he can will nothing but what is most wise, and just and good. Though he can do whatever he pleaseth, it cannot please him to do any thing that is inconsistent with his own character and perfections; with perfect wisdom, justice and goodness. As the Father of all, he can neither will, nor do any thing, but what is calculated to promote the good of his rational offspring; nor as the righteous governor of the universe, any thing that shall not be subservient to the wise and benevolent ends of his government. He is not the tyrant of the universe, ruling merely to show his power, without regard to moral fitness and universal good. Justice and judgement are the habitation of his throne; mercy and truth shall go before his face.

SEC. 5. God a Righteous Sovereign.

Nothing can arise from the Sovereignty of God, that is contrary to righteousness. Undoubtedly whatever he doeth must be right; because his will is supreme law, and no other being can, without presumption and impiety, attempt to dictate to him how he ought to act; or set in judgement upon his actions; yet it is not to be concluded, that whatever men ascribe to God is just, merely because they ascribe his Sovereignty as a justification of it. It should first be proved that what they ascribe to him is consistent with his character and perfections, with reason and divine revelation: until this be proved, their pleading the divine Sovereignty will be no argument in favour of the truth of their opinions. The righteousness, or justice of God, is not a principle of mere retaliation or revenge; but a modification of his goodness. It consists in his always doing that which is most fit for a Being to do, whose nature is love; who is infinitely wise and good; in his regulating every thing in that way which will best secure the moral good of the creation. It is not possible for him to deviate from the infinite rectitude of his own nature; nor to do what is not wisest and best to be done for the good of his creatures. As God is righteous in all his works and ways, conclusions made from his absolute Sovereignty cannot be just, unless they be consistent with his perfect righteousness; for a righteous sovereign, however absolute his power, cannot use it for unrighteous purposes. The Sovereignty of God ought never to be urged to silence objections to opinions that cannot be reconciled with his justice. Though not accountable to his creatures, he hath condescended to appeal to them respecting the equity of his ways. He hath said, Judge I pray you, between me and my vineyard.—Oh house of Israel, are not my ways equal? How are men to judge of the equity of the ways of God, otherwise than by those principles of justice which they are capable of understanding? God hath not, merely, insisted on his Sovereignty as a justification of his actions; but, by requiring an examination of the righteousness of his conduct, he hath appealed to the principles and rules of equity, with which men are acquainted. It should ever be remembered, that he is as just as he is powerful; and no less a righteous governor, than an absolute sovereign.

SEC. 6. God an infinitely good Sovereign.

God is essentially immutable, and infinitely good. There is nothing in him, that is contrary to goodness. All his other attributes are comprehended in goodness, and are modifications of it. His goodness is most pure and perfect. Nothing can proceed from him, but what proceeds from goodness; nor any thing be done by him, but what is done in goodness. He can neither will, design, nor do any thing but what is perfectly good; nor can he fail to design and do all that is most good. Goodness fills the throne of the universe, and reigns with uncontrollable sway. It follows, that the Sovereignty of God is the Sovereignty of Divine goodness; and nothing can arise from it, that is inimical to the happiness of any subject in his vast dominions.

SEC. 7. The absolute Sovereign the Father of all.

In the supreme and universal Sovereign, God does not lose the character of a gracious and merciful Father. He is the Father of all, because he is the maker of all. As a gracious Father he watches over, and protects, and supplies the wants of all. In this endearing character he hath fully revealed himself by Jesus Christ. A Sovereign, who has all the love of a Father for his subjects, will never use his power, but for their good; their happiness will be the object of all his laws, of all the measures of his government, of his whole administration. Such a Sovereign is the Almighty; and it is impossible that he should mistake in the choice of such measures as are calculated for universal good; or fail in carrying them into effect.

SEC. 8. The Sovereignty of God a security for the well-being of rational creatures.

If the power and dominion of God were not unbounded, the accomplishment of all his designs, and the operation of all things for good, might be doubtful; but now, what ground for doubt can remain? Can any thing be too hard for him? What cannot the absolute Sovereign of the universe effect? What good can be too great to expect from a Being, who is infinitely wise, powerful and good; who is above all controul; whose throne is eternal; who can will nothing but what has happiness for its object; and whose will is supreme and unalterable law?

OUR CAUSE IN THE WEST.

I arrived at Cincinnati on Sunday; and high raised as my expectations were, respecting this "Western Emporium," they were more than realized. The country round about Cincinnati, is beautiful in the extreme. The delightful scenery in its environs the salubrity of the air—its healthy and commanding situation, all combine to render this city the "pride of the west."

In Cincinnati our friends are numerous and highly respectable, and are about to erect a place of public worship. Though they have been sorely buffeted by the enemies of God's grace; tho' they have been in peril among false brethren, yet there is a moral courage among them that laughs at difficulty and mocks at dangers, such as believers in this licentious doctrine have to encounter. Go on my much loved brethren—continue to build upon the Apostles and Prophets, upon that precious, chief corner stone, which is already laid in Zion; and let the rains come, and the winds blow; let the thunder roar, and the tempest of persecution rage, your building stands firm and immoveable as the promise of God.

In Hamilton, Dayton, Springfield, London, Columbus, Franklinton, Wooster, &c. I preached to large and attentive audiences; in each of which places a goodly number of subscribers were obtained for our "pernicious" paper.

Between London and Franklinton, I attended a public debate. Mr. A. Rains, of Chillicothe, (a young preacher of great promise of usefulness in the holy cause we have espoused) on the side of truth, the Bible, and common sense, and Mr. Shaw of London, a Methodist preacher, in vindication of Satan's eternal kingdom, creeds, and commandments of men. And never in my life have I witnessed a more glorious triumph of the doctrine of Universal Benevolence over error and craft, than on this occasion. Notwithstanding Mr. Shaw resorted to the most perverse equivocations and evasions, mingled with a little misrepresentation—the cause of God and his universal grace and goodness triumphed gloriously; and our friends who differ from us saw, we trust, that there is a “refuge” that is by no means a safe abiding place. If our worthy brother Rains, taught them that “the truth, and nothing but the truth,” will stand the test, we shall be abundantly happy.

Of Cleveland, where I preached two discourses on the Sabbath, it is not necessary to speak, as many of our numerous friends in that place are too well known abroad to render it necessary to mention, that, they are among the most respectable in the country; notwithstanding they believe in such a dangerous and licentious doctrine. In Erie, Pa. I preached to a very large concourse of people; who by their patient and untiring attention, manifested their willingness to know the truth as it is in Jesus. Our preachers would receive a cordial welcome in all the large and flourishing towns we have named. The cry was continually, “send over to help us,” and where are the labourers in the vineyard of our master? Young men, if you the question is asked, why stand ye all the day idle? Buckle on the harness, and come forth to the war—come out in the name of the Lord of Hosts, and contend with “spiritual wickedness, in high places”—this is a glorious warfare, and may God teach your hands to the war and your fingers to fight!

Labourers in the vineyard! the fields are white, and wave in the abundance of their rejoicing. In this happy season of refreshing from the presence of God, the gentle dews of Hermon are watering the thirsty ridges of desert lands, and the grass and the tender herb spring up together.

Brethren of the manifold grace of God, are not these glad tidings of great joy? To see multitudes of those, who have long bowed the knee to those which were no Gods, through fear of the fiery furnace, bursting these icy fetters of damnation, and rejoicing in their glorious emancipation from mental bondage, “O ’twere worth a thousand days of common life,

One glimpse at such a joy!”

Among the many bright and blessed days, which it has been my happy privilege to enjoy, those passed among our fearless friends of the west, will be reckoned among the fairest and brightest. The heart in its most craving mood could not require a more cordial welcome. The sweet remembrance of their unbounded kindness and attention to a stranger, will cease but with my existence. Those sunny days of bliss will remain a bright link in the chain of happy associations! Amid the cold frowns of an unfeeling world, amid the pitiless persecutions of fanaticism, the fond recollection of friends—ever near and dear—in the far off west—will pour balm and consolation into the wounds of the soul.

Brethren, we live in a day when the counsel of God is destined to stand—the time of overturning has come; and mounds and partition walls are scattered to the four winds of Heaven! Though the pulse of moral nature has seemed for a time to beat but with terror and distraction, yet the Sun of Righteousness has arisen with healing in his beams. The hour is coming; the fleeting moments in their noiseless flight, will soon bring us that happy period, when all shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest—when cunning shall cease to bewilder, and hypocrisy to deceive—when power shall no longer hedge up the glorious pathway of our Lord and Master, and grievous burdens will no longer be borne. Already do we see our fellow men spurning the base fetters which delusion has forged, and which superstition and popular prejudice, has rivetted upon the soul!

Orthodoxy, well knowing it is the last time, is rolling together her clouds of “blackness and darkness,” with the forlorn hope of obscuring the light that is now beaming in glory and gladness, upon the children of God, who have so long sat in darkness, and in the region of moral death and despair; but all this availeth her nothing. Men will not retrograde in the glorious cause of intellectual emancipation. The time will come; and that ere long, when the Juggernaut of the Hindoos, and the worse than Japanese Idol of professed Christians; and every temple that has an altar erected to the unknown God, will be in ruins; and one Temple be erected in which the Universe of Jehovah will be the living Church—the heart of man the altar, and the incense, praise mingled with thanksgiving!

The sacred flame of holy joy shines with a beacon blaze, and points mankind to an inheritance that is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, to that temple whose light is God, and whose foundation is eternity! To that glorious period, when purged from all impurity and earthly frailty, every creature in the universe of God, shall sit down upon the flowery banks of the pure river of life, and join the “Morning Stars” in their eternal Hymns!

THE GRAVE-YARD.—A FRAGMENT.

The hour of repose had come. Light yet lingered upon the mountains, as if loth to depart and leave the world in darkness—the far off murmur of the waterfall was the only sound that broke the placid quiet of the evening.—Earth and her children—the bright leaves and birds—all seemed held in one unbroken charm of stillness. The deep glen was wrapped in the shadows of the night—the wild flowers closed their finely coloured petals refreshed by the falling dew. The star of evening, was just emerging from behind a milk white cloud, in all its primitive beauty—all around seemed to breathe peace and consolation to the soul as I bent my way towards the mansions of the departed. * * * *

I never shun a grave-yard. The lesson I am taught, as I wander over the green roof of those dark chambers of death—the thoughtful melancholy which the place inspires—gives no pain to the soul.—It is grateful rather than disagreeable, for here I am taught my latter end—that this world of care and strife, is not my continuing city—that soon I shall lie beneath the thickly piled clods of the valley—my flesh become a banquet for the worm, and the spirit will ascend to God. * * * *

I often wander among the tombs from choice—there in the valley of shadows—there in that land of solitude and silence, where the chill of mortality has withered hearts and hopes—there it is, that the soul buries itself in its own boundless depths, and communes in secret and in silence with an all seeing God! There earth and earthly scenes are forgotten—its gay delusions—its halls of boisterous revelry—its enchanting pleasures—its reckless fancies—all fade from the remembrance, uncared for, and forgotten! * * * *

The small and great are there. There lies the stainless child of spotless purity—so passionless and pure, that it seemed a snow flake,—too sinless for earth, the bright bud was transplanted to a softer clime—to bloom in the bowers of bliss, amid the paradise of God!—There the loved voice of friendship, sweet to our recollection as an angel's song—is hushed in silence—and the tongue whose thrilling tones once discoursed music to the heart, is now still and motionless. Man once the proud & haughty lord of his fellow—now lies as low as the penniless outcast—his visions of earthly glory are vanished—his pomp and splendour—his folly and pretensions have passed away—his base ignoble passions, all are quiet in the house of slumber! The proud spirits of ambition, that seemed for a time, as if about to encircle the world with a blood stained wreath of destruction—are blotted from the records of time, and exist only in name. The fellest animosity lies deeply buried, and the darkest sins are covered—malevolence has lost its power, and anger has ceased its raging—strife is at an end—the tongue of slander is dumb and powerless, and has ceased to wound—there the scorching rays of calumny and detraction, cannot penetrate to wither the buds of hope and happiness—there false friendship never more can congeal the warm life blood of young and tender hearts—for there the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest! * * *

And is this the end of man? No—there are cloudless skies in the new heavens, where falls no blight—there is a glorious putting on of immortality, in a world of joy, where pain nor death is never known—where we shall die no more—but shall be equal to the white robed spirits that stand around the Throne of God!!

"EARNESTLY CONTEND FOR THE FAITH."

FEMALE PREACHERS.

"Let your women keep silence in the churches; if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a SHAME for women to speak in the church." St. Paul.

It is becoming so fashionable at this enlightened period, for women to attempt to get up a new light—and to such excess is this fanaticism carried in some parts of our country, that we cannot forbear a passing remark upon this subject. Our readers will undoubtedly recollect a certain Miss Livermore, who shone so conspicuously at Washington, during the last winter as a preacher. The mania seems to have spread, for within a few days we have heard that another heavenly body had been discovered in Ohio; whether a planet or a shooting star, our informant saith not.

Now we know not what our brethren of "the cloth" may think of this matter; but for ourselves we "calculate" on preparing some knitting work forthwith. The order of things seems to be reversed, and if the dear creatures really have a call to preach, why we intend to relinquish, quit, assign, and make over, all our right and title to manhood, modesty, propriety and common sense; and not be troubled any longer with such unfashionable articles. We will moreover give, grant, sell, and convey, certain garment or garments, usually worn on certain occasions, to any modest, delicate, female preacher, who is about to shine—provided nevertheless the clothes should not prove too small, or the jacket too strait.

But trifling aside,—we ask what can be more revolting to our conceptions of propriety, than to see a female, tender, modest and delicate, or should be so, rise before a mixed multitude of "spirits, blue, grizzle and grey," out of all nations, kindreds, and tongues; and deliver her views and feelings, before a company of blackguards, women and children. We know not what others may think of the practice, but for ourselves, we give it our unqualified disapprobation. It destroys all our respect for those whom man is bound to love and protect, when we see them thus overstep all the bounds of decency and decorum. Where is that sweet bashful retiring modesty, that is so dear and so lovely in woman? Where is that sense of propriety that is so indispensable to the female character? Gone—lost, and with it all that renders woman the object of our affectionate regard. No, a woman who can so far forget what is due to her sex as to appear before an assembly as a public speaker, is an object of pity and compassion, but never of friendship or respect. Nature never intended them to shine in the cabinet or in the field; in the senate chamber, or in the halls of justice; but in the "green bowers of home." And when they despise the shame of which the Apostle speaks, and forget that they are women—men will also forget it too, and will no longer treat them as such. They then are no long or objects of adoration, but of aversion and abhorrence. We end as we began—"Let your women keep silence in the church!" And we might add, "teach the young women to be discreet, chaste, and keepers at home," not to be gadding abroad with their bundles of spiritual nonsense, called tracts!

IMPORTANT QUERY!

If it would not be thought unbecoming a moral and religious people to answer—we would ask, what has become of the $500,000 deposited some time since in the Bank at Hartford Conn. as a secret missionary fund?

Doctrinal.—Benjamin Clark, of Pembroke Genesee county, offers a reward of $50 to any person who will inform him in what part of the "Holy Scriptures" he can find the command to keep the first day of the week for the Sabbath! Here is a fine field opened for polemicks; and a handsome prize to contend for.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

A schoolmaster from Harvard lately expelled a scholar 18 years of age, from school, on his refusing to pray, when requested, the scholar alleging that he did not come to school to be taught to pray.

The schoolmaster was indicted for an assault and battery before the court of common pleas at Worcester, but the jury, without leaving their seats, found a verdict of not guilty, on the ground "that a schoolmaster has a right to resort to expulsion as one mode of punishment, and that the custom of the country sanctions prayer as an exercise in schools."

[Infuriated bigots, as we now term them, burnt and butchered one another in the dark ages, when they had been taught to pray to different Gods, or to the same God, but accompanied by different ceremonies. Such proceedings excite our horror; they are a blot upon human nature. But a verdict, which compels our young men to pray, whether willing or not, to a God, whom perhaps they do not acknowledge—scarcely excites our surprise; because, forsooth, it is pronounced in our own day, by a jury of our own countrymen, who claim the honour of being born in a liberal and enlightened age, and in a land which boasts political freedom and religious liberty. Is prayer, we would ask, extorted by punishment an acceptable offering to the Christian Deity?—New-Harmony Gaz.]

Intolerance.—In Boston recently, Bishop Fenwick of the Catholic church, refused to let Mr. Burnham, a member of that church, bury his child in the catholic burying ground because Dr. Jenks, a protestant minister, had made a prayer at its funeral!

WOMAN.

Written in the Album of an Unknown Lady.

BY MR. HALLECK.

Lady, although we have not met
And may not meet beneath the sky;
And whether thine are eyes of jet,
Gray, or dark blue, or violet,
Or hazel—heaven knows, not I;

Whether around thy cheek of rose
A maiden's glowing locks are curled,
And to some thousand kneeling beaux,
Thy frown is cold as winter snows,
Thy smile is worth a world;

Or whether, past youth's joyous strife,
The calm of thought is on thy brow,
And thou art in thy noon of life,
Loving, and loved, a happy wife,
And happier mother now,

I know not—but whate'er thou art,
Whoe'er thou art, were mine the spell,
To call Fate's joys, or blunt its dart,
There should not be one hand or heart
But served or wished thee well.

For thou art woman—with that word
Life's dearest hopes and memory come,
Truth, Beauty, Love—in her adored,
And earth's Lost Paradise restored,
In the green bower of home.

What is man's love? His vows are broke
Even while his parting kiss is warm—
But woman's love all change will mock,
And, like the ivy round the oak,
Clings closest in the storm.

And well the poet at her shrine
May bend, and worship while he woos;
To him she is a thing divine,
The inspiration of his line,
His lov'd one and his muse.

If to his song the echo rings
Of Fame—'tis woman's voice he hears,
If even from his lyre's proud strings,
Flow sounds like rush of angel wings,
'Tis that she listens while he sings,
With blended smiles and tears.

Smiles, tears,—whose blest and blessing power,
Like sun and dew o'er summer's tree,
Alone keeps green through Time's long hour,
That frailer thing than leaf or flower,
A Poet's immortality.

CONTROVERSIAL.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MR. EVERETT,

Sir—In perusing your “review of a Pamphlet entitled, Universalism or the rich man and Lazarus, a sermon by Thomas Lounsbury, A. B. pastor of the first Presbyterian congregation in Ovid,” my mind was peculiarly entertained with a quotation on page 16, wherein Mr. L. pledges to the public, “whenever called upon to prove demonstrably, from fair and legitimate consequences, if this system (Universal Salvation) be true, that Alexander the Great, the mad-cap King of Sweden, Napoleon Bonaparte, and all other great cut-throats, who at successive periods, were the terror and scourge of the human family, were men of the most exalted virtue; that falsehood, dishonesty, lewdness, homicide, &c. are virtues of a very high order, and contribute amazingly to the general account of human happiness.”

On reading this quotation my impression perfectly coincided with yours, “that he never will perform the task which he has assumed.” Had this “pledge” been given by a believer in universal salvation, on the supposition that endless misery is true, it could “be easily shown,” yea, proved “demonstrably from fair and legitimate consequences,” that what Mr. L. has asserted respecting the above named characters, is a truth; and that he himself, in misrepresenting the sentiments of Universalists, practices a virtue “of a very high order.” If the Great Supreme is a being of infinite wisdom; if he is a being of the “most exalted virtue,” and if he is such a being as is represented by Calvinists: That he has made a hell of liquid fire, to burn and torment his feeble offspring, “while eternal ages roll their ceaseless rounds,” then the proof follows with some degree of plausibility, if not “demonstrably from fair and legitimate consequences”—that Alexander the Great, the Mad-cap king of Sweden, Napoleon Bonaparte, and all other great cut-throats, who at successive periods, were the terror and scourge of the human family, “were men of the most exalted virtue;” inasmuch as they have followed his examples, in causing all the misery and devastation, in their power: well might they exclaim glory to God, and to ourselves, we have been thy imitators; we have followed thy examples;—thou hast commanded us to be ‘imitators of God,’ thou hast declared that thou wilt inflict the most excruciating agony and torment upon thy children; that thou wilt make thy offspring miserable, as long as thou dost exist.—We therefore in obedience to thy commands have followed thy examples. We have embroiled our hands in the blood of millions of the human family, and although we have not had the power as thou hast, to make them miserable eternally; yet we have endeavoured to protract that misery to the longest period possible.—We have been ‘the terror and scourge of the human family.’ Now therefore as we have followed thy example, as far as lay in our power; we claim to be thy true disciples; yea we ‘cut-throats’ have been active in producing all the misery and desolation in our power. And we do verily believe that John Calvin was thy true disciple, inasmuch as he followed thy examples by burning alive, Michael Servetus the Spaniard by a slow fire, we also have endeavoured to imitate his example, by producing misery of the same kind—we have also been faithful in the practice of ‘falsehood’ and ‘dishonesty,’ for if we believe the testimony of John Calvin, we also believe that these are attributes of thine, for he hath taught thy decrees. That for the manifestation of thy glory, some men are ‘foreordained to everlasting death’ that ‘the entry of life is locked up,’ we also read in thy word, that thou wilt ‘have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.’ We believe with Calvin and with all his followers, that thou hast given a law to mankind the penalty of which is endless misery in a future state—that the wages of sin is death, yea eternal death—that thou hast threatened all those who have by their guilt incurred this penalty—that thou wouldst surely execute it—and that thou wouldst execute it upon the soul that sinneth. Nevertheless thou hast not only failed to execute thy threatening upon all the guilty, but hast executed it upon the innocent, even on Christ ‘who did no sin neither was guile found in his mouth.’—We also have practiced ‘falsehood,’ and ‘dishonesty,’ yea ‘homicide,’ in murdering the innocent. The reader will bear in mind that this is reasoning on ‘the supposition’ that endless misery is a truth notwithstanding all that is said in scripture to the contrary, and that the penalty of the law instead of being executed upon the guilty, is inflicted upon the innocent, at the expense of truth in the threatening, and that by imitating a being, whose character is as represented by such a doctrine perfectly justifiable, if not as Mr. L. says "virtues of a very high order" we can easily perceive how "Alexander the Great, the Mad-cap king of Sweden, Napoleon Bonaparte and all other great cut-throats who at successive periods were the terror and scourge of the human family," can be justified in their conduct on the plea that they have yielded obedience to the commands of God by being imitators of his character and conduct. But on the supposition that "universal salvation is true that the above named characters can be proved, demonstrably from fair and legitimate consequences," to be "men of of the most exalted virtue" remains a declaration and a pledge, which we must leave for the comprehensive mind of Mr. Lounsbury to fathom. Will he contend that they are men of the most exalted virtue because God loves the whole human family and will save them from sin, and from all its attendant consequences, he cannot—will he plead the example of that God, who is 'Love' in justification of their unhallowed conduct? He cannot pretend this, for their conduct has been in diametrical opposition to the character of such a Being. Will he plead their obedience to the requirements of such a Being? No, for his requirements are, "thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself" yea this is the command of heaven, even "on the supposition that universal salvation is true," that "all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." But perhaps we mistake his view of 'universal salvation.' Perhaps his view of it may be, that mankind cannot be saved, till after the dissolution of the body and that then, they will be saved from an endless hell which they justly deserve that by reasoning upon this principle, he may pretend to prove "demonstrably from fair and legitimate consequences" that they are "men of the most exalted virtue" because they have been the means of sending them 'right to heaven.' If this is his view of salvation, it is a fabrication of his own contriving; we have nothing to do with it, we do not believe in such a 'universal salvation,' we utterly deny such a doctrine.

Our ears are often saluted with the ungrateful cry, that "if I believed in universal salvation, I would rob, lie, cheat, steal, burn my bible" &c. "I would indulge myself in all manner of mischiefs." This ungrateful principle will do for a Nero, for an unprincipled savage. But for a christian!! O BLUSH AND BE ASHAMED: yea all who profess the christian name, contend not for the truth of such an impious, unchristian, ungrateful declaration, for the sake of gratitude, for the sake of human nature, let it pass for a falsehood, for a random idle tale. But if ye will contend that the doctrine is a truth, ye tell us in so many words that ye are ROTTEN AT THE CORE. Your language is, were it not the fear of an endless hell, we would cease to love and worship the God of heaven; Then ye would appear in your real character, an enemy to God and man; and still ye profess to love and fear God, aye this fear; is it not the fear of an endless hell; ye say if we believed in "universal salvation" (that is) remove this propelling engine this fear of hell which produces all our love and service to God, then we would appear, how? as ye are; rotten at the heart; no wonder your service to God is a burden, all which is produced by the slavish fear of hell, and not by love. Remember the Lord hath said of some of old, by the prophet Isaiah that "they have removed their heart far from me, and their fear towards me is taught by the precepts of men." The beloved disciple John hath said "there is no fear in love, but perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment, he that feareth is not made perfect in love." We love him because he first loved us, if any man say I love God and hate his brother HE IS A LIAR, for he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen; and this commandment have we from him THAT HE WHO LOVETH GOD LOVETH HIS BROTHER ALSO."

SIN NOT INFINITE.

Two arguments are used, to sustain the idea that sin is infinite in its nature, which are the following, viz. 1. that the Being offended against, is infinite; and 2. that the punishment of sin is endless, and therefore the cause must be infinite, in order to justify the infliction of such punishment. I shall attempt a refutation of each of the foregoing propositions, in the order in which they stand.

That sin is not infinite, because it is committed against the law of an infinite Being, is evident from the following considerations, First: sin exists only in the intention of the creature, and its magnitude is according to the capacity or capability of him who commits it. For example; the child of a year old, may, in gratifying the whim of a moment, destroy the life of its brother or sister. This would be sin; but no righteous judge would damn the author of the deed to the gallows; for this good reason,—the mind of the child is incapable of taking cognizance of the law prohibiting such conduct, and also unable to judge of the nature of the deed from the consequences attending it. It is maintained, that it is criminal to do an injury to the meanest of God's creatures—more criminal to offend against a magistrate or prince—and infinitely criminal to offend against God. Well, suppose all this should be admitted; does it not follow that one sin is greater than another? Most certainly. The greater sin is that which is committed against the prince, and the greatest is that which is committed against God. If this be the fact, does it not follow that sin in the two first degrees of comparison is not infinite? Certainly; and if one sin is finite why may not all sins be of a like character? Indeed, the very process of reasoning adopted to sustain the opinion I am examining, is of a nature to disprove, what it is designed to sustain.

Again, 2. That sin is of different degrees, is a fact admitted by every man of understanding, and plainly taught in the scriptures. No one will pretend that the child who steals an apple is as guilty as the assassin who takes the life of his neighbour; or that the crime of murder, is no worse in its nature, than that of playing at whist. If, then, there are degrees of criminality in sin, all sins cannot be infinite; for nothing can be added to infinity, or taken from it; nor can it be possible that more than one sin could ever be committed, if it were infinite, for one sin, in that case would fill the universe of God, and drive the Eternal from his throne.

Here an objection may arise. It may be contended that if sin exists in the intention of the creature, he may, although he be finite in all his powers and faculties, (which cannot be denied) his evil intentions may go so far as to constitute him guilty of an infinite offence. To this I reply,

1. Those who bring this objection, seem to overlook an important fact; viz. that the creature being limited in all his powers and faculties, effectually prevents him from committing an infinite offence even in imagination. We are told that, had man the power, he would dethrone Omnipotence, and take his place! But did it ever enter into the heart of a man to conceive how such an event could be brought about? It is absurd to maintain such an idea.

2. But, admitting, for the sake of argument, that man has the power, not to dethrone God, but to conceive of a plan in all its ramifications, which should be likely to bring about such an event; does it follow that he could desire to carry such a plan into effect? If the answer should be yes, then it would be quite apparent that such desire, would proceed from one of two principles. Either, first, from a desire in the creature to injure his own happiness, and that of all mankind; or secondly, from entire ignorance of the character of the being to be dethroned. I lay it down as an axiom that no man, angel, or devil, ever did, or ever can, desire to destroy his own happiness; and therefore, had man the power to subvert the throne of Jehovah, and let "planets and suns run lawless through the skies"—he would never do it, if he knew what the character of God was, and how much his own happiness and that of others depended upon his existence.—And secondly, if ignorance should constitute the foundation of such desire, it would be the sin of ignorance, and for that reason if no other, not infinite.

2ndly. The argument in support of the opinion I am examining which is inferred from the nature of the penalty to be inflicted upon sin involves the very question in debate. It may answer to prove that sin is infinite, and from such fact when established

(if possible to establish so gross an absurdity,) infer that punishment is endless or infinite, in its duration; but it will never do to take for granted that punishment is endless, and from thence infer that its procuring cause is infinite. Let it first be proved that punishment for sin is endless, and then it will be time to conclude that sin is infinite, but not before. It would be foolish to say, that punishment is endless, because sin is infinite; and that sin is infinite because punishment is endless. Yet the arguments of our opponents in fact amounts to about the same thing.

REMARKS.

The notion that sin is infinite, has ever had a bad tendency upon the morals of christians, exactly proportionate to their faith in such an absurdity. It has led many honest souls to despair of mercy.—Thinking they had committed an infinite sin, and not being able to see how so great an offence could be forgiven, they have adopted the dreadful alternative of putting an end to their existence. Parents have destroyed their own children, lest they should commit such an offence as might endanger their everlasting peace; and thousands have concluded that as sin was infinite, and that nothing could be added to it, they might go on the way of transgression, without adding any thing to their guilt, by a multiplication of their offences. And christians too, good souls, thinking they have obtained pardon for an infinite offence, are a little disposed, sometimes, to be guilty of "the backslidings of a saint" out of pure love, no doubt, for the souls of mankind. From all, and singular of such opinions and offences, to use the language of "the church," we say, "good Lord deliver us." L. S. E.

THE BURIAL.—A FRAGMENT.

It was summer. The sun shone proudly down upon the gray mist that rose above the billows—the blushing charms of spring were passed, and the summer glow of loveliness had succeeded. The woodlands were gay and beautiful—for nature had clothed them in all her surpassing splendours. The mountain stream now run, now rippled, now curling with its silver eddies glad sparkling in the sunbeam—now smoothly flowed along its ever varying bed, towards its quiet home "in the world of waters." The birds warbled as sweetly in their green bowers of bliss, as if sighs and tears were a thing unknown. * * * *

There was joy on earth—the twittering swallow as it darted along in sunshine and shade, heeded not the bitter wailings of affliction and distress—the wild bird in its noiseless flight, softly silent as falls the snow flake—seemed unmindful of woe, as it flashed its wing across the vision like a thought of a dream during the hushed hours of midnight—and vanished as suddenly. To me the sight of their joyous felicity brought no gladness—the sounds of their mirth fell cold upon the heart—its seemed but bitter mockery—and spoke of days departed. The bright and laughing skies seemed insensible that there were smiling over ruin and decay—that one of hope's fairest, sweetest flowers had drooped and died—and that now—even now—was to be laid in the earth's cold bosom.

I had seen the child in its guileless beauty—when it was a thing all glowing with health, innocence and joy—I had seen it folded in the arms of her that bore it, in all the overwhelming fondness of a Mother's love. But now her first born blessing—her first, last, and only one—slept—not on the soft bosom of a mother's tenderness—but with the quiet dead! Death, death! How lovely canst thou be! Though pale and lifeless, it wore a smile passionless and pure, as the cherub of immortality—it had nothing of the corpse about it, but its whiteness—nothing of the grave, but its silence. So beautiful it seemed—like the sportive lamb decked with a flowery garland for the sacrifice—I could fain have lain down by its side in the cold bosom of our common mother in the dark and silent valley. * * *

Thou weepst childless mother—ah, well thou mayest—the son of God wept at the tomb of his friend—and thou mournest thy first born—Hard it is for thee to lay thy loved one low in the damp earth—beneath the cold clods of the valley—hard it is to reflect that this thy child of peerless beauty, will never more raise its rosy lips to thine, in all the fondness of childhood's warm affection—ah! these are recollections that weigh upon the soul, even to overpowering. Memory tells thee thou art desolate—it tells too of playful smiles—of a thousand soft and winning ways that twine around the mother's bosom—it tells of the sweet wild throbbings of unspeakable bliss, that were thine when softly soothing it to slumber and repose. Now—the foliage of the cypress will be its shelter—and the narrow house its abiding place—the nursery will no more resound with its gladsome mirth—the cradle in which it had so often reposed in quiet is now desolate—Thou weepst childless mother. * * *

The last look. The time is come when she may gaze once more upon her sleeping boy, ere the pall is settled upon his lifeless brow—Oh the bitter agony of that moment—one long burning kiss upon his marble forehead—and he is shut from her view—in the fulness of her grief she says,

"No more my baby shall thou lie,
With drowsy smile and half shut eye—
Pillow'd upon thy mother's breast,
Serenely sinking into rest.

Thou wert lovelier than the morn of May,
Possess'd the brightest charms that youth adorn—
But all those beauties now have pass'd away,
And all who knew them once are left to mourn.

The opening rose bloom'd here a little while—Smiling serene beneath a summer's sky—
But can no more a mother's sigh beguile,
Or wipe the tear from pale affliction's eye.

For God hath laid thee down to sleep,
Like a pure pearl beneath the deep!"

Look abroad fond mother upon the ways of sinful men, and repine no more, that God has made thy child an angel in the regions of bliss. ---now his song mingles with the thanksgiving of the blest! sanctified, safe, and secure, from the stormy blasts of iniquity, with him who is from everlasting! * * *

The long train of weeping friends gathered round a fresh dug grave. The coffin was lowered in its final resting place—in the vale of solitude and silence—the spirit of him who was so lovely here had long ere this crossed the dark waters—and is safely landed upon the flowery coast of a world of fadeless bloom!

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

FEMALE PREACHERS...AGAIN.

Last evening having swallowed the last bit of cake that my plate afforded—and after washing it down with a small cup of Hyson, was just settling into a profound state of meditation, on the doctrine of 'total depravity'—'vicarious sufferings,' &c. &c.—favoured into the bargain by a most delicious drowsiness—and half dreaming and half thinking of the "last day"—I say in this heavenly frame of mind I was interrupted!! And how? Was the town on fire? Was there news of an earthquake? Or had I been taken at my word, respecting the "dear creatures," and was called upon for the panta-loons? Not exactly that—but worse than either, or all put together—a letter from Phebe! Mirabile! The soul and body have scarce been acquainted with each other since. At first we thought that being a bachelor, we had made a conquest—that being, as it were, "Calebs in search of a wife," we had a sort of glimmering hope, that our probationary state of 'single blessedness,' had well nigh ended—when lo and behold! a damper! Here it comes,

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MESSERS. — Your observations in the last Advocate, respecting women's preaching, I consider illiberal and erroneous; assuming to yourselves a kind of dictatorial power incompatible with that freedom of discussion which you frequently invite. That women have a right to teach, preach or exhort, and that they are as capable of doing either, according as the Almighty shall call and qualify, is clear and evident, both from reason, scripture and common sense.

I shall not at present undertake to argue the question, I only wish to remind you, that perhaps community would sustain no great loss, in case you should exchange your desk for knitting work, in which case I hope you would knit a finer fabric in that line, than you do from the pulpit. The females generally have no disposition to exchange dresses with you until they are rendered more reputable by that class of men who assume the exclusive right of pointing out the way to heaven.

I should judge from your language, that you have been in the practice of preaching to choice collections of spirits, "blue, grizzle and grey," and "a company of blackguards." If you have been preaching to such I think it time for us to witness some reform. I have seen many female preachers in my time, and never recollect of seeing one in that capacity insulted or abused; but their preaching was attended with as much effect, as well received, and the congregation as much edified, and comforted as ever I did by the preaching of a man.

The more I reflect on your extraordinary observations, the more I am surprised that you should so far expose your weakness—you say it “destroys our respect for them, &c. when we see them overstep all the bounds of decency and decorum.” If preaching the gospel, is over-stepping the bounds of decency and decorum, I think it ought to be discouraged both in men and women; and none assemble to hear but spirits, “blue, grizzle and grey,” it is time to abolish the practice. But is there any subject more sublime? Any better calculated to call into action, the tender sympathies of the female bosom? Does she not feel an equal interest in the reformation of the human family? And do we not receive from women the most useful part of our instruction? Are we not indebted to them for our very existence? And why in the name of common sense shall they be degraded below their proper rank in society?

That it is not so convenient for them, I will admit; but I must contend, they have the same right as a man and are capable of doing as much good.

PHEBE.

June 5, 1827.

Now what do we know not—it seems we have got into hot water sure enough—into the suds completely. To say we are sorry for having been guilty of what seems to have been an unpardonable sin, would look extremely awkward on paper. Besides, we did but just speak; and to be thus handled without gloves—Oh! 'tis too bad by half. To tell the truth, we are in a strait between two—whether to hang, or drown ourselves, we are as yet undetermined. If our opponent was only a man—why it would be food and raiment, to break a lance with him; but a woman—modest, tender, delicate, woman! Oh it would break our little heart to have it supposed for a moment, we could be guilty of fighting with a woman! We had thought at first of addressing a note to “Phebe” through the medium of the post office, making the amende ‘honourable,’ for the shocking crime of which we were found guilty—but then at the second thought the danger of such a course flashed us in the face—for it would probably be good ground on which to commence an action, (not for assault and battery—but for “a breach of promise!” Having a constitutional dislike to courts (of law I mean) particularly when ourselves should in all probability be so nearly concerned, we have thought fit, by and with the advice and consent of counsel, to come out with a public explanation, of our views and feelings.

In the first place we feel it our privilege to notice the following little morceau from our sweet sister.

“I shall not at present undertake [now why not?] to argue the question; I only wish to remind you that perhaps community would sustain no great loss, in case you should exchange your desk for “knitting work!”

Oh Phebe, Phebe,—you have cut us into a thousand and one pieces—verily this is downright cruelty—or we are no judge. Why now, did you not know that we considered ourselves a GREAT WESTERN LUMINARY? That is, not exactly a Luminary like those, published at Bloomfield and Lexington, but a sort of LIGHT shining in a dark place—one of the GREAT LIGHTS of the world—even wisdom and knowledge personified! Now to be thus put out—extinguished—by one feminine “puff”—better were it for that man had he never been born. Well Phebe what more have you to say?

Why, “in which case [of exchange for the “knitting work”] I hope you would knit a finer fabric in that line, than you do from the pulpit!”

We are ground to powder—verily we are dust and ashes—and altogether vanity! Why Phebe how could you have a heart to blow us up so high—even as it were “sky high?” Now let me ask if you ever heard ourselves weave any of our long yarns in the pulpit? Else how could you judge—if you have and can say from the heart we did not make “firm work”—Why heaven and earth—though I would not be impolite to a lady for worlds—yet I am constrained to say—that—that—you are no judge—that’s flat!

Now let us hear from you again Phebe if you please. The next clause reads thus—

“The females generally have no disposition to exchange dresses with you, until they are rendered more reputable, by that class of men who assume the exclusive right of pointing out the way to heaven!”

Worse and worse, ten thousand times told.—When we come to this we rubbed our hands—pinched our elbows, and did a great many other things “too numerous to mention,” in order to ascertain whether we were in the body or out of the body! As soon as we had recovered from the shock (’twas truly shocking!) we could not but be thankful that “the females generally” had no disposition to exchange dresses with ourselves—for our wardrobe happens at this time, to be amazing scanty.

Phebe says “I should judge from your language, that you have been in the habit of preaching to choice collections of spirits, “blue, grizzle and grey” and a company of blackguards, &c.”

Now we really don’t know, ’pon honour—can’t say but we have—for we have preached to a great many women! We mean to cast no reflections Phebe, either upon you, or the dear creatures “generally”—Oh no we like them too well, to be guilty of such an ugly thing; “only wish to remind you” we are no judge of—colours!

Phebe says she has seen “many female preachers in her time”—So have we ourselves—in our time; and we always pitied and despised them! What do you think of that Phebe? A woman who can break over all bounds of decency—who can lay aside that all powerful charm—modesty—we again repeat it, is no longer an object of adoration but of disgust and abhorrence. No—a woman should like the sensitive plant, shrink from such boldness and indiscretion; she should never aspire to be an oak—if she should—when the rains come, and the winds blow—she will most assuredly fall, a blighted, withered, joyless thing, no more to rise. We again fearlessly repeat the declaration of last week, that when females despise the shame of which the apos-

He speaks---and forget that they are women---men will also forget it too, and will no longer treat them as such. We say once for all, "Let your women keep silence in the churches; if they will learn any thing let them ask their husbands at home; for it is a SHAME for women to speak in the church!" (But then St. Paul was a bachelor and his opinions seem to be getting unfashionable among the sisterhood.)

Phebe says "their preaching was attended with as much EFFECT, and the congregation as much edified, and comforted, &c."; she goes on and asks, "Is there any thing better calculated to call into action the tender sympathies of the female bosom?" Our melancholy answer is No! And it is for that very reason that we deprecate the practice. We have seen too many mournful instances of depravity which were the consequents of such "calling into action," &c. not to give it our marked and unqualified disapprobation. It is true---aye and a melancholy fact! it is too---that many are edified as Phebe says, at inquiry, whispering and camp meetings---we ourselves heard very many instances during a late tour to the west, of the outpourings of the un-Holy Spirit; else perhaps we had not called the attention of our readers to this all important subject.

It is to the softer sex we look as to a beacon blaze to guide us amid the whirlwind and the storm of human ills---it is to them we are indebted in no small degree for our education, habits and dispositions. How important then that woman, altogether lovely as she is---should take heed to her ways; for if she once falls it is forever---she falls never more to rise. Our fair correspondent seems to hint that it is our design to degrade them below their proper rank in society---this is a very great mistake---for all we have said---all we wish or intend by calling the attention of our fair readers to this subject is, to prevent them from degrading themselves, in the estimation of every rational being.

We have but one word to say---if Phebe or any other dear modest creature is "called and qualified," and is about to shine---they shall have our coat, hat and --- no we will wear the small clothes ourself!

T. F.

Our readers will probably recollect, that in the brief sketch lately given of "our cause in the west," it was mentioned that the "Rev. Dr." Blackburn, and the "Rev." Geo. C. Light, of Louisville, Kentucky, were strongly called upon, both by me and others, to come out openly, like faithful shepherds, and oppose this dangerous, licentious, damnable heresy---and that they refused! The reason they assigned for so doing was 'MY INSIGNIFICANCE!' Now this was true enough---it is a well known truth that the "infidel" writer of this paragraph is a weak brother---but he has had the unspeakable satisfaction of knowing by happy experience, that God has chosen the weak things of this world to confound the mighty! (This our Methodist brother Stribling, of Flemingsburg, Ky. knows by un-happy experience, to be a melancholy fact! Dr. Houston, too, of the same place, he knows something about "weak things," we guess!)

Well insignificant as I was, it did not prevent Mr. Light from coming out after I had (as he supposed) left the place---with a flaming denunciation against the abominable infidelity that had been preached in that town, by his poor, weak, insignificant brother. His intention of preaching in opposition to the "grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men," reached my ears as I was leaving town---I gave some few friends notice that I should return at the time---they kept it however to themselves. On Sunday I returned to Louisville---and when the children of God came to present themselves before the Lord "Satan came also among them!" I took my seat upon the foot stool of the sanctuary---took out my paper and pencil and was, as the poet says,

"A chiel among them taking notes
And now I'll print them."

Our readers may therefore expect to see from time to time, as we have space and opportunity, some of the "strong reasons" of our Methodist brother, together with some insignificant remarks on the same under the head of,

FRIENDLY LETTERS TO THE REV. GEO. C. LIGHT
of Louisville, Kentucky.

LETTER NO. I.

SIR---The humble individual who now has the honour to address you makes no apology for the liberty of calling your attention to a few passing remarks upon your discourse, respecting "rewards and punishments."

Your text was, if I mistake not, in Matt. 25, 46, "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal."

These words you were pleased to say, referred to the last or final judgement; now, sir, will you allow me to inquire, what authority you have, for making this bold unqualified assertion? The word "last judgement" or "final judgement" I do recollect of having seen in the bible---unless it was at the head of a chapter! I very well know, that education, and popular prejudice, are always ready to attempt to convince the understanding, that these words cannot but refer to something yet to come, because the translators of the bible (good pious men we all know) saw fit, when they divided the "gospel according to Matthew," into chapters and verses, to place at the head of the 25th chapter, "The parable &c. Also the description of the last judgement!" I know not why I have not as much authority for saying, "Also the description of the late war,"---as the pious translator had for saying, that the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew, contains ought that concerns us, other than as a matter of history. There is as much propriety in saying that the history of Josephus contains the description of the last judgement---as there is in saying the words selected, as your text, refer to a period yet to come. They both refer to one and the same event—the Saviour began to speak of a judgement, and a fearful one too—that was about to come upon that “adulterous and sinful generation,” in the 24th chap. of Matthew, and continued the same subject through the 25th; and notwithstanding the plain and positive declaration of the Saviour, that all these things of which he was then speaking, should be fulfilled before that generation should pass away, yet such is the force of prejudice and prepossession that many like yourself suppose, that we are under a mistake, when we say, these things were fulfilled during the life time of those who were then present according to the prediction of the Saviour.

I know very well that the tradition of men will have the words of your text to refer to some awful period, some countless years hence, no one knows when—and that bigotry nods a willing assent, and cries—yea verily—yet for myself I prefer taking for proof the positive declarations of the Son of God, rather than the notions, or commentaries, of frail, erring man. We should, if we would learn of Christ, hearken to his words—and when he speaks plainly and unequivocally we should never strive to pervert his meaning. There is no mystery in either of the chapters of Matthew to which we have referred—the Saviour could not have used more definite language. He speaks of a separation between the sheep and goats, and he tells us when it shall be. The separation of which he speaks was to take place “When the Son of Man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him”—Now we have only to ascertain when he should come, and we shall then know the precise time when all these things should be fulfilled. Math. xvi. 27, 28. “For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here that shall not taste of death till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom.” The Saviour tells the High Priest, that he (he himself not his successor) should see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven. He tells us, Mark xix. 1, “Verily I say unto you, that there be some of them that stand here which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power.” Luke xxii. 18. “For I say unto you, I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come.” Luke xix. 26, 27, “For whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father’s and of the holy angels”—when is this to take place? “But I tell you of a truth, There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God.”

Now what language could be more plain and unequivocal? Allow me to ask, that if you had never heard of a last judgement, would you believe there was anything contained in the 24th or 25th chapters of Matthew respecting such an event? Suppose we should place the scriptures in the hands of a savage who might be able to read them, he having never heard or read anything of a final judgement—I ask whether or no he would learn anything respecting it there, unless it was at the head of some of the chapters? How could he do so when it is not to be found in the Bible?

Our limits preclude the possibility of saying more at this time; wishing you grace, mercy and peace, I am &c. T. FISK.

BLACK LIST NO. 2.

“What a specious outside falsehood hath!”

In June, 1824, a man by the name of P. B. Andrews called upon a Universalist, in this village, to show him the awful nature of the universalist faith. Mr. Andrews stated that he was a resident of Cleaveland, Ohio, where he was a member of the Presbyterian church; and being in Buffalo, and learning that universalism prevailed here, he had thought proper to call upon one of that sentiment and warn him faithfully. In the course of that conversation, which lasted about an hour, Mr. Andrews declared that no man who was a universalist could believe the Bible; that the whole doctrine was anti-scriptural, and had a direct tendency to the commission of the most heinous crimes. He was asked whether he candidly believed all the doctrines of Calvinism, as set forth in the discipline and government of the Presbyterian church, to which he replied he did; and that without so believing, he said he did not think any man who had enjoyed the opportunity of knowing and embracing those doctrines, would ever reach heaven. He was farther asked whether he supposed a person who had been once converted and brought into the fold of the faithful, could by his own deeds, ever again return to a state of wickedness which should cause his ultimate exclusion from heaven. His reply was that it was impossible for a true saint ever to fall from grace so far as to be finally damned; but that he might be led, by temptation, to commit sin, yet still he would escape the imputation of it, so far as to be finally brought to Christ.

Mr. Andrews was very urgent to have the Universalist forsake his faith, as there was danger of its leading him to commit some diabolical act; and he concluded his harrangue by saying, “I should like to know what the old editor of your Gospel Advocate [meaning Mr. T. Gross, who was then its editor] thinks of Daniel xii. 1, and Jude, verse 7.” He was told that he could know, by putting his request on paper, addressed to Mr. Gross. He then asked the universalist to write down his request, put the initials of his name, "P. B. A." to the communication and send it to Mr. Gross. This was done, and the communication may be found at page 196, Vol. 2, of the Gospel Advocate. The answer to the request, by the editor, begins at page 209 of the same Volume.

This whole affair, of itself, contained nothing of sufficient importance to recal it at this time; but the recent detection of a company of counterfeiters, at Painesville, Ohio, disclosed a fact which seemed somewhat connected with it. The company were manufacturing base half dollars, of the U. S. stamp, and one of them, who turned states' evidence, swore that Mr. P. B. Andrews, of Cleveland, (who is a gunsmith) made the dies for stamping the counterfeit coin! Officers of justice were despatched to Cleveland, to arrest Andrews, but he received notice of their approach and fled in time to make his escape!

This man says he believes in an endless hell, but he also believes that he has been converted, and that any man who has been converted, can never be in danger of being finally damped. In other words, Andrews thought his conversion a certificate of ensurance against the flames of hell, though he should carry on the business of counterfeiting coin, and thus defraud his fellow men; while the unregenerate soul would be consigned to everlasting damnation for practising the same crime.

Query.—Is Calvinism of a moral tendency, in its effects upon community?

One thing more—we learn from Painesville, Ohio, that the father of the young coiners (a member of the Methodist church) held prayer meetings and conferences at his house, howled and groaned, while his sons were in the cellar making spurious coin?

What do you think of that, Elder Bigelow—what do you think of that? Shall we not shortly get a second edition from you respecting the licentious tendency of universalism?

Fertility of Florida.—A traveller returned from Florida, says—it is the most fertile country he ever found; the land producing forty bushels of frogs to the acre, and alligators enough to fence them.

They alone are independent of fortune who have made themselves a separate existence from the world.

The pain occasioned by want of gratification increases uniformly; and at last becomes extreme, when the pleasure of gratification is reduced to nothing.

Br. Massena B. Ballou is about to take charge of the societies in Charlton and Brookfield, Mass.

Br. John S. Thompson, late of Utica, is now preaching at Charlestown, Mass.

Br. John Bisbè, late of Hartford, Conn. has received an invitation from the society in Portland to become their pastor; it is expected he will accept the invitation.

ON THE DEATH OF A CHILD.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

No bitter tears for thee he shed,
Blossom of being! seen and gone!
With flowers alone we strew thy bed,
O blest, alone departed one!
Whose all of life, a rosy ray,
Blushed into dawn and passed away.

Yes, thou art gone, ere guilt had power
To stain thy cherub soul and form!
Clos'd is the soft ephemeral flower
That never felt a storm!
The sunbeam's smile, the Zephyr's breath,
All that it knew from birth to death.

Thou wert so like a form of light,
That heaven benignly called thee hence.
Ere yet the world could breathe one blight
O'er thy sweet innocence:
And thou, that brighter world to bless,
Art passed with all thy loveliness.

Oh! had'st thou still on earth remained,
Vision of beauty, fair as brief,
How soon thy brightness had been stained
With passion, or with grief!
Now not a sully'ing breath can rise
To dim thy glory in the skies.

We rear no marble o'er thy tomb,
No sculptured image there sabbil mourn,
Ah! fitter far the vernal bloom
Such dwelling to adorn.
Fragrance, and flowers, and dews, must be
The only emblems meet for thee!

Thy grave shall be a blessed shrine,
Adorn'd with nature's brightest wreath.
Each glowing season shall combine
Its incense there to breathe;
And oft upon the midnight air
Shall viewless harps be murmuring there.

And oh! sometimes in visions blest,
Sweet Spirit, visit our repose,
And bear, from thine own world of rest,
Some balm for human woes!
What form more lovely could be given
Than thine to messenger of Heaven?

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

Messrs. EDITORS—I have read some numbers of your excellent paper, and confess myself highly pleased with the candour and good sense by which it is characterized—may your benevolent exertions be crowned with success and extensive patronage.

The time has come when every man, who wishes for the prosperity of Zion, for the perpetuity of our civil institutions, must sound the tocsin of alarm, and stand arrayed with an invincible front to check the impetuosity of the orthodox phalanx. Both ecclesiastical and political watchmen must stand sleepless upon the towers of freedom, or our much loved Columbia, which has promised so fair, the admiration of the old world and the pride of the new, the nursery of liberty and the destruction of tyranny, will set in Monkish iniquity and priestly ignorance.

The trials and blood of our fathers, amid the turmoil of the revolution, are too recent in our memories—we have too recently beheld their bones bleaching in our fields, whitening our plains; to relinquish without one effort our dear bought privileges.

The dastardly wretch, courting popularity, bowing at the shrine of vulgar applause, may set down in inglorious ease, and resign his conscience to his earthly confessor; but let the spirit that dare be free, unsheath the sword of truth, and march forth to drive the hydra headed monster of Priestly ambition from the confines of day.

I have been led to these remarks from a survey of numerous engines put in operation by those who consider themselves "sound in the faith," and particularly from the specious names under which they appear.

The musick of a name, the splendour of a dress charms the multitude. A missionary society for the propagation of the gospel among the heathen, is attractive to all who wish well to the Redeemer's kingdom. And when a man is told, that, by contributing liberally to this, he shall not only be instrumental in saving others, but will thus certainly save himself, it is peculiarly so. Thus suspicions, of its utility, are lulled to sleep. They awake not till bound by the fetters his own credulity has aided in forging.

That every one should have a Bible is desirable. Hence men readily patronize the Bible society; and as readily consign you to the shades below if you insinuate they are planting the seeds of future spiritual domination by the funds they commit to the direction of their ministerial dignitaries.

That our youth should be instructed in the first principles of our religion must be wished by all its admirers; that our children inhale the spirit of the gospel, with their infantile breath, sounds well. Hence parents are easily prevailed upon to countenance Sabbath Schools, and readily place their children under the pious teachers who voluntarily offer to receive them.

Messrs. Editors, I am acquainted with Sabbath Schools. I have been an instructor in them, and have been an agent in establishing several. I ought to know the principles on which they are founded, and the manner they are conducted. In large populous places where there are a great many poor children, a sabbath school to aid them in acquiring that education, which would qualify them for usefulness in life would be a benevolent institution. When directed solely to this end, no reasonable man would refuse it his patronage. This may have been the principle on which they first started. But ah, how fallen! They are now the mere engine of a party, designed to prop a sinking cause.

A pious orthodox clergyman once remarked to me, "Br———use your influence to support Sabbath Schools, they are our last resort. Our only remaining prop for Evangelical doctrine." Such is the fact, unless the young and tender mind can be biassed in their favour, the heart-withering sentiments of John Calvin will fall, the mighty fabrick his followers have so long been labouring to erect, will crumble into dust and not a vestige be left to tell where it stood.

It is to no manner of purpose the advocates of these schools tell us no sectarian principles are taught in them. Our ears have heard, our eyes have seen a refutation of the remark. Do not the managers of these schools let their own sentiments be known to their scholars? Do they not freely circulate among them publications fraught with their own peculiar dogmas? Do they not distribute wild and fanatical tracts filled with puerile trash? Have they not even laboured to introduce them into our schools?

I must close, but Messrs. Editors, unmask the hypocrite and expose his depravity to publick view. The fact is these schools are calculated to become nurseries of orthodoxy. They will trammel the mind, destroy free inquiry, hasten the return of the dark ages when all a man will know is the cant phrases and popular slang of his priest.

Yours, with esteem.

OBSERVER.

From the N. Y. Enquirer.

Society for Ameliorating the condition of the Jews.—We have been accustomed to make an annual report of the proceedings of this Society, but from other pursuits we were prevented from attending the meeting on Friday, and therefore cannot say how much money has been received, and how much has been paid to agents, and how many "Conditions have been Ameliorated" among the Chosen People—this, however, we distinctly understood, that the meeting was very turbulent, and there was considerable sparring on the subject of the funds. Had this sparring been confined to the Jews, the vulgar adage might have applied in full force, but it was wholly among the Gentiles.

It seems that the annual report was read, and Dr. Spring moved that it be adopted and printed. This report (Proh Pudor) recommended the Society to be abolished! After so much zeal exercised—so much money raised—so many female societies formed—so many tears shed—so many speeches made and reports printed—the poor Jews are to be abandoned at last, and their future condition left without hindrance to that protecting Deity, who has for so many thousand years sustained them as a distinct nation. The proposal to disband the Society was strenuously opposed, and a motion was made to reject the report as being partial, unjust and unconstitutional.

George Wilson, Esq. was in favour of rejecting the report, and in the course of his remarks he referred to the conduct of the Apostle Paul. He was replied to by our pious friend Col. Stone, of the Commercial, who was in favour of disbanding the society, which he considered a great humbug altogether—and as to the Apostle Paul and other biblical references of the honourable counsellor, he was of opinion that it was too antiquated to talk of persons and things so far back as the Apostle's time. This reverend attack upon a sacred personage of so much boldness, piety and character as the Apostle, quite shocked the assemblage, coming, too, from a supposed pious quarter, and Mr. Wilson very audibly charged the Colonel with knowing but little about St. Paul. The debate then waxed hot, and in the midst of an eloquent appeal from our friend Stone, he was called to order, not for using offensive words, but from the very important discovery that the Colonel had not paid his dues, (a common complaint) and consequently had no right to speak; cut off in the midst of his discourse, he walked towards the treasurer, to whom he tendered his dues. Here another difficulty arose—they were not paid in season, and could not be received, whereupon the Colonel walked off in a pet, but returning, he took the floor, and commenced a vehement harrangue in favour of dissolving the society and appropriating the funds for other purposes. He was again called to order for having spoken three times, and after much excitement and warm debate, the report was rejected, and the society still exists, in all its usefulness, in affording salaries to officers and a good living to agents. More money has been raised and expended in Europe and America for evangelizing the Jews than would clothe and feed one hundred thousand poor people. The funds of our society amount just to $15,000, and we propose that they lend that sum to us, to carry on our moral and useful journal, at six per cent interest and approved security. Such an appropriation will "ameliorate the condition" of at least one of the fraternity, "in whom there is no guile," as our friend Charles King will testify. We hope they will take it into consideration. Some "ameliorating" effects may grow out of it.

THE DIFFERENCE.

Universalism is a false doctrine, because its professors sometimes do wrong. Limitarianism is true, because its professors sometimes do right. Universalism is false, because, in the opinions of some, a few passages of Scripture seem to make against it. Limitarianism is true, because, in the opinions of those persons, a few passages speak in its favour. Universalism is false, because some, that never believed it discard it in their last moments.—Limitarianism is true, because by the unmerited exertions of its preachers, some are persuaded to die in the belief of it. Universalism is false, because it embraces the whole moral law and enjoins love to all men. Limitarianism is true, because it commands us to love our friends and hate our enemies. Universalism is false, because plain and simple. Limitarianism is true, because involved in impenetrable mystery. Universalism is false, because it relieves the mind from doubts and fears, and confers "peace in believing." Limitarianism is true, because it involves the mind in doubts and uncertainty, and compels the believer to go mourning all his days.

Does the Universalist do wrong? It is the result of depravity and corruption. Does the Limitarian do wrong? It is a venial offence, not wilfully committed, merely the effect of imperfection, common to all. As it respects the Universalist, nothing better could be expected from his doctrine. With respect to the Limitarian, poor soul, his fault originated in the temptation of Satan. Does the Universalist suffer affliction? It is the judgement of God for his iniquity. Does the Limitarian suffer the like? It is the chastisement of a Father's love, designed for his good. Does the Universalist leave the world, rejoicing in God, the Saviour of all men : He is awfully deceived, and will certainly be damned. Does the Limitarian die, exulting in a partial God, in the happiness of himself and a few others, and the endless misery of the rest : Happy soul he has gone to glory. Universalists must go to hell, for believing in God, "who will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth;" Limitarians must be saved, for believing that, contrary to the will of God, a great portion will be endlessly damned, and remain in ignorance and blasphemy. Under all these important considerations, who would not be a Limitarian.

CHAPTER II.

ON THE DECREES OF GOD.

We can know nothing of the decrees of God, but either as they are discovered by the laws he hath established in the visible universe, by the connexion which is found to exist between cause and effect, or by what is declared concerning them in the sacred scriptures.

SEC. 1. The Decrees of God must be consistent with his own character and perfections.

Unless it be contended that he can have a mind at variance with his revealed character and acknowledged perfections, or that he can decree what is contrary to his mind, this must be admitted; and if it be admitted, it will follow that there are no decrees of God, but what are founded in wisdom and goodness.—Though his decrees are the determinations of his sovereign will, and he hath a right to decree what he pleaseth, he can decree nothing but what is worthy of himself, because he cannot act inconsistently; nothing but what is for the good of his creatures; because he is infinitely good. It is impossible he should decree the endless misery of his rational offspring;—for that would render their existence a curse and not a blessing, and could never be reconciled with his goodness as their Creator and Preserver; but to suppose that he decreed their sins as the ground of their condemnation to such misery, is to represent him as, in the highest degree, unjust and malevolent, instead of just and merciful. Such decrees could never proceed from a wise, just, and good being. It is inconsistent with what the scriptures teach concerning God, to suppose him to decree the sufferings of his rational creatures, in any period of their existence, but as the means of their improvement and happiness. He hath decreed that causes shall operate and produce their own effects; and all lead on to happy results. He hath determined the times before appointed, and fixed the bounds of the habitations of the children of men. He saw the end from the beginning; appointed the successive dispensations of his grace; and worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. He hath decreed that vice shall produce misery; virtue, happiness; though he hath not appointed misery to be a final end.

SEC. 2. The Decrees of God are the determinations and appointments of a righteous Governor, and gracious Father.

The decrees of God are neither capricious nor arbitrary determinations, nor are they designed merely to show that he is uncontroulable; and can dispose of his creatures as he pleaseth; they are the dictates of eternal wisdom; the perfection of moral fitness; the bulwarks of universal order; the guardians of existence and happiness. He hath not decreed that any should be vessels of wrath, but those who make themselves such; nor that any should be destroyed; but those who fit themselves for destruction. If we fear God and work righteousness, there is no divine decree against us; nothing to cut us off from acceptance with him, or exclude us from his favour. If we do not fear him and work righteousness, there is no decree in our favour; nothing, that can secure us from the painful effect of sin, from the threatened punishment. To decree the salvation of those who continue in sin, or that men should be happy any further than they live righteously; would be inconsistent with the character of God, as a righteous governor and Father; contrary to his love of righteousness and hatred of iniquity, and dangerous to the whole moral system.

SEC. 3. On the Decree of Election.

The supposition that God, by a sovereign act of his will, hath decreed that a part of mankind, irrespective of their character and conduct, shall be the exclusive objects of his favour, and heirs of salvation; that they shall be brought by his irresistible grace to eternal life and glory; is utterly incompatible with his impartiality, as a righteous governor, and his love to the human race at large, as their common Father. According to such an imaginary decree, the elect, by an arbitrary act of despotick will are constituted a privileged order under the divine government, whom no penalty can reach, no law condemn; on whom grace and glory are so irreversibly settled, as to preclude the possibility of either being forfeited by any crime. That no such decree ever did or can exist, is evident; because God is no respecter of persons; his ways are equal; he will render to every man according to his works; to them who, by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory and honour and immortality, eternal life; he will be found of them that seek him, and will freely pardon all, who repent and turn to him. Such a decree would not only restrict the love of the kind Father of all, to a part of his great family; it would annul what is evidently a decree of the Almighty; that men shall be accepted or rejected by him, according to their real character and conduct; and that happiness and misery shall depend on the moral state of the happy or miserable.

SEC. 4. On the Decree of Reprobation.

If the imaginary decree of Election, already noticed, be irreconcilable with the character and perfections of God, and contrary to the express declarations of the scripture; much more, the counterpart of it, that of Reprobation. To suppose that God decreed the utter rejection of a considerable part of mankind, before they were capable of offending him;—that he appointed them to misery before he made them, and decreed the crimes they commit as the means of their destruction; In short, that he fixed their eternal doom, and made their eternal misery unavoidable by his unalterable decree; is to represent him, not as a gracious Father, but as an unjust and cruel tyrant; his government as infinitely oppressive; his calls and invitations to sinners, indiscriminately, to turn and live, as downright mockery; and future judgement, as worse than a solemn farce, as giving a show of justice to what is most unjust, and veiling cruelty in the forms of judicial procedure. As we know God is perfectly just and good, we may be confident that no such decrees hath ever proceeded from him. He declares that he hath no pleasure in the death of the sinner, but rather he would return from his evil ways and live. It is for their sins only that he will reject any of his creatures,

SEC. 5. On God's Secret Decrees.

Men have talked about God's secret decrees; but if they be secret, how can we know any thing about them? Are those who so talk members of his cabinet, and numbered among his privy counsellors? It is impossible we should know whether there be, or be not, secret decrees of God: we can be acquainted with what is revealed only. If there be secret decrees of God, they cannot be in opposition to what he hath revealed; they must perfectly agree with what he hath made known of himself, of his designs and will, in his works and word.—Let it be remembered that secret things belong unto the Lord; revealed things only belong unto us. If God hath secret decrees, as we can know nothing of them, we can have nothing to do with them.

A committee from six different denominations in Philadelphia have been appointed, with authority, whenever they shall deem it expedient, to take measures for the establishment of a National Society, for the more general promotion and improvement of Bible Classes.—Boston Recorder.

Theological Begging.—We understand that two Baptist clergymen from the College at Washington, D. C. are travelling to the south, for the purpose of collecting funds. ## GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

That we are on the eve of an eventful period, cannot we think be doubted by any one, who can discern the "signs of the times." The article found in our paper of to-day, which we copy from Noah's N. Y. Enquirer, will be read with interest; also, the one by "Observer," on Sunday Schools, &c. It gives us inexpressible joy to find men like M. M. Noah coming out boldly on the Lord's side. There has long been a sluggishness, and a spirit of apathy abroad in our land—long have the people been lulled by the syren song of peace when there was no peace—but a time of awakening has come. They have seen the unhallowed attempts of a bigotted hierarchy, to build up a national religion—they have marked their national preachers—their national societies—and they no longer slumber on the brink of destruction.

We boldly say, that there never was the time known, since the dark days of the revolution, when the liberties of our country were so much endangered, as at the present. Coalitions the most black, combinations the most foul, have been entered into by the would be inquisitors—no stone has been left unturned. Societies numberless and nameless—from the rag bag and mite, to the mammoth "national," have been formed—malignant in their efforts and as serpentine in their course, as the "father" of coalitions, conspiracies, and falsehood. But let them beware that the stone from out of the mountain, does not fall upon them and grind them to powder.

Come now brethren of the orthodox faith—tell us what have you done? Why millions upon millions we have wrung from the lone widows and helpless orphans! What else? We have compassed sea and land to make one proselyte—and when we have converted him to our faith, (without which no doubt he would perish everlastingly) he was made ten times more the child of hell than he was before!—We have pretended to preach Christ to the heathen—but instead of that we have preached ourselves—and the consequence is, that the otherwise happy nations—they that previously kept the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace—who were honest—just—meek—charitable—hospitable—are now full of bitter envyings and strife! They who previous to missionaries going among them knew no worse epithet, or greater curse than "you old woman," now can "damn your soul to hell"—can curse and swear almost equal to their religious teachers!

Well brethren revivalists—and what have you done? Why we have entered into towns where there was a settled minister, but whom we thought a little heretical—and we have told his people who loved him and one another—that they were all going to hell! And what followed? why Bedlam has been filled with lunatics, and the hospitals with the insane! The father has been armed with vengeance against the son—the son against the father—where all before was amity, peace, harmony, and friendship—now there is strife and every evil work.

But we rejoice that our Presbyterian brethren are at last aroused from these delusive dreams of the imagination—we are glad to find that the buzzing insects* have at last aroused the sleeping lion—his voice of thunder is heard by the unprincipled, soulless beings who have so long trampled upon the tender charities of an indulgent community—the hand writing is seen upon the wall—and fearfulness and trembling have come upon them. The second edition of the Boston Recorder published at Utica—being the “echo,” or mouth piece of orthodoxy for this state, is in a most woful predicament. The letters which were published some little time since, respecting revivals, by certain Rev. and D. D’s. seem to have troubled the waters amazingly. In addition to this our sober and rational Presbyterian brethren at Troy, have lately published an account of certain “sayings and doings” in relation to the progress of the divisions in the 1st Presbyterian church in that city—also, strictures upon the new doctrines of Finney, Beman, &c. This pamphlet seems one of the seven last plagues to friend Hastings of the Recorder—at least we should suppose so from his whining so piteously. “Alas! Alas! that great city Babylon”—God send thee a good deliverance, and friend Hastings a happy issue out of all his troubles. T. F.

* Finney, Beman, & Co.

The following extract from the Utica Magazine will show the course pursued by revivalists in the state of New-York. We blush to record such depravity—but as faithful chroniclers of passing events we deem it our duty, however unpleasant the task may be. This Mr. B., with a host of others of the same stamp are those whose infamous proceedings are tolerated, vindicated and supported by the Presbytery, through the medium of their mouth piece the Western Recorder.

Mr. Editor.—I observed in your paper of April 7th, a notice of an expression of Mr. B.—, a Calvinist preacher who has been ‘holding forth’ to the citizens of Newport, (Herkimer co.) for sometime past. Hereafter we may notice this fellow as he deserves. At present, we shall only give to the publick a short catalogue of some of his expressions, in addressing a respectable congregation, at different times, and then let the sensible part of community judge for themselves, with respect to his character as a minister of the Gospel, and a Christian.

Addressing himself directly to the audience, he says, “you will go to hell, and I am glad of it! I thank God that he has made a hell for you! If you were to go to heaven, you would only quarrel with the saints, and you are not fit to be on earth, you ought to go hell now!—O, you wretches! you serpents! you vipers! nothing is too bad for you to do, you would not hesitate to murder your fellow creatures, and wash your hands in their hearts’ blood.”

In another sermon he says, “Another set of such wretches, cannot be found this side of hell; ransack, (or rake) hell to its lowest regions, and you cannot find beings so wicked as this place affords. You would fight God Almighty! What do you think your young arms can do towards contending against the great Jehovah? Why he would” (suited the action to the phrase) “take your soul between his thumb and finger, and shake you till you would howl. He will set his feet upon your necks, and stamp you down to hell,” [stamping violently.] In preaching from the text, “God is love;” he says, “God in his love created an endless hell; it is God’s pure love that will send sinners there; and it is God’s love that will keep them there to all eternity. Unitarians and Universalists are no more christians than the devils in hell.” Here a number of respectable ladies, and I believe gentlemen, rose and left the house. While they were going, he exclaimed, “there the serpents go! See the vipers run.”

At another time he says, “The best of you stink in the nose of the Almighty. When I tell you the truth, you squirm like a nest of snakes, with fire thrown amongst them.” In another discourse, he called them adders, and said, “if Jesus Christ were in the pulpit you would sting him to death. You are worse than (or as bad) as the devils,” says he, “and all you lack of being complete devils, is to have your throats cut and sent to hell.” In talking with a young lady, he called her a liar, and another a blasphemer, merely for answering him civilly, to improper and uncivil questions. And because a boy happened to make some little noise while he was at prayer, he called upon the Almighty to pour out his wrath upon him. But enough. We might fill sheets with the same kind of senseless and fulsome jargon dealt out by this man, in the pleatude of his infuriated zeal. But we forbear at present.—We shall notice him occasionally while he lingers about Newport, and spread his sayings and doings before the the public. RUBICUS.

N. B.—The foregoing can all be substantiated by the most respectable testimony. R.

REMARKS.

We publish the foregoing communication, not because we are pleased with the rant, and vulgarity of those, whose mouths are the vehicles of obscenity and profanity, but because we wish to guard the innocent and unsuspecting against the impositions, and dictations of these young enthusiasts who go about, sowing seeds of confusion and evil, and pretend to have received from God a holy commission. We assure the citizens of Newport that it is our sincere belief, that Rev. Mr. B. is more fit to become the subject of a lunatic hospital, than to teach men in spiritual things, and would be, therefore, unworthy of notice were he not the mouth piece of persons of higher walks and ranks in life. Ed. Mag.

IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

It was a law we believe at Athens, in the time of Solon, that any one who stood neuter at a time when parties were excited, should be punished with death. Indifference, coldness, and apathy were looked upon as capital crimes—and to neglect to stand forth openly, fearlessly and boldly, upon all occasions, in defence of their rights, was considered moral treason.

Now we ask how many are there in our country, who if they were brought to the bar and tried by this law, who would not find written against their names Tekel? How many women in men's apparel have been alarmed at the appalling sound of Unpopularity—and have stood aloof while bigotry and superstition, were plotting the most fearful damnation against the rights of conscience! The open foe is scarcely less to be dreaded, and hardly does more mischief, than the neutral automaton—who can fold his arms in silent indifference, while misrule and anarchy are sowing discord among the brethren.

Walking beings who called themselves men, have calmly looked on, with heartless apathy, and have seen the scanty pittance wrung from the hard hand of poverty and want, by pious fraud to support the overgrown, and bloated missionary institutions of this country—upon the funds of which, batten many a lazy, hypocritical, gluttonous cormorant; and that too while haggard poverty, stared us in the face in every corner of our streets. The prison doors have remained unopened—the widow has mourned, and the orphan tears have fallen many and bitter, for want of a scanty pittance, when millions have been squandered to fill the coffers of Juggernaut! And yet ye call yourselves men—O blush and be ashamed.

But God be praised, there is a deep sensation—a moral courage breaking forth like the long smothered volcano—that shall sweep away this abomination that has so long made desolate! Yes your secret fund of $500,000 will soon be wanted—not to build up your national societies, but to buy your daily bread. The infamous deceptions and pious frauds that have been practised upon the poor and needy cry aloud for vengeance—it has reached to heaven—and the days of this moral curse are numbered.

The friends of intellectual emancipation, owe it to themselves, their posterity, and to their God, to come out fearlessly in defence of those rights that were bought with our fathers' blood. And we rejoice to see so many of our brethren who differ from us in sentiment, moving forward in a phalanx strong and united to the overthrow of the modern Babel—its foundations are already giving way, and this hideous Moloch will come to the ground. Fall it must, for no beam from on high ever irradiated its abiding place, no grateful heart ever bowed at its shrine! T. F.

FRIENDLY LETTERS TO THE REV. GEO. C. LIGHT-
of Louisville, Kentucky.

LETTER NO. 2.

"REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS."

As this is a subject all important to us, great care should be taken that we be not deceived. Such is our imperfection and infirmity—and so powerfully does fashion and education influence us—that it is no wonder we should sometimes err, even on subjects that so deeply concern our happiness and well being. Seeing as we do, thro' a glass darkly—having our minds darkened by the wisdom of this world—we are sometimes unable to see things as they are, in their true light and proper colours. I very well know from unhappy experience, the force of prejudice and prepossession; that all mankind, are either in a greater or less degree, influenced by their education, imagination or fancy—and frequently bring themselves to think that they really believe this or that, to be true or false, when in reality they only fancy it, or imagine it, to be so. Our parents believed thus and so, and they have educated us to believe the same—our minister and our particular friends thus believe, and we would not for worlds differ from them in opinion. The little experience I have had in the world has taught me that all mankind are more or less prepossessed in favour of their own creed or sentiment—that they more frequently read the scriptures in order to find themselves right, than to find what is right. But this is very wrong, and should ever be discountenanced; we should search the scriptures diligently and carefully, with our minds open to conviction, and should receive the truth in good and honest hearts, come from whom it may.

In order to come to a right understanding of the Saviour's meaning, when he spoke the words selected by you as the subject matter of your discourse, it will be necessary to turn back to the 24th chapter of Matthew, where he commenced "these sayings." The disciples came to him privately desiring to know what should be the sign of his coming, and the end of the world? (Christ came once in the end of the world; age or dispensation, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself,—see also Cor. i. 10, 11—Heb. ix. 26, which refer to the same event.) And Jesus answered them that there should be false Christs, wars and rumours of wars, earthquakes, famines and pestilences in divers places. Now could he be speaking of another state of existence? Is there earthquakes and famines in eternity? Are there wars and rumours of wars, in the regions of immortality? He goes on, and tells them that they should be delivered to be afflicted, &c. all which historians tell us was strictly and literally fulfilled; he says moreover that when they shall see the abomination, &c. spoken of by Daniel the prophet, (see Dan. ix. 27, which was strictly fulfilled to the very letter, at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem,) then let him that is in Judea flee into the mountains; now if this refers to a final judgement, of what use would it be to flee into the mountains? He speaks of house tops and clothes—do disembodied spirits wear clothes? The Saviour speaks of the field---the winter and the Sabbath day; now I ask you to lay aside the prepossessions and prejudices so natural to us all, and answer me from the heart when I ask, are there fields beyond the grave? Is there the various seasons of summer and winter in the regions of immortality? And Jewish Sabbath days too? I think your answer must be that this must refer solely to the judgement at the destruction of Jerusalem, and not to a last judgement yet to come.

The Saviour tell them very particularly why they should flee from Judea and Jerusalem to the mountains. For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, nor ever should be. We need only to read the history of the destruction of that devoted city of Jerusalem in order to be convinced that such tribulation, as then came upon the children of Israel was never equalled since the creation. Brother betraying the brother to death; the father armed with vengeance against his once beloved son; the son meeting the father in the fore front of the hottest battle, thus literally fulfilling the words of Christ, "that a man's foes should be those of his own household." Not only had the Jews to contend with the Romans, and with one another, but with the famine and pestilence. Such was the horrors of that dreadful famine, that to such fearful straits were they reduced, that even the fond and tender mother drained the life blood of her innocent child to support her own existence! The angel of desolation stalked abroad in triumph; nought was heard but the groans of the dying, the shouts of the victor and the cry of the vanquished! The Romans pushed the siege with unremitted vigour and soon became masters of the place; carnage and bloodshed ensued unparalled in the annals of man, and might well be termed "the abomination of desolation!" With the torch in one hand, the sword in the other, the soldiers rushed through the streets; and Jerusalem once a name and a praise in all the earth sunk into "everlasting destruction"---proving to the world, that the damnation of the wicked slumbereth not! Now it seems strange---passing strange, that after all the Saviour has said on the subject; that after having so often and so plainly told us, "that THIS GENERATION shall not pass till ALL these things be fulfilled; that THEN---at that time---in the life time of those who were then standing in his presence, (not a hundred, or a million of years afterwards,) that this great tribulation should come---this separation between the law and the gospel, or between the sheep and the goats to use his figurative language---should THEN take place. I say it seems strange that we should so pervert his words and say it refers to something yet to come! Although he told them that in such an hour as they thought not, the son of man should come; and although he told them that the precise day and hour of his coming was unknown to man, and even to angels, yet he plainly and unequivocally says, "verily this generation shall NOT PASS till ALL these things be fulfilled." He tells his disciples the signs that should precede his coming, and the end of the world, so that they might come out from among the goats, and not partake of their plagues; and we find according to Josephus that not one Christian perished during these awful judgements and tribulations---for they by taking heed to the signs which he had foretold, by which they might know that it was nigh, even at the doors---escaped the awful desolation that came upon that wicked and wretched nation, the Jews. He commanded them to watch therefore, because they knew not the day or the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh; but which should take place during their life time!

Immediately after (not some thousand years after) the tribulation of those days, &c. the Saviour tells us emphatically, plainly, and explicitly that, "THEN shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in Heaven"---when? Why immediately after the tribulation of those days, &c.---and to make it the more plain, not to leave the possibility of any mistake, he says "THIS generation shall NOT PASS," &c. till they should see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of Heaven with great power and great glory. The disciples could not certainly have mistook his meaning---for he told them as plainly when these things should be fulfilled as was possible for him to have done. The Saviour in this chapter is speaking of troubles that should happen to that generation, such as were not known from the beginning of the world, NOR EVER SHOULD BE AGAIN. Now do we not accuse the Saviour of falsehood, when we say there will be greater troubles at some future period, than those which come upon Jerusalem? Admitting for the sake of argument, that the troubles spoken of in the 24th and 25th chapters do not refer to one and the same thing---admitting that the separation, &c. is yet to take place at some future period, we have the express declaration of the Saviour to prove that it cannot be so GREAT tribulation as that which was to come upon that generation to whom he was then speaking. If, sir, we admit your premises to be correct, I cannot perceive that it can avail you any thing, for if the Son of God did mean as he said, when he affirmed that the tribulation that was about to come, and that speedily---should be GREATER than ever was known before, or ever should be afterwards, it certainly must be a SORER judgement, than the visionary judgement of the imagination, which men in the plenitude of their wisdom have been pleased to call, "the last or final judgement." "The righteous are recompensed in THE EARTH; MUCH MORE the wicked and the sinner!" And the punishment, or recompense, or tribulation of which the Saviour speaks in Matthew, Mark and Luke, ALL refer to the earth; and were to take place IN THE EARTH! Else he would not have spoken of "mountains," "house tops," "fields" and "clothes!" He would not have talked to them of "winter" and "the Sabbath day," and "giving suck" if he had not been speaking of earth and earthly things!

Now I earnestly entreat you and all the brethren who differ from us, to reflect seriously and prayerfully on this all important subject--lest haply you should be found fighting against God. Let us take heed that we do not wrest the scriptures---that we do not alter, twist or bend them so as to meet our particular sentiment---ever remembering that those who are obliged to resort to this method to support their creed, are very much to be suspected. Therefore, when the Saviour tells us in the plainest possible manner that these troubles should come upon that generation, and the like should never again occur, let us not attempt to pervert his words, by saying greater troubles are yet to come. Next week I shall notice the parable itself more particularly, till when, I remain yours, &c.

BLUE LAWS REVISED.--The medical fraternity of Conn. have resolved not to visit any patient on Sunday--unless it shall appear that it is absolutely necessary.

We wonder Christians do not pass an edict to prevent the sunshine--the rain or the singing of birds on some particular days of the week! Strain at a gnat, &c.

"It is easy to run down sins we have no fancy for. Oh that those who throw a pall over the innocent pleasures of life, and give, in the eye of the young, to religion a dark and gloomy aspect, would learn some lessons of theology from the joyous light of the sun, and the merry carol of the birds!

The great thing is how we live, not how we die."

GREEK DONATIONS.--In Mr. Ballou's Society, in Boston, was collected for the relief of the Greeks $94 00; in Mr. Dean's $70 67; in Mr. Streeter's $52 24. In the Methodist Society $10 60.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

We have just received the first number of the "Day Star," published semi-monthly at Potsdam, N. Y. and devoted to the cause of God's impartial grace--its appearance is very respectable. We hope it may continue to shine brighter and brighter even unto the perfect day.

The Utica Intelligencer has been much improved--and will hereafter be conducted by Dolphus Skinner, pastor of the first Universalist Society in Utica.

The Olive Branch, which takes the place of the New-York Herald, is published weekly, in the quarto form, and bids fair to be highly useful in the holy cause of God's goodness.

A prospectus is issued at Cincinnati, for publishing a monthly Magazine, entitled the "Lamp of Liberty," to be edited by our worthy brother Sargent.

Another is about to be established at Eaton, Ohio, to be entitled "the Star in the West," to be published by Samuel Tizzard. Verily these are days of visitation.

The "Albany Christian Register," has come to hand--very neat in appearance---printed on good paper and handsome type.

FEMALE PREACHERS.

"Phæbe," versus T. F.

We have received a communication through the medium of the post office signed Phæbe---it comes in such a "questionable shape" however, that we are inclined to think it a forgery---a counterfeit Phæbe; because instead of satin slippers, it comes clattering in a huge pair of cow hides. We therefore, having resolved ourselves into a committee of the whole, T. F. in the chair---voted, unanimously, that Phæbe have leave to withdraw his petition.

Believe nothing against another, but upon good authority; nor report what may hurt another unless it be a greater hurt to others to conceal it.---Penn's Works.

HAPPY IMMORTALITY.

There is a bright sublimity that, blends.

In glorious union with the happy hope
Of living blest and pure, when nature bends

Beneath the weight of years, and from the scope
Of the far heavens the stars beam faintly o'er
The loveliness of time's deserted shore.

Even if it were a day-dream of the soul,

It comes so sweetly o'er the many woes,
That linger round us here, its kind controul

So soothes the wounded spirit to repose,
That we would love to cherish it, and twine
Our last hopes with prospects so divine.

LETTER NO. 3.

In this communication I shall call your attention to a brief recapitulation of the reasons why we do not believe, that the parable now under consideration, refers to a future state of existence, or the "everlasting punishment" therein mentioned to endless misery. And 1. The separation spoken of between the sheep and goats was to take place "When the Son of man should come in his glory, with all the holy angels with him;" and he told us in the plainest language possible that this should positively take place in the life time of some of his disciples; for proof see Matt. xxii. 36—Matt. xxiv. 14 to 35, Mark xii. 30 31. Luke ix. 26 27. Matt xvi. 27, 28; Mark viii. 38, and ix. 1; Luke xxi. 32, 33; Luke xxii. 18. Matt. xxvi. 64. Here we are NINE TIMES told in the most positive manner that this coming should be during the natural lives of those present.—There is no condition in the case; no why; but; or wherefore; of any sort or kind; but the plainest and most positive declarations of the Son of God that THAT generation to whom he was then speaking should not pass till ALL these things were done. "All these things SHALL (not may) come upon THIS generation!" Not upon a generation then unborn.

2. The end of the world spoken of cannot possibly refer to the end of time, but refers to the end of that world, in which the Saviour came. See Heb. ix. 26; 1st Cor. x. 11. The word which is here translated 'world' is allowed by Dr. Clarke and most (if not all) other commentators to mean age, or dispensation. Christ came in the end of the legal dispensation or world, to fulfil or take it away, and to establish the kingdom of Heaven; and he tells his disciples "that this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and THEN shall the end come. This Paul tells us was done in his time; for he says their faith was spoken of throughout the whole world.

3. The Saviour tells the High Priest Matt. xxvi. 64 that he himself (not his successor) should see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven; he tells the Revelator that he should come quickly---not some countless years afterwards. He tells his disciples that his coming should be like the lightning that cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west; now how many hundred years does it take for a flash of lightning to come out of the east and shine to the west? He moreover says to his disciples (his sheep or little flock) "that it was the Father's good pleasure to give to them the kingdom." See also Luke xxii. 29, 30 "and I appoint unto you (little flock of sheep) a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom," &c. Now to ascertain where they should receive this kingdom---the time when they should hear their Lord and master saying, "come ye blessed of my Father inherit the kingdom prepared for you" &c. We have only to turn to Mark ix. 1; Luke xxi. 31; Matt. xvi. 27 28, where the Saviour tells us the precise time, not the day or hour. "Verily, I say unto you, there are some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom!" "Verily I say unto you that there be some of them that stand here which shall not taste death till they have seen the Kingdom of God come with power." Could he have used more positive, plain; and definite language? Is it in the power of words to express any thing more clear and absolutely? The Saviour says to Peter "if I will that he (John) tarry TILL I COME, what is that to thee?" Can we suppose that John has not tasted death till this time? No it is impossible. I wish never to be too absolute in my positions, arrogance and dogmatism I abhor; yet I must with all humility declare, that I cannot, DARE NOT disbelieve the words of the Saviour, when he so often repeats the same language. If we believe his words we must be constrained to admit that the little flock received their kingdom on the day of pentecost---and that 'these things, were all fulfilled in the time of that generation according to his numerous and unconditional declarations.

4. I am constrained to believe that all 'these things' referred to this present, and not to a future state of existence; because the Saviour speaks of "house tops" "fields" "clothes," "famines," "earthquakes," and "pestilence" &c. which could only refer to temporal things and not to a state of immortality beyond the grave. And secondly I am constrained to believe that this everlasting punishment or correction or chastisement must come upon the Jews and upon them alone because the Gentiles were NEVER threatened with any CONDEMNATION at all! Find the place where they to whom the gospel was preached, were ever threatened with hell torment, and I will yield the argument and never open my mouth on the subject again. The 'eternal hell' which our ministers say so much about is not to be found in the bible; they speak a vision of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord; for St. Paul affirms that he declared the whole counsel of God, and the word gehenna is not once to be found in his writings. Therefore those who declare so much more than the apostle, ought to stop and inquire whether they have so learned of Christ; lest perchance they should be found teaching for doctrine the commandments of men.

5 I think we cannot but be satisfied that these were temporal calamities when we read in Matt. xxiv. 29 that the sun should be darkened, and the moon not give her light, the stars should fall from heaven, and the power of heaven should be shaken. Similar figures are frequently used in the scriptures to represent the sore judgements that were about to come upon some city or nation. See destruction of Babylon Isa. xiii. 9, 10. "Behold the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate: and he shall destroy the sinners out of it. For the stars of heaven, and the constellations thereof, shall not give their light, the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine." See also the calamities that were about to come upon Idumea, Isa. xxxiv. 4, "And all the hosts of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together like a scroll: and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree." Again speaking of the destruction of Egypt Ezekiel xxxiii. 7, 8, "And when I shall put thee out I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dark; I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light. All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee and set darkness upon thy land, saith the Lord God." The prophet Joel when speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem uses almost precisely the same words of the other prophets, chap. ii. 28, 31, "And it shall come to pass &c. and I will shew wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood and fire, and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come."—And this prediction Peter declares on the day of pentecost, to be then fulfilling. See Acts ii. 16. Here we find that this mode of expression "the sun should be darkened" &c. was used to represent the destruction of cities and kingdoms—that the Saviour uses the language common among the Jews Matt. xxiv. 29 by which he intended to represent to them the desolation that awaited their devoted city.—The prophets which they read every Sabbath day had frequently, as we have seen, used the same language to denote some temporal judgement and the Saviour uses almost the same expressions when he speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem. "Then (after these signs) shall appear the sign of the Son man in heaven, &c. coming in the clouds of heaven with great power, and glory." "THEN" not a thousand years afterwards "THIS generation shall not pass till (what?) ALL these things be fulfilled—Heaven and earth shall pass away but my words SHALL NOT pass away." And yet notwithstanding all these plain and unequivocal declarations, we allow education and prejudice to lead us passively along the mazy labyrinth of error—and say "these things" are not fulfilled even now, and perhaps may not be for eighteen hundred years to come.

I wish to inquire, admitting this parable to refer to our unregenerated wicked neighbours, what were the crimes of which they were accused, that they should thus deserve to be burnt as long as God reigns in Heaven. Were they murderers? No. Were they thieves, robbers, and assassins? No. Had they not "scattered fire brands, arrows, and death"—had they not laid waste cities, towns and countries? No. Well, tell us what they were guilty of doing; NOTHING!!! It was because they had neglected to administer to the wants of their fellow men; this was the head and front of their offending, nothing more, nothing less. Now, sir, what ground will you take—will you say this "everlasting punishment" means an endless hell, that shall burn as long as God is good? well I grant this—then I wish to inquire something respecting an attribute of God, of which you and limitarians generally, profess to know so much—I mean HIS JUSTICE! In Luke xix. 42, we read thus, "If thou hadst known, even thou, (goats) at least in this thy day, the things which belong to thy peace; but now they are hid from their eyes." Hid, who hid them from their eyes? Turn to John xii. 40 and there we find an answer—"He (God) hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts, that they should NOT see with their eyes, nor understand with their hearts and be converted, and I should heal them." (See also Acts xxviii. 27, Mat. xiii. 14, 15, Mark iv. 11, 12, &c.) Now, sir, I again ask what ground you will take? will you say with Dr. Emmon's, "that God himself is the immediate author of the sins of the Reprobate; causes them to sin, and then condemns them for sinning." Will you take this ground? However this idea may shock you, your premises will lead to this conclusion. You recollect that you laboured hard to prove that this "everlasting fire or punishment" into which they were to be cast was endless in its duration! Well now we are told by John as plainly and unequivocally as in the power of language to express, that God himself BLINDED THEIR EYES and HARDENED their hearts, on purpose that they might not see! On purpose that they might go to THIS ENDLESS HELL!

You cannot say they were free agents; to say that a blind man is at perfect liberty to see or not to see is a solecism, a gross outrage upon our understanding! Allowing your premises to be correct that this "everlasting punishment" into which the blind goats, were to be cast, means ENDLESS MISERY. I ask you where is the JUSTICE of their creator? First force them into existence without their knowledge or consent—then blind their eyes; and then damn them because they could not see! First harden their hearts and then because they COULD NOT understand, send them to a place of interminable horror and despair! And is it thus we would represent our Heavenly Benefactor whose tender mercies are over all his works? Shall we thus liken him to a demon, or hyena thirsting for blood? Shall we accuse our Saviour of hypocrisy when he wept over Jerusalem in prospect of the awful judgements that were to come upon that generation—shall we say he was hypocritical, and that his tears were crocodile tears? No, perish such a thought, let it be forever annihilated!

6. We think that no one who reads the xxiv and xxv chapters candidly and prayerfully, can doubt for a moment that they refer to one and the same event; more especially when he reflects that there was formerly no division of chapters and verses, but that this was the work of the translators. We read Matt. xxvi. 1, "And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished all these sayings"—all what sayings? To what does he refer? To answer this, we must begin at the xxiv chapter and follow him thro' the xxv which finishes "all these sayings," and we find not the least intimation that he had changed his subject, but that "all these sayings," referred to one and the same event.

7. We should recollect that "ALL these sayings," were spoken to his disciples ONLY—and that too PRIVATELY, on the Mount of Olives, therefore the Jews at large did not know "the signs of his coming, and the end of the world." The Saviour commands his disciples Matt. x. 27, "What I tell you in darkness that speak ye in the light; and what ye hear in the ear, that preach upon the house tops." Will you point out the place where one of them ever mentioned an "Eternal Hell?" Will you show me where one of them ever mentions a hell in eternity? Now why did they not preach "hell and damnation, fire and brimstone" if the Saviour taught it in the xxv. of Matthew?—Were they faithful—did they proclaim eternal death and despair to poor sinners? Oh no, for they had not so learned of Christ. They had learned of him that those who were raised from the dead COULD NOT DIE ANY MORE.—But were equal to the angels and were the children of God being the children of the RESURRECTION! (See Luke xx. 35; also 1 Cor. xv. 42 to 57.) The disciples knew as every rational being must, that "life and mortality" CANNOT suffer pain!

8. You laboured hard to prove that the "everlasting fire" was a hell in another state of existence, and would burn as long as God is good. Now my brother will you tell me how many "unquenchable fires" there are? "Our God is a consuming fire," now will you say there are two Gods, and both consuming fires? If not the fire here spoken of must refer to this, and not to a future state of existence. He (God) was to sit as a refiner's fire—for what purpose? That he might purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver. Why? That they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness! Not that they might be damned! (see Mal. iii. 3.) In Amos i. 4, 7, 10, 12, 14—ii. 2, 5; fire is mentioned no less than seven times to represent the temporal destruction that was to come upon the several nations there spoken of; ii. 5, it is said, "I will send a fire upon Judah, and it shall devour the places of Jerusalem;" but not a word about a future hell. See Isaiah xxxi. 9, "whose fire is in Zion (not in a future state) and his furnace in Jerusalem," (not in eternity.) Paul tells us, i. Cor. iii. 13—15, that this fire "shall try EVERY MAN's work of what sort it is; if any man's work shall be burnt; he shall suffer loss; but he himself SHALL BE SAVED." You say he shall be damned!

9. "The cursed" spoken of in this parable were the unbelieving Jews who had made void the law by their traditions; for "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all the things which are written in the book of the law to do them," (Gal. iii. 10) see also John vii. 49, "This people who knoweth not the law are cursed." Jesus Christ was once accursed but he now sitteth at the right hand of God.

10. The word which is rendered "punishment" in this place should be rendered correction or chastisement. The Greek word is kolâsin and signifies correction, chastening, amendment, chastisement, &c. The Jews were to go away from Jerusalem, their city destroyed as a judgement upon them for their manifold transgressions. Jesus tells them that all the righteous blood that had been shed, should be required of that generation. I know that you laboured hard to prove that this punishment must be endless because the qualifying word everlasting was prefixed. I have not time or space at present to notice the various significations attached to the word, but shall do so when examining some other texts quoted by you in proof of the eternity of hell torments. I have only time now to remark, that the land of Canaan was to be for an everlasting possession—the everlasting hills—the everlasting doors—the everlasting priest—hood---everlasting covenant---an everlasting statute---each and all of which have long since come to an end.

11. That this punishment or correction could not mean endless punishment, we infer from the JUSTICE of God; for this according to our conceptions of justice would not be rewarding according to our work; it would not be meteing out to us the SAME measure we have meted to others; for we never have meted out endless damnation to any one. God corrects and chastises to reform, not to make his children worse. Paul tells us that ALL are partakers of this chastening; and though for the present it is not joyous but grievous, yet it will hereafter yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them who are exercised thereby. God chastens us for our profit that we may be made partakers of his holiness.

12. This punishment could not mean endless misery, because it is contrary to what God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. God once preached the gospel to Abraham and he said nothing about hell and damnation! But said, "In thee and in thy seed (Christ) shall ALL nations, kindreds, and families of the earth be blessed. Now friend Light, show me the being in the Universe of God, however degraded he may be, who has no nation, nor ever had! Show me the outcast who has no family, nor ever had; the wretch who has no kindred and who never had; and then you may dispute the doctrine of Universal Salvation! I will then acknowledge he may be, endlessly miserable. But ALL whoever they may be, who ever had either nation, kindred, family, or tongue are included in the glorious promise made to Abraham. St. Paul tells us what the blessing is, "That as in Adam all die, (I care not what death) even so IN CHRIST shall ALL be made alive."

Hoping that you will soon learn that "God is the Saviour of ALL MEN."

I remain yours, &c.

TEXT.

"A passing remark.—If the doctrine of eternal punishment, after death, has a tendency to "blunt the tender sensibilities of our nature, and make men worse instead of better," as advanced by the editors of the Gospel Advocate, will they be kind enough to inform "the whole world" why the three Thayers, who were executed in their neighbourhood, for the murder of Love, should on the gallows, have dated their misfortunes to the belief of a "pernicious" and soul-destroying doctrine. Perhaps they were exceptions to the general rule."

COMMENT.

The above we copy from the "Albany Christian Register," of the 9th instant. The Register is a new paper, and the "passing remark," is found in the fourth number of the 1st volume. The editor's name does not appear in his paper, that we can find, but we will readily inform him and the whole world, according to request, that the three Thayers did not state, upon the gallows, that their misfortunes were caused by a belief of a pernicious and soul-destroying doctrine, nor any thing, in any way resembling such statement. Our friend, the editor of the Register, we apprehend is young in his vocation, and we must therefore bear with him. The person who made this statement, upon the gallows, was, unluckily for the argument of the Register editor, a believer, and a most staunch one too, in the doctrine of endless damnation, in its fullest sense! The story was told, on the gallows by "the Rev. Mr. FILLMORE," a presiding elder in the Methodist church. The statement was "that the three Thayers were inclined to universalism, and that their Father had been a Universalist twenty years," the whole of which was entirely false, and without any foundation in truth!! So much for the story of the three Thayers. And now we will say to the editor of the Register, as was said upon another occasion, "read, you unlearned reader, read" and you will in future, escape such foolish blunders. You will recollect that you have requested us to inform "the whole world" upon this subject, and you will see that by so doing you oblige yourself to receive our testimony. This being the fact, we will refer you to the third volume of this work, where, at page 90 you will find the story of the Rev. calumniator first denied, and at each of the following pages, namely, 205, 221, 230, and 246, you will find it distinctly repeated, and the name of a respectable Episcopal clergyman given who stood ready to prove it false; and in addition to all this, you will also find it stated, clearly, that Mr. Fillmore knew, at the time, that the Thayers were not inclined to Universalism, but that they knew nothing about it. They all often said they never heard any preaching except by those who taught a belief in endless damnation. So much for the influence of the doctrine of eternal punishment, which we have often said, and still say, "blunts the tender sensibilities of our nature, and makes men worse instead of better." Had the editor of the Register known that this whole story was a falsehood, and the work of a preacher of endless damnation, told to stop the progress of liberal sentiments, he would hardly have given us this additional occasion to show, at his expense, the evil effects of the limitarian doctrine. "Perhaps" the editor of the Register is an "exception to the general rule," but he will find, if he pursue his present vocation, that he must take some means of knowing the truth of orthodox stories of this nature before he makes use of them against us, or he will often find himself in his present unpleasant situation.

For the accommodation of the editor of the Register, and of the whole world, we will here assemble a few cases of the effects of the orthodox faith, in addition to the one above, and then dismiss the subject. These we shall copy from files of papers before us, omitting most of the dates and particulars to save room.

Mrs. Coon, of Halfmoon, Saratoga co. cut her throat with a razor, under a belief that she had partaken, unworthily, of the eucharist, by which she was doomed to an endless hell. She was a member of the Presbyterian church, a new convert.

Mr. Owen, of Stillwater, one mile and a half from Mrs. Coop's residence, hanged himself, under the same impressions as Mrs. C. Member of the Baptist church.

Mr. S. Bond, Raleigh, N. C. cut his throat with a razor, despairing of God's mercy. Baptist, in good standing, and highly respectable. Left a widow and four children.

Percis Hall, Lebanon, N. H. death by taking opium, under a belief that she had committed the unpardonable sin. Not a member of any church.

FROM THE RELIGIOUS INQUIRER.

"A Mr. Potter, of Lebanon N. H. after preaching the doctrine of eternal damnation about 50 years in that town, hanged himself.— A Mr. John Hill, an Arminian denouncer of eternal wrath in Seekonk, Mass. hanged himself about 10 years since. His character was good. A Mr. Wheeler a Methodist exhorter and class leader in Rehoboth, Mass. cut his throat about 18 years since. His character was fair. A Mr. Perkins, of Lisbon, Con. member of a Calvinistick church cut his throat some years since under the impression, that Christ had died for him, and that he ought to die for Christ. Mrs. Mary Carey, of West Brookfield, Mass. a member of a Calvinistick church committed suicide by hanging. She seemingly conducted in the most deliberate manner, for she swept and closed her house, laid out her grave clothes on the bed, carried back the hammer after she had driven the nails into the beam, and suspended herself in the cellar, with a cord she had made for the purpose. She was about 24 years of age. Her sister, Mrs. Sarah Spear, member of the same church, hanged herself in a shed, on the Sabbath, about two years since. She also resided in West Brookfield, and was about 30 years of age. A deacon Bourne, of Middleborough Mass. hanged himself some fifteen years since. He was sent through the parish to exhort and pray with his people, or went at his own instance on this business, and was accused to the Calvinistick church of which he was deacon, of criminal intimacy with his female converts. He went home on Saturday in great distress, for his case was to be tried on the next day, slept little through the night, but groaned and wrung his hands, and in the morning, when his wife went out, she found him hanging on an apple-tree. Rev. J. Leonard, a Calvinistick minister of Woodstock, Con. and chaplain to Gen. Washington, cut his throat with a razor. John Cadwell, Sheriff of Worcester county, and member of a Calvinistick church, committed suicide by jumping into a well. Deacon John Hall of Ellington, Con. Calvinist, hanged himself with a bridle. J. How and David Curtis, members of the Calvinistick church, in Sturbridge, Mass. hanged themselves with a rope. Jonathan Kentfield, of Belchertown, Mass. member of the Calvinistick church, cut his throat with a jack-knife. Ethen Drake, of the same town and faith, hanged himself. The following Calvinistick church members hanged themselves; John Dickenson, of Granby, Mass. Deacon Chafey of Ashford, Con. west parish; Asher Bartlett and Ebenezer Tucker of Springfield; the widow Sabra Scott of Palmer, and Benjamin Humiston, of West Springfield.— Humiston had been a member of the Baptist church about ten years, was thought to live in the enjoyment of religion, and in the cherishment of a good hope, till within a few years.— He told a neighbour that he had committed the unpardonable sin, though he had professed religion for some time, and it is presumed he ended his life through indulging this awful belief. He hanged himself Oct. 21, 1825, and Leonard perpetrated his bloody work, Dec. 14, 1825, in the same town, though in another parish. Dr. Marble of Springfield, member of the Calvinistick church, drowned himself about twenty years since in a well. Miss Abigail Buell of Hebron, Andover parish, Con. hanged herself to her loom with a skein of yarn, about fifteen years since. She was about 30 years of age, of fair character, member of a Calvinistick church, and aunt of the preacher, Phineas Moody of Somers, Con. killed his wife and child, ten or twelve months old, with an axe, literally cut off the child's head, went up stairs and chopped his wife's niece in pieces, and then cut his throat with a shoe-knife. He was a member of the Calvinistick church, and it is believed leader of the singing.

So much for the murders, and now of other crimes. Did the idea of future punishment restrain Hooper Cuming from Drunkenness; or Joseph Crawford, a Methodist preacher, from seducing a girl he had taken to bring up, or, subsequently, did it restrain him from forgery, in New-York; or Eliza Sayre, of Philadelphia, member of a Calvinistick church, from fabricating the well known story "a voice from the Grave," to the truth of which she even swore, and was afterwards detected, when she owned it all a forgery? How stood the case upon an examination of the New-York state prison, at N. Y. upon a recent occasion? There were found in the prison, 623 convicts, and not a soul of them all that believed in the doctrine of Universal Salvation! We rest here, as the lawyers say, but will continue the catalogue whenever the editor of the Register shall deem it necessary for the good of his faith. A.

THE BIBLE.

Sir William Jones, the eminent and learned Chief Justice of Calcutta, is said to have understood 28 languages. As an Oriental scholar he was unrivalled, as a Christian, devout and sincere. At the end of his bible he wrote the following note: "I have regularly and attentively read the Holy Scriptures, and I am of opinion that this volume, independently of its divine origin, contains more true sublimity, more exquisite beauty, more pure morality, more important history, and finer strains of poetry and eloquence, than can be collected from all other books, in whatever age or language they may have been composed. Prov. Tel.

ADVOCATE AND INVESTIGATOR.

MR. OWEN AND THE EMPORIUM.

We find it stated in the "Buffalo Emporium" of Monday last, "that Mr. Owen, has at length abandoned his 'Community System' and returned to Scotland." From what source the editors of the Emporium have derived their information we are unable to say, but of one thing we are quite confident—their statement is partly incorrect. We have not the least inclination to engage in a controversy upon the subject with the respected editors of the Emporium—we have other matters which we think of more consequence, that have claims upon our attention. But when misrepresentations are promulgated with an evident design to calumniate, we shall venture to expose them.

Mr. Owen has not abandoned his community system—the assertions of the editors of the Emporium to the contrary notwithstanding! and if they will call on the editor of this paper he will convince them of the fact. That he has gone to Scotland is true, and that he has been there before, and returned is no less true; but so far from this fact being an evidence that he has abandoned his system, it only proves, that for the want of any thing else, his enemies have pressed it into their service for an unjustifiable and reprehensible purpose.

As the gentlemen of the Emporium would "like to know what has become of the project to establish a similar community at Williamsville, on the same infidel principles," we will cheerfully give them all the information in our power. First, then, no project ever existed to establish a community on "infidel principles" at Williamsville, or at any other place in this region; and the very reason that the project of forming a community was abandoned for the time being, was, that false statements had been made by interested bigots relative to the god-like principles on which communities of that kind must be established in order to be permanent and beneficial. We pity the man who is so contracted in his views and feelings that he is unable to discriminate between the principles of Mr. Owen and those of others who are friendly to similar institutions;—we repeat, we pity the man who is so narrow in his feelings as wantonly to insinuate that those who are friendly to a community of common interests, calculated to bring into practical operation all the sublime virtues of christianity, are "infidels" merely because the philanthropick Robert Owen disbelieves in the crude dogmas of modern orthodoxy. That there was an attempt made to convince the publick of the utility of an institution similar to those established by Mr. Owen, is a fact which we are proud to acknowledge; and that such attempt was successful to no small extent, is witnessed by the convictions of hundreds in this town; but the insinuation that those who approbated, and who still approbate such a community as was then proposed, embraced the religious opinions of Mr. Owen, is tinctured with the deep malignity of a depraved heart, and is deserving of the contempt of every liberal and philanthropick soul. Second; in farther reply to their inquiry it may be proper to state that the project of forming a community of common interests on the divine principles of the gospel of God's impartial love and benevolence is yet in the heart of at least one humble individual, and we believe, in the hearts of thousands of our most enlightened and respectable fellow-citizens. When the project will be carried into operation, is not known; but, when bigotry, superstition, and selfishness, shall be subdued by the prevalence of divine charity and benevolence—when that infidelity, which in nine cases out of ten has been occasioned by the erroneous construction put upon the scriptures by limitarians, shall be done away by the mild and peaceful gospel of the blessed God—and, when the devotees at the shrine of calvinistick intolerance shall be found reeling in "portentious darkness" (to use the language of a celebrated scholar of the nineteenth century) or forgotten forever—then, we predict, social systems of the kind we approbate and admire, will rise from the ruins of error, and, embracing all that is holy, amiable, good, and virtuous on earth, will introduce the blissful day when the Lion and the Lamb shall lie down together and righteousness and peace shall kiss each other.—Ed.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

"The Central Association of Universalists" convened in annual session, at Hamilton, Madison co. N. Y. on Wednesday, June 6th. Fifteen ministering brethren were present on the interesting occasion, and a large and highly respectable concourse of people assembled, and by so doing evinced their faithfulness in the cause of truth. Five discourses were delivered; one by brother I. Whittall—one by brother D. Skinner—one by the editor of this paper—one by brother W. I. Reese—and one by Br. S. R. Smith. A lively interest was taken in the publick exercises, and the truth apparently received into good and honest hearts. The spiritual festivities of the occasion were of a description calculated to impress the mind with a sense of the truth that the grace of God, that bringeth salvation to all men teaches—effectually teaches that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world.

We cannot pass over this subject without advertising to one fact, not because it is at all singular, but because it is a demonstration of the salutary influences of our faith, and shows how much we, as a body of professing christians, are misrepresented by our adversaries. How often do we hear of the licentiousness of our doctrine, and of its evil tendency upon the morals of community! None have been more zealous in propagating such an idea than our Methodist brethren. With how much truth and propriety they accuse us, will appear from the following facts.

There were probably from twelve to fourteen hundred persons present at the association; for whose comfort every thing was provided that could be desired. A publick house was opened for the accommodation of as many as could be entertained, and each person had free access to the bar without any other restraints than those imposed by a religious sense of duty and propriety. What next? Did they get drunk, and fight, and curse, and swear? Did it become necessary to send for the officers of justice, to keep the peace? We think not! In all the number there assembled, licentious and irreligious as Universalists are, not once—no not one case of that kind occurred! Hear it, ye revilers, and wonder, and perish! Nothing can be more gratifying than such perfect order and harmony as existed among them; and the circumspection, and sobriety of so large an assembly is but the same delightful state of things which we have uniformly witnessed on all such occasions. This, when contrasted with the camp-meetings of our Methodist brethren, leaves a fearful balance against them. With all their preaching of hell and damnation; with all their fears, and hopes, to restrain them, they are often compelled to resort to the civil law to controul the motley multitude and keep even themselves within due bounds.

The subject of a Convention was agitated in the Council, and the great anxiety of some to have one constituted by delegates appointed from the respective Associations, led to some unhappy feelings, which resulted in the withdrawal of three of our respected brethren in the ministry from the fellowship of the association. As we design to present our views on the subject in some future number, we add no more at this time.—Ed.

NEW ARRANGEMENT.

We deem it expedient to announce to our numerous patrons and the publick, that our esteemed brother Fisk, heretofore one of the editors and proprietors of this paper, has relinquished his right in the concern; and that it is now in the hands of the subscribers. All persons having demands against the establishment are respectfully requested to present them to either of us for adjustment, and all debts due for the Advocate must be paid to us or our agents.

L. S. EVERETT,
G. TUTTLE.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

Another number will complete the first six months of the present volume; and according to the terms of our subscription, those who do not forward two dollars within that time, will be subjected to an extra charge of fifty cents. To show that we are disposed to grant every reasonable indulgence, we now offer, to all those who have not yet paid, to receive the amount of two dollars without subjecting them to the expense of postage, if within this time and the fourth of July next, they will forward the same to "J. Guiteau, Esq. P. M. Buffalo, N. Y." The reasonableness of this offer will be apparent when it is known that it costs us a certain per cent on all sums transmitted through this medium, and saves our patrons a tax for postage of no inconsiderable amount.

Our agents who have, by our consent, extended the time of paying in advance to those whose names have been forwarded through their means, are respectfully desired to inform our subscribers that the great expense of the establishment renders it almost impossible, and altogether inconvenient to have such indulgence extended longer than until the fourth of July next. A final settlement of all our concerns being quite desirable, it is hoped that an effort will be made by all our respected patrons and friends to aid us in accomplishing so laudable an object. The sum to each individual is quite inconsiderable, while to us, the amount due from all is quite important.

Subscribers in Buffalo village who have not yet paid for the volume, are earnestly desired to settle the same with either of the publishers, or Mr. H. A. Salisbury, who is duly authorised to receive the same.

Those of our subscribers who reside in the village of Black-Rock, are respectfully requested to pay their arrearages to S. H. Salisbury, whose receipt for the same will be valid; or if more convenient, to the publishers.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Having but recently returned from a tour to the east, we have not sufficient time this week to attend to the communications of our friends, but shall give them all due consideration ere long.

Our ministering brethren are most earnestly and affectionately entreated to favour us with dissertations on any of those subjects which may be interesting to our readers. "Brethren, think of these things."

AGENTS.

The following gentlemen have been duly appointed agents in addition to others before published, for the Gospel Advocate; and are authorised to transact business with subscribers, who will please make remittances through them.

ANECDOTE.

A gentleman in describing Hopkinsian or Calvinistick oratory, has said "they address a congregation of sober minded christians as if they were an assembly of heathen, or a band of thieves or murderers. Their doctrine descends not like the dew, but like a hail storm. Their voice is not gentle and affectionate, but loud and reproachful, it rolls like thunder and roars like a whirlwind. They paint the character of a virtuous man with blacker strokes of depravity, than those with which Milton has drawn the character of Satan, and they represent the Supreme Being as hating the works of his own hands, as fired with anger and armed with vengeance."—Christ Int.

MISERY.

A thousand miseries make silent and invisible inroads on mankind; and the heart feels innumerable throbs, which never breathe out into complaint. Perhaps, likewise, our pleasures are for the most part equally secret; and most are borne up by some private satisfaction, some internal consciousness, some latent hope, some peculiar prospect, which they never communicate, but reserve for solitary hours, and clandestine meditation. The man of life is indeed composed of small incidents, and petty occurrences; of wishes for objects not remote and grief for disappointments of no fatal consequences; of insect vexations, which sting us and fly away; impertinences which buzz awhile around us, and are heard no more; of meteorous pleasures, which dance before us, and are dissipated; of compliments which glide off the soul like other music, and are forgotten by him that gave, and him that received.—Johnson.

POETICAL DEPARTMENT.

WHERE IS GOD?

Where is He? He rides on the fierce rushing blast—
And directs by his will its wild fury and might;
Whole forests before him in ruins are cast,
And the earth is obscured by the shadows of night.

Where is he? He dwells in the sweet blooming flower,
And is heard in the murmur of each silvery rill;
On the cloud crested mountain He rests in his power,
And He dwells in the valley so shady and still.

Where is He? O! hark to the thunder's loud crash!
'Tis his Voice as He speaks in his terrible wrath;
And His form may be seen in the lightning's bright flash,
Which still marks with consuming destruction its path.

Where is he? He shines in the sun's sultry ray,
And sparkles at night in the blue vault of Heaven;
He is seen in the glittering of morn's dewy spray;
In the chill fleecy snow by the winter's wind driven.

Where is he? Go ask of the dark stormy wave
Which rears its white crest o'er the measureless deep,
As it sullenly roars o'er the mariner's grave,
Or gapes widely to bury new victims in sleep.

Where is He? Go search the wide regions of space,
And roam through the bright countless planets on high;
For his power and his presence pervade every space,
From the dark ocean cave to the azure-arched sky.

Where is He? Go ask of His mercy and love.
Who created this world in its beauty for thee;
And for thee hast provided a mansion above,
Where thy soul to its bliss everlasting can flee.

IS THIS A TIME TO BE CLOUDY AND SAD.

Is this a time to be cloudy and sad,
When our mother nature laughs around—
When even the deep blue heavens look glad,
And gladness breathes from the blossoming ground—
There are notes of joy from the hang-bird and wren,
And the gossips of swallows through all the sky—
The ground-squirrel gaily chirps by his den,
And the wilding bee hums merrily by.

The clouds are at play in the azure space,
And their shadows at play on the bright green vale—

And here they stretch to the frolic chase,
And there they roll on the easy gale.
There's a dance of leaves in that aspen bower—
There's a titter of wind in that beechen tree—
There's a smile on the fruit—and a smile on the flower
And a laugh from the brook that runs to the sea.
And look at the broad-faced sun, how he smiles
On the dewy earth that smiles in his ray,
On the leaping waters and gay young isles—
Ay, look—and he'll smile thy gloom away.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

LETTER NO. 1.

To Elder JOSEPH BADGER, of Mendon, Monroe, co. N. Y.

SIR—I offer no apology for the liberty assumed in addressing you in this publick manner, as the matters I shall bring under notice were conducted publickly. It is not on account of any importance which I attach to your person or character, your erudition or your talents, that I notice this subject—no; were there no other inducement your name might repose in the unvisited shades of forgetfulness. But I am prompted by the apparent consequence which some individuals attach to your performance on the 27th ult. at the Union Meeting House, in this town. I was not present on the occasion, nor do I care to inquire, at present, into the particular arguments employed by you at that time. If I have been correctly informed, some time previous, you gave notice, that on the day above mentioned, you would give three reasons, why you were not an Universalist. It is with these reasons only, with which, at present, I have any concern. In due time, I shall notice the text you assumed on that occasion. If my informant was not mistaken, your reasons were the following :

“1st. Universalism is repugnant to the sound principles of reasoning.

“2d. It is contrary to the word of God.

“3d. It produces no revivals of religion, and, moreover they are spoken against by the order.”

I have given your reasons, with the exception of one word, under the sanction of my informant. Before you can be prepared to pronounce the belief of Universalists “repugnant to the sound principles of reasoning,” you should know what the sentiment is, and state it fairly and impartially, that the auditors may judge what is, and what is not, reasonable. But, perhaps, you understood the system of doctrine you undertook to refute. If you did, so much the greater is your culpability. But, that the publick may know what you have called “repugnant to the sound principles of reasoning,” I will here give a brief statement of our sentiments.

1st. We believe in one God, “gracious and merciful,” infinite in every holy attribute, and possessing every possible perfection, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and “of the spirits of all flesh.”

2d. We believe in the Messiah, the anointed of God, “the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time.” And, that, for his obedience “God has highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of those in heaven, of those in earth, and those under the earth, and that every tongue should confess, that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.”

3d. We believe, that God, our Creator, has made us accountable beings, and, that we all shall be punished according to our sins, and rewarded according to our virtues.

4th. We believe, that, as we are accountable for our conduct, in proportion to our knowledge of right and wrong, it is our duty to “cease to do evil and learn to do well.”

5th. We believe, that the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a revelation of the will and purposes of God, and of the duty, interest and final destiny of all men; and that their excellent instructions “are able to make us wise unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus.”

6th. We believe, that no one can be happy, here or hereafter, without holiness; and that we shall be saved from sin and every pollution.

7th. We believe, that no one can attain to future life by his own works, but only by the power of the resurrection; without which, we believe the most exalted saint on earth is unfit for heaven—That then, our vile bodies shall be changed, and fashioned like the glorious body of Christ, “according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.”

I shall not here undertake a vindication of the foregoing expression of our belief, from scripture, as this is allied to your second proposition. My inquiry here shall be, is it “repugnant to the sound principles of reasoning?” But here you may assume to be the sole judge of what constitutes “the principles of sound reasoning.” I should like to see a specimen.

You will allow I presume, that to reason soundly means no more in this case, than “to argue rationally, to deduce consequences justly from premises.” And admitting the premi- ses just that our heavenly Father is infinitely wise powerful and good, is it "deducing consequences justly from premises" to say that he has any where conferred an existence which shall be a perpetual curse to the possessor?—that a gift from God should be the means of perpetuating wretchedness? You may say, you no more believe, that God perpetuates pain than I do. But "the sound principles of reasoning" will not afford you a shelter in this case. For if God has given men an agency, and that agency and the abuse of it (for he could not have abused it had he not received it) constitute the approximate cause of ceaseless wo, then God, the giver of such agency, on "the sound principles of reasoning," must be the original, remote or moving cause. And I consider it, not only unreasonable, but impious, nay blasphemous, to tax the Almighty, who commends his love to sinners with the horrid deed! Look at this subject, Mr. Badger, if possible, with eyes unjauniced by prejudices. What a shade it casts over the amiable and inviting character of our Father in heaven!—What gloom and horror fill the mind under this impression! What anguish fills every philanthropic breast that heaves a sigh for the fate of irrecoverably ruined man! What ardour in every sainted mind of every order of christians, that holiness and happiness may universally prevail! and how like the disposition of heaven, where there is joy at the repentance of a sinner! Will the character of the heavenly hosts be so changed as to fit them to rejoice at the impenitence and wo of man? The thought is too horrid!

From the creation to the days of our Lord, comparatively few of mankind had any just traces of the Divine character, because they were destitute of the means of such information. Hence by far the greater part of mankind have died in ignorance, and without hope. But would it be according to "the principles of sound reasoning," considering the goodness of Almighty God, to conclude, that those millions of untaught children will be consigned to unceasing anguish, purely on account of their misfortunes of which they could have been the authors? and shall they never arrive to a knowledge of the truth? Should you be disposed to countenance the reasonable doctrine of Christ, that the requirements of God are according to that which we have, and not according to that which we have not, admitting that man was made for happiness, it will follow on "the principles of sound reasoning," that such will enjoy it.

Again; from the introduction of the Gospel to the present time, I think we may safely calculate, that a vast majority of our race have died without a knowledge of, or belief in, the truth. I am aware, that, here, the unguarded reflection may be, those, who have spent their days in ignorance under the gospel dispensation, will have no excuse, as they had salvation offered to them on gospel terms? Therefore, they may never hope for salvation. What a pity, that the gospel was ever preached to them! For if it had not been, they would have been saved too!! And, in short all mankind would have been saved had there been no knowledge of God!! no gospel!!! You may predicate your darling theory on the strength of any proposition you please, and it will fall as far short of "the sound principles of reasoning," as time falls below eternity! You are welcome to all the comfort and merit arising from the reflection, that the knowledge of God is a trap for mankind, and, the introduction of the gospel an excuse to damn them. And if suitable to the greatness of your mind, you may call it "the sound principles of reasoning!"

W. I. REESE.

West-Mendon, June 19, 1827.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

At the meeting of the "General Assembly of the Presbyterian church" at Philadelphia, last year a vote was passed that the body would in future abstain from publishing their annual "narrative of the state of religion, within the bounds, &c." This resolution, I doubt not, was proposed by some one whose prudence had been awakened by the repeated falsehoods detected in those dockuments. Be that as it may the vote was rescinded, at the convocation of that body in May last, which has enabled us once more to behold the name of our quondam friend Ezra Stiles, Ely appended, as "stated clerk," to one of the old fashioned narratives. The "narrative" states that mails are still opened, stages and steam-boats run, and men still travel on the "Holy day" which they look upon as truly awful. Under the head of gambling the "General Assembly" include lotteries, and they roundly abuse Legislatures for granting them. "Within the bounds," too, they say they "hear of the industrious efforts of heretical teachers, to propagate their pernicious tenets." All those are set forth as so many causes of trouble to the Assembly, but they do not state to us what they think of doing upon the subject. Indeed there is nothing they can do, except whine, as they always have done; for if they essay to do more they will be simply told it is not their province to dictate to Legislatures, or mail contractors, or travellers, or the owners of stages or steam or canal boats. We may, probably, soon see a vote from this "august body of Calvinism distilled," recommending to the Most High a suspension of vegetable growth on Sunday! It would not be a whit more blasphemous to God, or insulting to common sense than many things they have done. But these same industrious teachers of heresy, who are they, and why are they not looked after? This is a far more tangible matter than attempting to suspend animal functions upon a given day. Alas! the Assembly has not even given them a "local habitation, or a name." How excessively modest this Assembly grows of late years! Formerly they could denounce from single individuals to whole churches and communities, of such as did not please them; but now, how respectful! they will not even point out the location of the objects of their displeasure. The Calvinists, in this respect, resemble the Hindoos. They worship what is called the Devil, through fear, in hopes to pass with impunity; and the Calvinists are often willing to be civil, even to a Universalist, if they can thus escape exposure. They dare not meet us in the field of argument, so they hide in some obscure corner and then amuse themselves in calling us teachers of evil.

There is one feature of this "narrative" to which I wish to call the attention of E. S. Ely. It is stated that all these evils which I have enumerated are practised upon Sunday, and that they are very wicked; and farther, in addition, the very churches of Calvin are stated to be lukewarm, in the northern, southern, middle and western points of the Calvinistick compass; notwithstanding all which, "indications of the progressive triumphs of Divine truth and grace [Calvinism is here meant] are strong and palpable." How is all this, friend Ely? Is it a fact of your own confessing, that Calvinism does beget evils, in the world? The old cry, "want of ministers," is again repeated, for, perhaps, the thousandth time, in this narrative, while "whole churches," are said to be dissolved for the want of them, in various places. Now in this matter there must be a lie some where, and it must rest between the "General Assembly" on the one part, and a Mr. Sabine, a Presbyterian Priest, at Boston, upon the other. The Assembly, states that ministers are wanted, and requests people to pray that they may be multiplied; while Mr. Sabine, a man of their own faith and kidney says, in a sermon which he lately published, that there are a great many unemployed ministers of the gospel in Boston, who have lost none of their usefulness, seeking a morsel of bread by keeping school or writing for the papers. For the paper he should have said, as the Boston Recorder, I believe is the only Boston paper in which the labours of such men are wanted. This statement of Mr. Sabine's is well known, by thousands, to be correct so far as it regards priests of Calvin unemployed, and the falsehood, therefore, falls upon the General Assembly, who, aware that Calvinism is on the decline, are very anxious to excuse the matter, which they attempt to do by drawing down the corners of their mouths over this foolish statement. Priest after Priest, of the Calvinistick faith is turned adrift from his pulpit by the people who have no longer any occasion for his absurd dogmas, and these are scattered abroad, one begging for the Auburn Theological Seminary, and one for this purpose, and one for that, shifting and turning every way to live, without labour, while the constant cry is kept up that more preachers of Calvinism are wanted. It is highly satisfactory to the friends of truth and sense, to see the advocates of nonsensical error driven to such paltry shifts—it shows that their day draweth nigh.

The following passage, which I extract from the "narrative" is worthy of notice.:

"The past year has been emphatically a year of revivals. To enumerate all the towns and congregations on which God has poured out his Holy Spirit, would swell our report beyond its assigned limits. Suffice it to say, that upwards of twenty Presbyteries have participated, in a greater or less degree, in the refreshing showers with which God has been watering his church. Within the bounds of the Synod of Genesee, we may mention the Presbyteries of Rochester and Buffalo."

This relates to revivals, the past year observe. Now where is the revival in the Presbytery of Buffalo to be located? In the village of Buffalo which has been head quarters of Calvinism in this region, the Calvinistick church has constantly sunk in publick opinion for more than four years, and in none of those years more than in the last. This Assembly had the means of knowing, I think, since one of their own body was Mr. G. Crawford, the only man who pretends to preach that horrid doctrine here, in its purity. As for the "region round about," I know of no place where Calvinism is gaining, or doing better than it is here, where from present prospects, it will not be known, many years. In this region, four years ago there was not one Universalist where there are now fifty, and hundreds are inquiring to know the truth, in places where a few years since, Calvinism reigned triumphant in all the gloomy habiliments of death and despair. Such are the prospects of Calvinism in this region, where the Assembly claim to have an increasing force. If the rest of the narrative is as wide of fact as this statement, there should certainly be something done to produce a reform—not "revival"—among the penmen of the General Assembly, whoever they may be. But it is of a piece with the rest of Calvinistick management. It is an up hill battle which the votaries of that faith have to fight, and while they close their eyes and ears to the evidences which prove their faith false, they seize every occasion to excuse the retrograde motion which they feel they are making in the scale of intelligence among mankind.

V.

"Take especial care that thou delight not in wine, for there never was any man that came to honor or preferment that loved it; for it transformeth man into a beast, decayeth health poisoneth the breath, destroyeth natural heat, deformeth the face, rotteth the teeth, and to conclude, maketh a man contemptible, soon old, and despised of all wise and worthy men, hated in thy servants, in thyself and companions; for it is a bewitching and infectious vice. And, remember my words, that it were better for a man to be subject to any vice than to it; for all other vanities and sins are recovered, but a drunkard will never shake off the delight of beastliness; for the longer it possesseth a man, the more he shall be subject to it; for it dulseth the spirits, and destroyeth the body, as ivy doth the old tree, or as the worm that engendereth in the kernel of the nut."

IMPORTANT.

It has been known to many of our friends in this state, that it has long been contemplated to remove this paper to the village of AUBURN. Many doubts as to the expediency of the measure have arisen, and ample time has been devoted to an examination of all that can be said for and against it. So far as our weak judgement has been able to weigh the subject it has long since decided that the removal of the establishment is not only expedient, but actually necessary. Nor are we alone in this opinion. All those among our ministering brethren with whom we have consulted, with the exception of those whose local feelings are somewhat interested, have coincided with us in the opinion above expressed. The result, as may have been already anticipated, is, the determination to remove the establishment to Auburn.

As we have often declared that the good of the cause of truth has been the first and leading object of our pursuit; and as it will readily occur to the understanding of the reader, that this arrangement will subject us to no inconsiderable expense and trouble (saying nothing of the unpleasant sensations to be endured on parting with our friends in this place) we feel under obligations of a very serious and solemn nature to make known our reasons for removing the Advocate from this place. They are the following:

1. The Advocate has never been conducted with a view to promote the cause of truth in any one place in preference to another; but the general advancement of light, liberty, and good feeling, has ever been the object with its conductors. Nor have its effects been local. Its influence has been felt and acknowledged over a wide extent of country.

2. If any one place is entitled to a preference for its location, that section of country which affords us the largest number of subscribers, is to be preferred as having the strongest claim. In this case the decision must be in favour of its removal.

3. The village of Auburn has become the place of residence of the respected Gamaliels of orthodoxy—a Geneva, where calvinism is constantly infused into the minds of her votaries, who in their turn, go forth into all the earth with the cry of "great is Diana of the Ephesians." Perhaps we shall learn something by being so near a Theological Seminary, which may be of service to our readers and the publick.

4. The hope that our humble efforts to advance the cause of our Redeemer will be more serviceable there than here, is among the reasons why we have concluded to adopt the measure.

To the foregoing might be added many more, which time will develop. Of one thing, however, our patrons and friends may be assured, viz. That the good of the cause of truth generally, and not individual aggrandizement, is our great and leading motive; and nothing but the full conviction that the change of location will be for the better, could have led to the adoption of the measure.

It may be proper to remark, that no delay will take place in the publication of the paper; as the twenty-seventh number will be issued at Auburn in season to arrive at places west of this within a few hours of the time when they have been usually received by subscribers. Subscribers in this village will for a few weeks to come, during the continuance of the editor in this place, receive their papers as usual, at their doors.

Editors of papers with whom we exchange, and correspondents, will please direct their papers and communications as usual to the Editor of the Gospel Advocate, at Buffalo N. Y. until further notice.

Buffalo, June 30, 1827.

POST-OFFICE CONCERNS.

There seems to have arisen some difficulty in the minds of several Post Masters relative to the legal postage of the Gospel Advocate. The Post Master at Elbridge, N. Y. to whose office several sheets of this paper are sent, seems to have misconceived of our intention, and also of the instructions of the Post Master General. Judging of the matter from the letter sent on to him from the General Post Office, in reply to his inquiries; and from the previous decision of the Post Master General, which follows, we conclude there is a misunderstanding between Mr. Mather and the Post Master General, as to the matter in dispute.

We claim no deduction from the ordinary postage on common newspapers on account of the smallness of our paper; but expect it to be subject to the ordinary postage on newspapers unless in cases where two papers are forwarded on one sheet without being cut apart. No matter how small our paper is when cut apart; if it was but one fourth of a large sheet it would be ratable as a newspaper; but when two papers are printed on one sheet, and sent to subscribers without being divided, the two being but one printed sheet, should not, we conceive, be charged with double postage. If, therefore, Mr. Mather will make the proper distinction between a single paper containing but one half sheet, and a WHOLE SHEET CONTAINING TWO PAPERS, we think the difficulty will be removed. We have the decision of the P. M. Gen. on the subject; and also a copy of his letter to Mr. Mather; and for the benefit of all concerned we republish the former, and add the latter.

TO POST MASTERS.

In consequence of some Post Masters having charged unlawful postage, upon the "Gospel Advocate," where two numbers were sent on one sheet, I have written to the Post Master General upon the subject; and with my communication I forwarded a sheet containing two numbers of the Advocate upon it. This was done that there should be left no chance for misunderstanding. The following is an exact copy of the answer of the Postmaster General, to my communication, the original of which is in my possession, and may be seen by any person who is not satisfied with reading the copy.

*Post Office Department, }
8th July, 1824. }*

Sir—I have received your communication and the paper you enclosed. The postage chargeable on the sheet you enclosed, should be for one sheet only, though it contains two numbers of the "Gospel Advocate." Had these numbers been separated, postage as for one sheet should be charged on each, but as the sheet contains both numbers, the postage should be only for one sheet. Post Masters ought not to separate the numbers.

I am respectfully your obt. servant,
JOHN McLEAN.

MR. SIMON BURTON, Portland, N. Y.

LETTER TO H. F. MATHER, ESQ. ELBRIDGE, N. Y.
*Gen. P. O. Department, }
March 10, 1827. }*

Sir:—Your decision is correct in the case of the "Advocate." A paper published on so small a sheet as that two of them will be but of the size of a common newspaper, is still subject to postage as a newspaper; and if two of them are published on one large sheet, they are still two newspapers, and must be rated as such. Yours, respectfully, (Signed) JOHN McLEAN.

H. F. MATHER, Esq. P. M. Elbridge, N. Y.

REMARKS.

If the P. M. Gen. had said that one sheet containing two papers must be charged as two printed sheets then indeed we should be constrained to admit that his instructions are contradictory; but it is quite obvious that nothing contained in his letter to Mr. Mather has a bearing upon his former decision in the letter to Mr. Burton. If, however, any are dissatisfied after reading the foregoing, we would thank them to forward a whole sheet, containing two numbers, to the Gen. P. O. and ask the simple question, should this one sheet be charged double postage.

N. B. We shall forward one sheet containing duplicate numbers to Elbridge, and should be glad to hear that the P. M. at that place is satisfied.

If men did but know what felicity dwells in the cottage of a virtuous poor man—how sound he sleeps, how quiet his breast, how composed his mind, how free from care, how easy his provision, how healthful his morning, how sober his night, how moist his mouth, how joyful his heart—they would never admire the noises and the diseases, the throng of passions, and the violence of unnatural appetites, that fill the houses of the luxurious and the hearts of the ambitious.—Jeremy Taylor.

AN ESSAY ON ELECTION, &amp;c.

CHAPTER III.

REASONS FOR REJECTING CALVINISTICK VIEWS OF ELECTION AND REPROBATION.

The views of Election and Reprobation which we regret, belong peculiarly to the system of Calvinism. There are shades of difference in the opinions and reasonings of the numerous body of Christians called Calvinists; but they all agree that God hath arbitrarily, or by a mere act of his sovereign will, chosen a part of mankind to salvation and eternal life; and that he hath in the same arbitrary way, either reprobated, or left without remedy, the rest of the human race; and that in consequence of being so left or reprobated, they continue in sin, and perish everlastingly. The proper Calvinistick doctrine is, that God from all eternity, of his mere sovereign will and pleasure, elected a certain number of individuals of the human race, not on the ground of faith or good works foreseen, nor because there was any thing in them to distinguish them from others; not to the enjoyment of outward privileges and advantages; but to be vessels of his mercy, and to inherit eternal life and glory; that their salvation is secured in Christ, and rendered absolutely certain by the irreversible decree of God in their favour; in pursuance of which he calls them by his irresistible grace, prepares them for, and conducts them to glory: that on the other hand, the rest of mankind were utterly rejected, and by the absolute decree of God reprobated, made vessels of wrath, and appointed to destruction; that their salvation never was designed, nor any provisions for it made. What is called modern Calvinism differs not from strict or proper Calvinism, so far as it relates to election; but it includes not the doctrine of reprobation by the absolute decrees of God. Rejecting that doctrine, its advocates assert that the non-elect are reprobated for their sin; but they maintain that all are born in sin, and continue to sin in consequence of the corrupt nature they derive from Adam, from which they cannot be delivered without the special grace of God, which grace he bestows on none but the elect: consequently modern Calvinism leaves those who are not elected without any sufficient remedy, and in as bad a state as the reprobates of the strictly Calvinistick system; their continuing in sin, and perishing everlastingly, are as unavoidable as if absolutely decreed. For the following reasons, we reject both these views of the subject.

1. Because they are not found in the Scriptures.—The sacred writers no where teach, that God hath decreed who shall, and who shall not, receive the grace which bringeth salvation; who shall repent and believe, and who shall remain impenitent and unbelieving; nor that he hath chosen to eternal life and glory, any, but those who obey him; nor that he hath left any of the human race in a remediless state; much less, that, by placing them under an irreversible decree of reprobation, he hath made them vessels of wrath, and rendered their destruction unavoidable. As Calvinistic views are not found in the scriptures, we have no authority for believing them.

2. Because they are contrary to the Scriptures.—The scriptures teach that God is no respecter of persons; Calvinism teaches that he hath such a peculiar respect to the persons of some, as to make them heirs of glory by a mere act of his sovereign will; while others, who are equally his creatures, and no more unworthy, by a mere sovereign act of his will; are rejected and left to perish, while the former teach that he will render to every man according to his works, the latter supposes him to render to men according to his arbitrary choice or rejection of them. While the scriptures assert that God hath no pleasure in the death of the sinner; Calvinism teacheth that, from all eternity, he decreed the utter destruction of non-elect sinners; and hath left them in such a state, as makes their eternal ruin inevitable. The former shows that the grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared to all men; the latter, that saving grace is only for the elect. The one shows that there will be tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil; but glory, honor, and peace, to every man that worketh good; the other takes for granted that there will be tribulation and anguish upon every one who is not elected, whatever good he may do; but glory, honor, and peace to all the elect, whatever evil they may work. A doctrine so repugnant to the scriptures, ought to be rejected.

3. Because the plan which Calvinists ascribe to God, is contrary to what appears in his visible works.—The sun of the natural world shines for the good of all; his light and influence are universally diffused; the vital air circulates every where, for the benefit of all that live; the God of nature and providence amply provides for the wants of all his creatures, and supplies them with the abundant means of enjoyment: but in the Calvinistic system, the sun of righteousness shines only to enlighten a little corner of the moral world, the vital influence of divine grace, circulates partially, in a narrow region; and the God of the spirits of all flesh, provides only for the spiritual enjoyment of a small part of the souls he hath made. In the natural world, every thing exists for some useful purpose. Not a plant grows, not an animal lives merely for its own sake;—

but minister to the general good. Man is not made to live to himself; his happiness is connected with that of his species; he cannot procure enjoyment, without ministering to the enjoyment of others. In the system we oppose, these principles are reversed; the elect are chosen, not that they may be subservient to the good of the moral world at large, but that every thing may be subservient to them. This system, if true, would be an anomaly in creation; at variance with the economy of nature, and with the order which God hath established throughout the universe.

4. Because the Election contended for by Calvinists, is inconsistent with what is admitted to be wise and just in elections among men.—If an earthly monarch elects certain persons, it is because there are offices or situations for them to fill for the publick good; and he would be censured, if in choosing them, he paid no regard to character, and the fitness of the persons, for the stations he appointed them to fill. If in electing individuals to high honours and privileges, he paid no regard to worth of character, but made an arbitrary choice; regardless of the publick good, to show his despotick power; he would be thought neither a wise nor a good sovereign.—All elections among men, whether by the people or their rulers, are, in the institution of them, supposed necessary for the publick good. However much this principle may have been departed from in practice, neither the wisdom nor the justice of it will be questioned. Shall it be admitted that it is unwise and unjust for mortals, in choosing others, whether to places of power, trust, or emolument, or to the enjoyment, of honours and privileges, to proceed on the principle of mere favouritism; and shall the God of infinite wisdom and justice be charged with acting on that principle; with electing individuals, without regard to their character and the promotion of the good of his universal family? Yet this is what Calvinism ascribes to the sovereign of the universe.

5. Because Calvinism cannot be reconciled with the acknowledged perfections of God.—It is universally acknowledged that God is infinitely wise, and just and good. Who can reconcile with infinite wisdom, the creation of a considerable part of the human race for endless misery? If their Creator placed them under the dreadful decree of reprobation, or left them in such a state of helplessness and sin as rendered their eternal misery inevitable, how can the conclusion, that he made them for misery, be avoided? Would it not have been more consistent with infinite wisdom never to have made them? How can it be shown to be consistent with the justice of God, to rebrobrate those who had not personally sinned? for him to decree their sins, and then punish them for acting according to his own decree? or leave them in a sinful state, from which they cannot escape, without that divine aid, which he determines to withhold ; and then consign them to eternal torments for being in that state ? How can an election which operates as a bill of exclusion against a large portion of mankind, and cuts them off from any share in the saving mercy and grace of God, by confining salvation and eternal life to those who are arbitrarily chosen, be consistent with infinite goodness ? Doctrines so contrary to the perfect wisdom, justice, and goodness of God, must be false.

TATTILING.

Of all the vices to which the human race is addicted, that of tattling is the lowest. To magnify the foibles of our neighbours, or to make the publick believe them guilty of what they never did, is but the smallest of its evils. To turn the opinion of the world against one, is a heavy evil enough, but when it enters a little community of friends—a circle of relatives—a family, and poisons the happiness of bosom companions, the load is greater than human nature can sustain.

There are two classes of tattlers ; the first are those who originate stories, either through malice, or a wish to tell something new : the second, those who publish them to the world, after they originated. The first class sometimes pretend to found their stories on trifling incidents of which they have an imperfect knowledge, and the last justify themselves by saying "they heard so." Whether both of these classes are equally wicked-hearted, we will not say ; that the labours of both have the same effect, cannot be denied, viz : to traduce the character of their fellow-men.—How many individuals are ruined, how many families are made miserable, by the propensity which a certain class of people have, to pry into the private concerns of their neighbours—how many characters are buffeted and how many names slandered, because certain people have "nothing else to talk about"—how many people are accused of crimes, because they might have committed them had they been vile enough, and how many more are censured because they have a family secret, past finding out. Women too, as well as men, are guilty of this crime ; even aged women, whose grey hairs should remind them that the time is near at hand when they must render up an account of their own sins, are conning over the faults of others, and giving them to the thousand tongues of rumour.

Slanderers of this class are as cowardly as they are wicked : they let you know you have an enemy to contend with, but never tell you where to find that enemy. They salute you with a kiss, and while the breast is yet warm from the embrace, stab you under the fifth rib. An open enemy may have an honourable mind, but the assassin who acts under the garb of friendship, is a wretch whom it were base flattery to call a coward.

If we cannot speak well of our neighbour, let us keep silent. If we know him to be in fault, let us cover him with that same mantle of charity which we may one day want ourselves.—But, of all things, do not let us murder his character, by spreading stories the truth of which we do not ourselves believe. Common report is a common liar, and we have no right to make up judgement and condemn a man upon her testimony ; and if we do it we throw our reputation upon the mercy of the same tribunal, and peril our own good name, for the boon of destroying our neighbour's !—Northern Star.

EPITAPH ON CALVINISM.

Here rests the remains of the blood-nursed Bantling of Geneva ; supposed to be the offspring of the mother of Harlots, and sired by the Beast.*

Like the infant Hercules, he gave early signs of mighty valour, by feeding the fire with his enemies, and banishing those who opposed his march to Empire.†

In early life he was crowned at

Dort, A. D. 1618 ;‡

Lord Dictator and Emperor

Generalissimo

of England, Holland, Scotland, Bremen, Hessa, Switzerland and the Palatinæ.§

Yet under the pacifick reign of this mighty monarch, many ruthless tragedies were acted, and many heart appalling scenes exhibited, which must have paralised the energies of a Sovereign of less philanthropick spirit than his Royal Highness.

Even his Belgian subjects, when unannoyed by enemies abroad,—armed their polemick legions to massacre each other at home.||

In Leyden and London, disloyal subjects arose, who artfully seduced vast armies from their allegiance to their new sovereign : yet such was the potency of his mighty arm, and the unyielding power of his royal soul ; that with little more than a life guard, he soon decapitated the traitor Arch Bishop Laud,

and the dastard

Charles the 13th, dismissed his court ; ¶ and having executed justice with a vengeance becoming exasperated royalty—assumed the throne

prime Regicide of England.

Still so unhappy was his majesty, in the height of his glory, as to be perpetually engaged in all the horrors of fortuitous war. In vain he condescended to plead for submission ; in vain he exhibited his reeking sword ! For many years like truth in her simplicity, he condescended to sway the sceptre in a state of purity ; but at length found it expedient to go artfully adorned; and often too, he dressed in disguise, that his disproportioned form and fiend-like aspect might not prejudice beholders against the equity of his government.

At length, after suffering great and irreparable losses in various parts of his vast domain; and conceiving the noble idea, that Europe was unworthy of his services; and hoping to find more faithful subjects in the New World; where he might erect a throne, and enjoy regal honours with undisturbed repose, with one Colossal stride, he leaped the—Atlantic, and was hailed a welcome Creole, and crowned Prince Regent of America.

But being some what emaciated by thirst, having been long accustomed to blood, he sucked the veins of a few of his stubborn enemies,* for which John Bull roared such appalling anathemas, threatening to goar his friends in England, &c. &c. that he abdicated his throne, and wandering forth in disguise, soon became bleary-eyed, by reason of much light—has stood crosslegged for more than fifty years, and now lies—Couchant, shrouded in his modern bannian—leaving a mongrel race of lugubrious Friends,

Æ. 200 Yrs.

The above Epitaph, it is believed exhibits the leading facts in the history of Calvinism.

It was written to be prefixed to a certain Calvinistick creed; in which the doctrines of fensive to Scripture and common sense, were professedly couched in ambiguous language, that would admit of being explained as occasion required. In this creed, Calvinism may properly be said to lie couchant, for though it holds forth a free salvation, yet it breaths in coverture the miasm of Geneva.

This creed stands not alone—too often for unsuspecting credulity, is this heaven impeaching doctrine, dressed up in disguise.

I would attack no honest man's faith, but in the language of compassion and forbearance; but every error in disguise, I would gladly draw from its coverture, and expose it in its native deformity.

RELIGION.

Soft flow the verse to sweet religion,
And the bright path which leads the mind to heaven,
Let flowers of pristine beauty strew the way,
And light refulgent, gild the Christian's day,
"My yoke is easy and my burden light,"
Said he who came to set weak mortals right,
The ways of wisdom lead the mind to peace,
And pleasant is the road her footsteps trace.
Hear then her counsel—shun her scoffer's seat,
Nor with polluted lips a brother greet.
Use no vain arts—let truth and humble love,
Guard all your words—your every act approve.
Wipe from the widow's eye the mantling tear,
And with kind actions helpless orphans cheer,
To all distress, extend the friendly hand,
And scatter blessings round thy native land.
When mortals suffer by acute disease
Give Christian consolation.—Strive to ease
Their troubled minds, by words of heavenly birth,
And in soft accents, whisper "peace on earth."
With Heaven's own promises rejoice the heart,
And to the foe perform a brother's part.
With mercy's tones the sons of misery bless,
And let compassion soften each distress.
So shall thy days in constant joys be past,
Shine ever bright—and be thy best thy last. C.

AN ESSAY ON ELECTION, &c.

CHAPTER III.

REASONS FOR REJECTING CALVINISTICK VIEWS OF ELECTION AND REPROBATION.

6. Because Calvinistick views of Election and Reprobation, dishonour the great Father of all.

—They represent him as confining his love to a part of his numerous family, whose sins he passeth by, and on whom he bestows all the riches of his favour; while all the rest are treated as outcasts, for whom he has no affection. They suppose God to have utterly disinherited, and placed under the black decree of reprobation, no small part of his rational offspring; that he never intended their happiness; and hath provided nothing for them after this life, but indelible misery. Who that reveres the character of God, as the universal Father whose name is love, can help rejecting opinions so dishonourable to him?

7. Because those views represent the government of God as tyrannical.—They represent him as governing the rational creation, according to the dictates of an arbitrary will; not as distinguishing his subjects in proportion to their moral worth, and treating every one according to his conduct; but as determining their state, both in this world and the next, by absolute unconditional decrees, by which the happiness of the elect and the misery of the non-elect are equally secured. The elect he is supposed to have made a privileged order; to whose interests every thing shall be subservient; and whose felicity and glory, nothing can endanger: and to have placed the non-elect under the ban of his empire; from which nothing can deliver them. Such is not the government of the Father of mercies; however absolute his Sovereignty, nothing can proceed from it, but what is perfectly wise and good, agreeable to moral fitness, and calculated to promote the happiness of all who live under his government.

8. Because those views seem to suppose two opposite principles in God.—Calvinistick Election and Reprobation, connected with the doctrine of the eternal existence of sin and misery, which is part of the same system, seem to suppose the existence of opposite principles in God, eternal love and eternal hatred, ever operating in different directions, and leading to ends, as contrary to each other, as heaven and hell; as an eternity of perfect bliss, and an eternity of inexpressible misery. Inconceivably wide as these extremes are, if the system of proper Calvinism be true, they are both to be traced back to that infinite and eternal mind which decreed the final states of men before they existed; and which in pursuance of his irreversible decrees, by the combined operation of things under his government, conducts the elect to the highest bliss: the reprobate to the lowest hell; there eternally to remain. How can such views be supported, without supposing two principles in God, as opposite as the final ends to which they will ultimately bring the elect and the reprobate? The system of the moderate Calvinist leads, on the whole, to the same conclusion. Though the latter does not, in the same direct way, place all the steps which lead down to endless misery, upon the basis of the divine decrees, and chain them to the throne of God, so completely as it does those by which the elect ascend to glory; still it supposes that had God loved the non-elect as he did the elect; and made the same provision for the salvation of the one as he did for that of the other, they too would have been saved; it is therefore because God passed them by, and left them without the grace that is absolutely necessary to save them, that they perish everlastingly: he did not, from eternity, decree their destruction, but he determined to withhold from them the grace, without which they must unavoidably perish.

In the Calvinistick system, the Almighty is represented as if, like the heathen god Janus, he had two faces; one for the elect, the other for the reprobate; the one beaming with tenderness and affection, covered with everlasting smiles; which nothing can ruffle; the other, full of austerity, flaming with wrath, and covered with everlasting frowns, which nothing can ever remove: the one diffusing happiness inexpressible and eternal; the other darting upon its unhappy objects indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, unutterable and endless. The admission of the two principles of the Manichees, acting separately and independently; the one producing only good, the other only evil; would be less absurd, than to ascribe to the one God, who is love, who is invariably the same in all his ways and dispensations towards his creatures, such opposite dispositions and conduct. Can the infinite fountain of love, the unbounded ocean of blessedness, send forth unceasingly rivers of grace and pleasure to some, and overflowing torrents of wrath and misery upon others? Sooner might the purest fountain send forth sweet water and bitter. Can that great Being, who is infinitely good and merciful; while he removes all the sins and sorrows of one part of mankind, and raises them to glory; preserve the other part in existence, and keep alive in them all the sins they have committed, merely that he may overwhelm them with his wrath, and cause them to sink deeper and deeper in misery to all eternity? The soul sickens at the thought of such horrors, and turns from such gloomy views of the divine character and government, to contemplate the goodness of the Creator in his works, to meditate upon the riches of his grace and mercy, as set forth in the gospel; and with inexpressible pleasure finds that he is the loving Father of all; that he hateth nothing, which he hath made; that he is good to all; and that his tender mercies are over all his works.

9. Because Calvinistick views diminish the value of Jesus Christ, and of his death.—According to the scriptures, Christ is the Saviour of the world; he died for all, tasted death for every man, and is designed to be a universal blessing to ALL. According to the Calvinistick system this Saviour of the world is diminished into the Saviour of a select party, was sent to save none but the elect, died for them only, and they only can be benefitted by him. The non-elect have no part in him; can derive no saving benefit from him; to them, what he did and suffered is of no value; they can have no interest in his mediation: he neither is, nor ever can be, their Saviour. The poor reprobates may have their condemnation aggravated by rejecting a Saviour, who was never provided for them; and their misery increased, by contemplating the happiness of the elect, which they never were capable of attaining; but, do what they will, they can have no interest in Christ, no part in his kingdom. This system is no more honourable to Christ, than it is consistent with the declarations of scripture concerning him.

10. Because those views cannot be reconciled with the divine calls and invitations in the Scriptures.—Why were the Apostles sent to preach the glad tidings of salvation to all, unless salvation be provided and intended for all? It cannot be the design of God to mock any of his creatures, with the offer of blessings which he never intended for them, or with invitations with which he never meant they should comply. Why are all men, every where, called to repentance, and commanded to repent; if it be God's design, that many of them should continue impenitent, or if he withholds from them the grace without which they cannot repent and be saved? What mean the remonstrances, expostulations, and intreaties of the Almighty, addressed to sinners indiscriminately, whether they be elected or not; if God does not love them all, and desire their salvation; if he hath made the destiny of those who continue in sin irreversible, by his absolute decrees? Calvinistick views are opposed to the general tenour of scripture, in which men are addressed as moral agents, capable of choosing or refusing the blessings set before them; of complying or not complying with the calls and invitations of the gospel; and in which God is described, as desiring the salvation of all, and as having excluded none from his favour, but those who exclude themselves by their continued disobedience.

11. Because those views impeach the divine veracity.—"As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked." Ezek. 11. If he hath no pleasure in their death; is it possible he should have made it, in the most awful sense, unavoidable, by an absolute decree, or by withholding the grace without which they cannot escape it?—Is not the supposition that God takes pleasure in the death of the unhappy persons whom he hath utterly rejected; whose destruction he hath decreed, involved in the Calvinistick doctrine of reprobation, contrary to his solemn word and oath?

12. Because Calvinism tends to discourage our efforts for the conversion and salvation of sinners.—If all the elect must be saved, and none but the elect can be saved; whatever exertions we may make to enlighten our fellow creatures by the gospel, and turn sinners to God, not one the more will be saved: our labours can savingly benefit none but the elect; and their salvation is, at all events, secured.—If it be said, that the gospel must be preached to all in order that the elect may, through the special influence of the spirit, be converted by it: granting this, still none but those whose salvation is already secured, can be converted by the gospel: and they, only, through the influence of the spirit, by which influence God can convert them without our efforts; nor do the advocates for this system doubt his doing it in his own good time. Those who are not elected, never can be converted, nor brought to the saving knowledge of God; make what efforts we will to save them; the non-elect must finally perish; as not one the more will be lost if we totally remit them. Such is proper Calvinism; a system calculated to freeze our efforts for the salvation of our fellow creatures. Happily many of its professed advocates, are inconsistent with themselves; and, forgetting the rigid doctrines of Calvin, preach the gospel as if it contained a provision for the salvation of all, and address sinners as if they believed they had power to embrace and obey it.

13. Because Calvinistical views produce a pharisaical spirit.—It leads its votaries to view themselves as the peculiar favourites of heaven. They can thank God that they are not as other men are, not like the vile reprobate whom he hath utterly rejected. They are a privileged order under the divine government, a spiritual aristocracy, for whom all things were made and continued to exist. God sees no iniquity in them though they confess themselves to be the vilest of sinners. The supreme Sovereign of the universe hath made an irreversible decree in their favour; settled on them, exclusively, all the riches of his grace, and wrapped them up securely in an everlasting covenant, out of which they can never fall. All that Christ did and suffered stands to their account; they are perfect in his righteousness. The Holy Spirit is their teacher, and what he teaches must be truth. Such are the views inspired by proper Calvinism. Is it any wonder if those who are influenced by them, be lifted up with pride, become vain in their own conceits, and despise others as ignorant?

14. Because Calvinism has a bad moral tendency.—Many of its advocates do not perceive its tendency; they are deeply concerned for the interests of holiness, and endeavour to guard against the evils, to which the doctrine they maintain has sometimes led; and which it might be expected constantly to produce, were not its influence counteracted by other principles. Some good men have guarded and trimmed the system, until little more than the name remains; and, judging by such modern refinements upon it, there is some difficulty in saying what Calvinism now is; still there are many who maintain it in its proper form: and it is to its moral tendency, as so maintained, that my remarks apply.

Calvinistick election and reprobation, are calculated to make sinners secure in their sins. Believing those doctrines, the sinner may say; "If I be elected I must be saved; God will call me by his special grace and bring me to glory; and if I be not elected there is no salvation for me; all my tears and prayers and reformation, and exertions, will be of no avail; I can do nothing right, unless God be pleased to call me by his grace, and influence me by his spirit; my corrupt nature will remain, and sin continue to reign in me." Happily reason, which has been so much decried, has kept many from adopting such pernicious conclusions. While these doctrines have led some to rest in false security, they have plunged others into gloom and despondency. Not being able to find in themselves the proof of their election, they have feared that God had utterly rejected them; that they had no chance of being saved, nor any thing to expect but eternal misery. Sometimes truly pious and virtuous persons, if not absolutely driven to despair, have been deeply distressed by such dreadful apprehensions. Believing that none but the elect can be saved, it has not been unusual for christians, instead of building their hope upon the declarations and promises of the gospel, to be continually seeking for proofs of their election, for some secret influence of the spirit, or motions of divine grace within them; and hence to rely on their frames and feelings; consequently they have been confident or desponding, as their frames and feelings have varied.

The supposition that the salvation, or perdition of men, is fixed by the unconditional decrees of God, tends to relax every exertion which the sinner should make to obtain salvation; and has, sometimes, led to a disregard of moral principle in those who have persuaded themselves of their election. There have been instances of other persons who, mistaking Calvinism for genuine christianity, have through the disgust it excited in their minds, been led to reject the scriptures. In brief, the doctrines we oppose, strike at the foundation of morality; for if God, by his absolute decrees, hath determined whether men shall be virtuous or vicious, eternally saved, or eternally lost; where is there a place for moral obligation?

Such are our Reasons for rejecting Calvinistick views of Election and Reprobation.

LETTER NO. 2.

To Elder JOSEPH BADGER, of Mendon, Monroco, co. N. Y.

SIR—In my first, I only embraced the general features of your first proposition;—in this I shall be more particular. You say, that "Universalism is repugnant to the sound principles of reasoning." Now sound reason is no more than reason at last. And if you have found that universalism is repugnant to reason, you may be enrolled on the historick page as having made a discovery of the first magnitude, and, certainly of the greatest importance to self-styled orthodoxy. If you had ascertained this before, and made it publick, and enabled them to understand, and "handle your argument," the trinitarian churches, before this time, perhaps, would have awarded you with a medal! For the greatest enemies they have had for ages, and still have, to oppose, are reason and common sense. How have they, for years, attempted to maintain the doctrines of "election and reprobation, total and inbred depravity, the trinity, and endless misery?" These are all of a piece. And have you, at length, learned, Sir, that one of them is reasonable? I very much doubt that a tolerably informed man would attempt to show, that endless misery was believed in the civilized world before the wild fancies of men attached the divine nature to Christ, crucified the Sovereign of the universe, and made out an infinite sacrifice! This, it was thought presupposed infinite guilt.—This is the foundation stone on which the fabric rests. But an infinite sacrifice could no more remove infinite guilt, than one, equal could overcome another. I charitably suppose you do not believe in the above species of atonement.

Why then must man be endlessly miserable? Is it on account of the nature and magnitude of his guilt? What is sin? The transgression of the law. What law? The infinite law of God? We have heard much about this. But is it consistent with "the principles of sound reasoning," that God should make his feeble creatures amenable to a law infinitely above their powers of comprehension? No, Sir. Here your boasted "principles of sound reasoning," must be rejected, and inscrutable mystery becomes the guide! You may say that I have not meddled with your sentiments, and am therefore losing my time. But I must take the liberty to think otherwise. My time shall be occupied in defence of what I deem truth; while Heaven sustains me. I know you have had, and still have, the name, of believing in the annihilation of a part of mankind. But did you not insinuate, that the wicked would be punished for ever in "the lake of fire?" If this is a mistake you have an opportunity to correct it. On "the principles of sound reasoning," what good will result from endless misery? Will God be glorified, and saints and angels happy, by it? Will it do the wretched victims of ceaseless despair any good? Will you undertake to maintain the affirmative of these questions on "the principles of sound reasoning?"

But endless misery aside for a moment.—What have you on "the principles of sound reasoning?" to support the doctrine of annihilation? Are some of mankind so wicked, that they cannot be subdued and saved? Is it "reasonable" to think that God has made a race of beings which he cannot controul, and save, if he please? Is it not rational to suppose that the chief of sinners have been converted to christianity and saved? And must those who are no worse be for ever put beyond the reach of salvation? And is all this agreeable to "the principles of sound reasoning?" I here repeat the enquiry, what benefit is to arise from the annihilation of those whom God could save if he would? Take no alarm, Sir, unless your "principles of sound reasoning" fail. For if they will support you here, you can give a reasonable answer. Will God, saints, or angels, be put in a better situation by annihilating a part of the human species. Or will it be happyfying to them to lie in unconsciousness? Will husbands rejoice at the annihilation of their wives, and wives of their husbands—parents of children, and children of parents—brothers of sisters, and sisters of brothers!! As it would be the most consummate folly to talk of goodness being extended either to the miserable or the unconscious, how are you to maintain benevolence of our Heavenly Father? Every being consigned to ceaseless woe, or the shades of nonentity, forms a boundary, or out post, to the tender mercies of God!! Put your shoulders to the wheel, Sir, and try your "principles of sound reasoning." Inform the publick how you account for these things, by "deducing consequences justly from premises." Tell us how the character of God can be vindicated for equal, and impartial goodness, on the ground of his having created millions, "of the same blood," with a perfect, and infallible knowledge, that they never would be benefited by their existence. Especially, Sir, let us know how, on "the principles of sound reasoning," you justify God in the bestowment of being, or life, with an unerring knowledge, that the gift would be the means of procuring a wretchedness as lasting as his own immortality! "The principles of sound reasoning," like wisdom, "will laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh." They will prove treacherous to your system, and show, that you have no part or lot in them.

You profess to be a liberal christian. But it is a superficial liberality, which will not favour investigation, nor the touch of "sound reasoning." You oppose Calvinism, and assert, that Christ died for the whole world;—"tasted death for every man." But were there any previously to the ministry of our Lord, fixed in the abodes of never ending woe, or of eternal slumber? And if so, did Christ taste death for such? If it is asserted on this ground, it was a mere profession, without any intention, because it was impossible to benefit them. For if it were possible the theory is false. If not possible, his pretensions were insincere and hypocritical. And if it were possible and he did not, it is cruel. All, or either of which, is wide of "deducing consequences justly from premises." You may here say, that this supposition is unnecessary on account of the preexistence of Christ. But, Sir, "he gave himself a ransom for all." And allowing, for the sake of the case, his pre-existence, was that equal to his being manifested, though the world was ignorant of it? And was not his coming, then, superceded by the mere fact of his pre-existence? He was promised as a Saviour. But was the promise equivalent to its fulfilment. If you can make these things appear, on the "principles of sound reasoning," by another sweep of your legerdmain, you may turn a shadow unto a substance! How, then, do you justify the belief, on the "principles of sound reasoning," that many of those who lived in the first ages of the world will be forever excluded from future joys, seeing their privileges and means of knowledge were much less than have been enjoyed since the preaching of the gospel? Should it be said, that such may be saved, but, that the case is now otherwise, the light of the "principles of sound reasoning" would show, that the gospel is the most consummate system of mischief; desolating the interests, and laying waste the hopes of man!!

I will here state what I have understood to be the belief of some of your order, and if it is a mistake I hope you will correct it. Though, perhaps, you will neither own nor deny it. Almost, of all other tenets, this is superlatively disgraceful. And Heaven must frown in dignant, on the horrid scheme of sporting with the wretchedness and wo of others. It is this—That the resurrection of Christ will effect the resurrection of all men, righteous and wicked—that the wicked will be raised mortal, and the righteous, immortal, and be judged and disposed of according to their nature and character—the righteous to the eternal inheritance of bliss ineffable—the wicked to wo and pain, there to continue till misery annihilates them!!! If this is your belief, sir, can you see any justice or mercy in raising the wicked at all? Perhaps, you will say, "they are not consigned to punishment till they are ascertained to be guilty, and judged." But were they not ascertained to be guilty before they were raised? If not, why raise them in mortal bodies, or different from the righteous? If any of the wicked may be acquitted, may not some of the righteous be condemned? If this should be, all which may be, on the principle of investigating character, all necessary, would be, for the righteous and wicked to exchange bodies!! That is, if one of the righteous should be condemned, and one of the wicked be acquitted, the righteous man would assume the mortal body, and the wicked man, the immortal body!! But suppose the righteous, at that period, should all stand justified and part of the wicked be acquitted, (which is the only ground on which a future judgement pretends to justification,) where would they get immortal bodies? And if all the wicked should be condemned, and also, a part of the righteous, where would the righteous get mortal bodies, and who are to occupy those they would leave? And, if more of either class should be acquitted or condemned, how, on "the principles of sound reasoning" will they be disposed of? Perhaps, this system was adopted to avoid the difficult fact, that "we shall be changed in a moment," &c. But, sir, you must perceive it involves one still more difficult. What right have you to oppose Calvinism? You have no greater claims to consistency than they. If the theory under examination be correct, on the "principles of sound reasoning," can any one pretend, that the wicked will be raised with a view to their good? No, sir, unmixed cruelty, alone characterizes the whole proceeding!

You may move the position, that all will be raised mortal, and receive immortality, only as they shall be found worthy! But here, sir, you will find "the covering too narrow to wrap yourself in;" for the "change" is not to be procrastinated.

There remains, therefore, no alternative, all will be raised immortal and incorruptible.—Here, sir, you may try "the principles of sound reasoning," if you like the subject.—"Gird up now thy loins like a man; for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me." Is immortality a principle subject to suffering? And if so, what prevents Him "who only hath immortality?" Does immortality contain any properties of an opposite character? or is suffering, or pain, a concomitant of immortality? We know it is of mortality; and if it be also of the former, the terms, in this respect, are synonymous, though they are contrasted by the apostle. They are as much opposed as corruption and incorruption. Corruption, in a moral sense, implies wickedness or unholiness, and incorruption, of course, is an opposite term. Hence Walker defines it "Incapacity of corruption;" and, "Incorruptness, Purity of manners, honesty, integrity, freedom from decay or degeneration."—Hence, sir, the Universalists believe, that in the resurrection, all the intelligent creation will be constituted pure, holy, immortal and happy;—"be like the angels of God in heaven," nor "die any more." And, it is undeniable, that the "principles of sound reasoning" are on the side of goodness and mercy. So much for your first proposition.

In pursuing this subject, I do not intend to let the "principles of sound reasoning" lie dormant; but shall, in due time, show, that they are harmonious with "the word of God."

QUERY.

If our Virtues do not merit eternal happiness, I would ask by what parity, of reasoning, it can be made to appear that our Vices merit eternal misery?

The sticklers, for Unlimited punishment are seriously requested to answer the above query, in a Scriptural and Philosophical manner—if they Can, and by so doing they will confer an obligation upon one who is seeking for the truth.

QUERIST.

ASHTABULA, JUNE, 1827.

REV. MR. WEEMS. A person who has been recently preaching in several of the orthodox churches in Boston and Salem, has been lately apprehended and committed to jail for stealing, at different times, various articles of merchandise. The stolen goods were found ornamenting the bodies of a number of women of ill fame in Boston, to whom he had presented them. Are we to infer from this that orthodoxy leads to licentiousness?—Ch. Intel.

SUICIDE. On Monday the 28th ult. Mr. Samuel Townsend of Sidney, in this county committed suicide by hanging himself in a barn. He was a man of gloomy temperament, his mind had been for some time disordered and occasionally he was deranged. We have understood that he was a believer in endless misery, and that it was to a strong belief in that sentiment, that much of the despondency is attributable which finally induced him to put a period to his burdensome existence.—Int. and Chronicle.

"EARNESTLY CONTEND FOR THE FAITH."

THE PRAYER OF FAITH.

That prayer is a duty, which devolves upon every christian, is admitted by all who profess to love our Lord Jesus Christ. But, that there are many who do not understand the nature and bearing of this duty, even among those who say much about it, is also to be confessed.

Prayer, it has been supposed, has an influence upon the Deity, and has been a means of procuring favours from him, which, without it, he never would have granted; but there is impiety in the thought. To suppose the Almighty capable of bending his purposes to the desires of his erring creatures, is absurdity in the extreme, and presupposes that he is a changeable being. To conceive of the impropriety of such an opinion, we have only to imagine what would be the condition of our world, if the Deity should answer all the prayers of his children! Saying nothing of the petitions of the unregenerate, there would be quite a tumult produced by the saints. The pious Baptist, would pray to have all men become baptists, and receive the ordinance of baptism by immersion; the Presbyterian, would pray that all might become presbyterians; while the Methodist, would with equal fervour, express his desire to have all men become methodists; and perhaps the Churchman would pray for the prosperity of the church and the good health of "the Bishop and other clergy." In a case like this, it will easily be perceived, the Almighty would, in attempting to answer the prayers of all, get himself into a curious dilemma.

The conclusion to which we have arrived, has led some of our orthodox divines to think it quite expedient—indeed altogether necessary, to have a FORM of prayer, embracing all the essential particulars, to be said by the faithful in their devotional exercises.—Whether this plan was devised to prevent any perplexity that might otherwise be produced in the mind of Deity, or to subserve the interests of one particular sect, is not to be decided, at present; but it will not be uncharitable to say, that the forms of prayer now used, are probably resorted to with a view to avoid those contradictory petitions, which, otherwise, christians would be liable to express. Nor would it be prudent to deny, that the form of prayer now used by the episcopal church, may have been productive of some good, inasmuch as it has reduced the number of contradictory prayers; yet although the number of evils may have been reduced, a doubt arises whether the general adoption of such form would be expedient, since it must be conceded, that in such case, the remedy would be far from effecting a radical and universal cure. An example, in which the adoption of the form of prayer has been proved measurably defective, is presented in the past and present situation of the churches in England and America. In the former, the devout churchman prays that God would bless the King; in the latter, the same desires are expressed in behalf of the President of the United States. In England, the King is denominated the head of the church, and is, we believe, a churchman; but in America the case is quite different. The President is, if we have been correctly informed, an Unitarian, and of course denies the fundamental article of the church creed. It follows, then, that while the English episcopalians are praying for their orthodox King, their American brethren are praying in behalf of an heretical President. And, in case of a war between the two countries, their prayers would be still more contradictory, and therefore improper.

If christianity leads to such inconsistent practices, it would, as a system, seem to require some improvement; for no system of religion can properly be considered perfect, unless it can be carried into general—nay, universal practice. But, to us it appears, that the foregoing inconsistencies are the results of those creeds and theories which have been invented by men, and called christianity, rather than the legitimate effects of christianity itself. We think the reader will coincide with us in opinion, after attending to the following observations.

1. Prayer should always be in conformity with the known will of God, and any thing contrary to his will should not be desired. If we pray for that which we are assured it is the will of God to grant, we are certain of obtaining an answer of peace. But it is irreligious and profane, to ask for what we suppose would be a blessing, unless we are previously assured that it is the will and pleasure of the Deity to bestow it; nor can we expect an answer of peace, unless the Almighty has previously made known his disposition to grant the blessing we desire.

2. The "prayer of faith" is a sincere request put up to the Throne of Mercy, for some blessing, with the full conviction that God will grant our request. The weakness of human nature may afford an apology for those doubting prayers which are sometimes offered up to God; but nothing can extenuate the impiety of dictating to the Almighty the course to be pursued, or the unqualified wickedness, of asking for that which we believed he has determined not to bestow.

3. The object of prayer is to mould our own hearts and desires into a frame of strict obedience to, and conformity with, the will and disposition of the Deity. That man is doubtless in error, who prays with any other motive; and his error increases in exact proportion to the fervour of his petition; unless he is persuaded that God wills to grant his request. Hence the importance of knowing the will of the Almighty.

4. The will of God is revealed in the bible, and may be known by all who will take the pains to examine for themselves.

5. It is either the will of God that all mankind should be saved from their sins; or it is his will that some should not be saved; or else he has no will at all, relative to the subject. If he has no will, in relation to our salvation we should not agitate the subject in our prayers; if it is his will that a part of mankind shall be damned, it is our duty to pray for their damnation; but if it is his will that all should be saved, we are bound to pray for the salvation of all, and to pray believing that our prayers will be answered. This, it appears, would constitute the prayer of faith; which perfectly agrees with the instructions of the apostle Paul. See I. Tim. ii. 1—3. "I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus: who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time. Whereunto I am ordained a preacher and an apostle, (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not,) a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity. I will therefore that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting."

REMARKS.

If christians would follow those directions, as to the matter and manner of prayer, which are found in the Bible, it would supercede the necessity of any controversy on this subject. A departure from the simplicity of the Gospel, is sure to lead to unhappy consequences. Hence, the controversy on this subject, has not arisen from any defect in the christian system, nor from any ambiguity in the divine oracles; but is the natural consequence of an early departure from the commands of our Lord and his primitive servants. The extravagant fancies, the unholy assumptions, and perhaps, the dictatorial manner, too often exhibited in the extempore prayers of the saints, was the original cause of a form of prayer being adopted by christians. But this form, being itself a departure from the simple prayer of our Saviour, is entitled to the same objections which its authors, no doubt, were anxious to avoid. And those who adopt a manner or form of prayer differing from that prescribed by our Lord, though they may have avoided many errors, are nevertheless chargeable with having attempted to improve that, which in itself is perfect.

Again. Prayer is only useful in proportion to the degree of resignation it produces in the mind, and the union of feeling it causes among those who unite in it. Hence the necessity of having some proper motive before us while we pray, and some object in view, calculated to unite all hearts. Let, then, the motive be, to draw ourselves to God by a conformity to his will; and our object, the present peace and future salvation of all mankind. In this, all good hearts are united; for all desire the salvation of the whole world.

If the foregoing observations should be found to favour the doctrine of universalism, the fault, if it be one, is not ours; for the express command is, that we should pray for all men, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting; and if the prayer of faith embraces the essentials of our religion, we feel to give God the glory, and to extend the influence of that spirit, which produces charity in the heart, to all those, for whose eternal felicity we devoutly pray in faith nothing doubting. Ed.

MISCELLANY.

A REVERIE.

Night was veiling with its dusky mantle the varied face of nature—the bright objects of day were now gloomy and indistinct—I sat before a fire which threw a fitful gleam upon the opposite wall—contemplation had chosen this time as peculiarly her own—the thoughts of years that are gone, crowded upon my mind—I was again in the walks of youth—youth! season of comparative innocence—when the angel of hope covers the mind with her golden wings—when the tear of grief seldom dims the laughing eye—when "sorrow may endure for a night," but when the morning sun will bring with him the light of consolation and rekindle the glow of joy. Where is the man who can look back upon the days of peace, without a pensive feeling? If there be such a man, I envy him not—he has little sensibility. What has become of those, whose youthful hands we pressed with youthful ardour—a round whose necks our arm was fondly thrown—whose mirth, whose pains we shared, whose wrongs we were ever ready to avenge in whom we confided—for the influence of the dark spirit of suspicion was then unfelt! Some of them have been gathered to the mansions of death, in the spring of their days, while they "dreamed" of "many a morrow gay"—some upon whose devoted heads the storm of misfortune has pitilessly pelted, have sought far from their homes a foreign grave—some have quaffed the cup which smiling pleasure offered—they are now treading with hasty footsteps the broad road whose end is ruin—some have been "marked" by "melancholly for her own," and move through life "in helpless, hopeless, brokenness of heart."—some are far away—tossed on the stormy ocean, or pursuing fortune in other climes, exposed to death from the roaring wave, or inhaling the pestilential breeze. Of how few can it be said their path has always been prosperous? those may be considered as fortunate, and should be contented who can say, we float along the stream of time—it is now gentle and calm—now rough and turbulent, its banks are often adorned with gay and beautiful landscapes—though our prospects are sometimes bounded by dark and barren rocks—as we advance we are still greeted with smiling spots of verdure, but long tracts of cheerless sterility too frequently meet our gaze. Happy is he whose bosom is swayed, and whose actions are directed by the expectation of a haven of illimitable felicity.—N. Y. American.

ALWAYS HAPPY.

An Italian Bishop struggled through great difficulties without repining, and met with much opposition in the discharge of his Episcopal functions, without betraying the least impatience. One of his intimate friends who highly admired those virtues, which he thought to imitate, one day asked the prelate if he could communicate the secret of his being always easy? "Yes," replied the old man. "I can teach you my secret, and with great facility: it consists in nothing more than making a right use of my eyes." His friend begged him to explain himself. "Most willingly," returned the bishop, "in whatever state I am, I first of all look up to heaven; and remember that my principal business here is to get there; I then look down upon the earth, and call to mind how small a space I shall occupy in it when I come to be interred; I then look abroad into the world, and observe what multitudes there are who are in all respects more unhappy than myself. Thus I learn where true happiness is placed when all our cares must end and what little reason I have to repine or to complain."

From the Olive Branch.

PROFANITY.

Would those who indulge themselves in habits of profanity pause a few moments and reflect, they would find themselves chargeable with folly and weakness, or else guilty of possessing a malignant heart. How great is the folly of using words without meaning! or words, which if they have meaning, only expose the persons who use them, and make them appear weak and contemptible in the eyes of the virtuous part of community! If the author of being were but once to comply with the wishes of the swearer, particularly when he calls down imprecation on himself, would he not be more cautious in future? A vice so degrading ought to be held up to the detestation of all mankind, particularly of civilized society. It is a vice so big with meanness and malignancy, so completely unjustifiable in every point of view, and displays so much weakness, ignorance and folly, that we should suppose no man who had a desire to be respected by society and wished to be considered a man of understanding, learning, and good breeding, would ever suffer a profane or immoral word to pass his lips! The lower such men are held in the estimation of the publick the better; because it is by this way that their baneful example is prevented, in a great degree, from contaminating others: for people seldom pattern after those whom they look upon as the very dregs of society. VINDEX.

Ye are a sweet and gentle relief
To the heart by sorrow bowed,
When ye moisten the eye of care and grief.
Like rain from the bursting cloud;
For the soul no more by pain o'erprest,
Sinks as a child to its peaceful rest.
Ye come at Pity's plaintive call
With your warmly gushing flow,
And the gems that blaze in the monarch's hall
Have nought like your diamond glow;
For ye are the pearls to mortals given,
With the hallowed hues and hopes of Heaven.
Yet holier far the tears that flow
From the eye by guilt o'ercast,
When mercy her shadowy mantle throws,
O'er the sins of the days that are past;
For ye come in the streamlets so soft and clear
That ye seem the gifts of a holier sphere.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

REMARKS, ON JOHN V. 28, 29.

"Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation."

Though this text has frequently been illustrated in works which are now before the public, by some of our most distinguished brethren in the ministry, and though every well-informed believer in the ultimate purity and happiness of all men, is amply capable of developing its meaning in a way to do honour, both to the mental faculties which God has given us, and to the system of revealed truth which speaks the perfections of its author, I am disposed to give my own views of the subject in this publick manner for the following reasons—1st, It was quoted by Mr. Millard in his reply to me on the 29th of Sept. 1826, though I think, without comment, and may be thought by some, to have a bearing on the question then and there discussed. And 2ndly, as the ADVOCATE receives a very extensive circulation, our views may be useful to many of its readers.

W. I. REESE.

I deem it superfluous here, to examine the popular doctrine of this text, in detail, as it is already, and generally well known. The common presumption is, that here our Lord furnishes evidence of the resurrection of the literally dead bodies, of all, "both of the just and of the unjust;" and, of their final appointment, to happiness or misery, according to their merit or demerit. But if this sentiment be a subject of revelation, which however has been fairly refuted in the Discourse to which this article is supplementary, I shall attempt to show, that evidence of its truth must be sought in other parts of scripture than this text, by exhibiting its probable, if not its positive, sense, from the following unquestionable sources of testimony:

1. From the context of the chapter in which the passage occurs, and

2. From a comparison of the text with other scripture showing the date of the event alluded to, and its application.

1. The subject which gave occasion to the utterance of this text originated in the circumstance of healing a man who had "had an infirmity thirty eight years," verse 5. The facts mentioned do not fully determine the healed man to have been a Gentile, but it is quite probable, from the connexion of the reply of our Lord to the Jews, that he was not one of the sons of Israel, nor, perhaps, did he belong to the "dispersed" of the Gentiles. It is usually admitted, that the 25th verse here, intimated the proclamation of the gospel to the Gentiles, ("who were dead in trespasses and sins,") in consequence of the belief of which they should "live" in the enjoyment of faith, and allowing that the cured man was a Gentile, though, in some measure, subject to the ordinances of Israel, the matter admits of an easy and natural transition from the case of the infirm man, to that of the morally dead Gentiles generally; while on the other hand the connexion would be interrupted. Jesus gave the Jews to understand, that the Father had performed the cure by him as the means, verse 19, and in regard to the same case, in justification of his conduct, he says, for as the Father raiseth up the dead, and giveth them life, so the Son, likewise giveth life to whom he will verse 21. The meaning of which, in all probability, is, that, as he had not been denied the proper ability to effect a cure on the diseased man, though a Gentile, it was not right, that he should be governed by their prejudices, as to the time when or the subjects upon whom, to bestow his favours, but he would give life to whom he pleased. And it is a reasonable reflection, altho' the publick ministry of our Lord was confined to the Jews, as it was soon to be conveyed to the uncircumcised, that he would not decline performing benevolent offices to the Gentiles, as in the case of the Syrophenician woman, Mark 7. 26. What is to be observed, then, is, that, in this instance, the word anastasin translated resurrection, is not applied to the Gentiles; but the proof and reason of this will appear hereafter. All I wish to have noticed here, is that where the Gentiles are spoken of (ver 25) they are represented as dead, and when hearing the voice of the Son of God, as living, without any intimation, that they had once enjoyed the life of faith as the Jews had, that they had ceased to live in that sense, were entombed in darkness, and must be brought to life by the process of figurative resurrection. This being the case, it will appear obvious, that "the dead," and those who were in "the graves," were in possession of natural life, and the peculiarity of the expressions only marked their previous circumstances.

It was, no doubt, a matter of wonder to the Jews, that one professing to be their Messiah should speak of extending his word or doctrine to the abhorred Gentiles; and still more marvellous, that the ministry of him whom they hated and finally crucified, should, in any way concern them. But as to the article of a resurrection to future life, they admitted it without any emotions of astonishment whatever—talked of it familiarly; and held it with all the absurdities with which too many moderns decorate that precious and consoling truth. In short if the popular opinion of this text be admitted, and, also, that the Jews, in those days, believed the same, neither of which can be proved, Jesus gave them no information, nor additional cause for alarm.

2. It will not be disputed that the 29th verse is parallel with Dan. 12, 2. "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." Here common belief says, that the resurrection of all the dead is spoken of. But why is it said MANY of THEM that sleep, &c., if all men are intended? Who are meant by the expression MANY of THEM? I answer that part of God's people, the Jews, who slept in earthly mindedness, figuratively, "the dust of the earth," as distinguished from those who "should be found written in the book," verse 1. A reference to this 12th chapter of Daniel compared with the use our Lord made of the prophecy, will fix the date of the event mentioned in our text to the close of the Jewish dispensation, beyond every reasonable doubt. Daniel fixes the accomplishment of his prophecy to the period when "there should be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time," verse 1. And Jesus quoting from Daniel, in speaking of the same event, says, "There shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." Matt. 24, 21.—And at verse 15, our Lord makes express mention of the prophet as having predicted the facts he was then illustrating to his disciples, "When ye shall see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet," comp Dan. 12, 11. The uninterrupted connexion found in this prophecy of Daniel, forces the conviction, that, he did not change the subject from the notice given in the first verse. And our Lord has rendered it impossible for us even to conjecture, that he and the prophet spoke of different periods and events, when using the same language.—It is beyond all fair controversy, then, that our text related to, and had its fulfilment when the period was "accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people," verse, 7.

The language which heads this article was, undoubtedly familiar to many of the Jews.—Their being represented as dead and in graves was no new thing to them. This was their state in their captivity at Babylon. One of their prophets had addressed their ancestors in similar terms, see Ez. 37, 1, 24, inclusive. After the prophet had, metaphorically, described the wretched and deplorable condition of the sons of Israel in their captivity, he opened his message, "Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, O my people, I will open your GRAVES, and cause you to come up out of your GRAVES, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, O my people, when I have opened your GRAVES, and brought you up out of your GRAVES," verses 12, 13. This part of the subject is too plain to need further comment. For all who are acquainted with the state of the Jews in the apostolick age, know, that their situation rendered a repetition of the prophet's language perfectly appropriate and justifiable. They had been morally alive; and enjoyed the nature, and by faith, the design, of the first covenant. But they had squandered their privileges, and were buried in "the graves" of unbelief and moral death. This was the case with the bulk of the nation. Many of them slept in the dust of the earth, and the consequences of the Messiah's appearing were inevitable. They were to be routed from their "dwelling places," and come forth; they, who, at the awful crisis of the first removal of their dispensation, believed in Jesus, and continued faithful came forth "eis anastasin zoes," to the resurrection of life; or were put in the actual possession of the life which their first covenant only prefigured. [For, whereas, the Jewish dispensation, and land of promise only typified the new Jerusalem or Gospel dispensation, the light of Christianity revealed "life and immortality" beyond this mortal state, by the most indubitable testimony.]—While on the other hand those who continued stubborn and rebellious, came forth "eis anastasin kriseose," to the resurrection of condemnation. They were reminded of the many predictions of the prophets, and which Jesus had repeated in their ears, of the judgement which had long awaited them, which was then gathering thick around their devoted heads. What has been said, will in some measure, account for the reason why the word resurrection is not, in this case applied to the Gentiles.—But let it be farther observed.

1. The word anastasin is derived from the word anisteemi which is made of ana, again, and isteemi, to place, stand, &c. and signifies a placing, standing, or rising again [see Parkhurst on these words.] Therefore, when this word is used for a resurrection to future life it is opposed to "the life which we now live in the flesh." And when it is employed to denote a resurrection to a life of faith as brought to light by some particular dispensation, in this mode of being, it is opposed to the life enjoyed in some previous dispensation.

2. As the Gentiles had not had "a covenant of life and peace," (Matt. 2, 5,) committed to them, it would have been manifestly wrong to have represented their coming as a people, to the life of faith in the gospel, in the same manner as the Jews were. And in our context this seems to have been carefully noticed and studiously avoided.

If it were not for the craft of those whose interest it is to keep the people in ignorance, but whose sun of prosperity is "fast declining," the text above considered and others of the kind, would be given up as teaching the doctrine they are quoted to support. But if this text and others allied to it, favour the horrid scheme of endless wo, it is notorious, that the scriptures are contradictory, for we are there assured that "all nations whom God has made shall come and WORSHIP before him and GLORIFY HIS NAME," Ps. 86, 9.

CONTROVERSIAL.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"A's" REPLY TO W. I. REESE.

The query in the first paragraph of my former communication remains unanswered; viz. Whether our Saviour simply meant that all manner (or kinds) of sin should be forgiven, &c. but that against the Holy Ghost should not be forgiven, Mat. xii. 31, 32. His strictures upon the word but, as being a connective, and not a preposition, is of no consequence to the meaning of the declaration, except upon his assumed construction. I cordially believe that all manner (or species) of sin, except the one in controversy, shall be forgiven upon the condition of repentance; but I do not believe all mankind shall unconditionally share the forgiveness and favor of God,—because my Bible plainly asserts the contrary. He indeed says—"the reverse is the fact;" and the only proof he brings in support is a gratuitous assumption of his own, which does not affect the subject, viz. that the judgement here denounced against blasphemy of the Holy Ghost, was national, and limited to that and the coming age. He has produced nothing which maintains his position, and it of course falls to the ground.—I will only add the plain declaration of Christ,—"Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

His next assumption is, that the Holy Spirit simply means the holy doctrine of Jesus.—Now how the facts which are here recorded, can be predicated of "doctrine" I am at a loss to know. Jesus said that by the spirit he cast out devils. I am not certain what Mr. Reese considers these "devils" to be. He has used the word "demon" in speaking of them; from which I conclude he agrees with me in supposing them literal beings. If so, I cannot see how the "doctrine" of Jesus had any thing to do with their expulsion; for he is always represented as casting them out with a single word of command: whereas, if it was the result of a clear and explicit exhibition of the sublime "doctrine" which he taught, and which had been made the subject of candid and diligent investigation on the part of the recipient, it must have required considerable length of time to effect the object. No countenance is found for such a supposition in the scriptures. But if he considers these "devils" to be merely anti-christian "doctrines" or the corruptions of our nature, I must repeat the question which I asked in my former communication, and which he has not noticed, viz. How could they be transferred from men to swine, and influence them to rush into the sea? From the general insagacity and want of comprehension existing in the swinish race, I should think them illy adapted to such a quick perception of doctrinal propositions or suicidal propensities as to produce the powerful and sudden effect recorded. I can see nothing which should militate against the generally received understanding of the text, viz. that Jesus cast out demons—by (or with the concurrent power and influence) of the Holy Spirit, who is one with the Father and the Son. In another place Mr. R. says that this and the corresponding text in Luke "evidently mean the divine power by which he wrought those miracles." &c. Here, although he may not have discovered it, he has entirely overthrown his former arguments, and erected mine in part, in their stead. For, it will be seen in my preceding remarks, if the expulsion of the demons was procured by the exertion of "divine power" (as it undoubtedly was) there is no room left for the exhibition to them of Gospel "doctrines" for want of time.

His remarks involving Trinitarianism, are to my narrow capacity, without any weight or meaning. He might with as much propriety use the names of William, Thomas, and Henry, indiscriminately as that of the three persons in the Trinity.

In explaining the declaration of Christ that "to him who forgave not men their trespasses neither would our heavenly Father forgive him," he endeavours to refute it by contradicting the text, viz. in saying that our heavenly Father "must forever possess a forgiving disposition towards his offending offspring," and concludes by saying "he who is filled with such a spirit, can have no sense of God's forgiveness." And how can he, when God has not forgiven him? "God is angry with the wicked every day." For support of his position he has adduced some of God's promises to his chosen people:

Next:—In alluding to the circumstance of the failure of the disciples to cast out a demon on a certain time, he says:—"There is no necessity of supposing that those miracles were wrought by preaching, unaided by him who effected the mighty works." But, I have shown that "preaching" had no connexion with their expulsion, but that it was by a direct exertion of divine power.

Mr. R. asks, "Had the blasphemous Jews known him, would they have persecuted him, or derided his doctrine, or would they have crucified him?" If by "knowing him," he means candidly investigating the evidences of his Messiahship, and cordially receiving him in that capacity, I answer, No. If he means having a correct and clear view of his character, I answer, Yes. Jesus himself said to his disciples, the day on which he was betrayed, John XV. 19 &c. "The world hateth you because ye are not of the world. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you for my name sake. They have both seen and hated both me and my Father." And his true disciples have always received the hatred of the world to the present day, in proportion to their faithfulness in his service. "The carnal mind is enmity against God;" and as in the case of the Jews, always manifests its enmity most strongly when his true character is represented most clearly and forcibly. And so far from the Jews having their opposition allayed by devoting his life to their malice, it vented itself with equal fury on his apostles who faithfully presented the same clear truths which he taught; and a bloody persecution caused thousands either to pay the forfeit of their lives, or find refuge in a voluntary banishment from the land of their nativity. No Jew ever became a true christian except by the special renewing influence of the holy spirit. Paul said, in speaking of them, Rom. IX. 18. "God had mercy on whom he would, and whom he would he hardened." And XI. 5. that "at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace,"—of which he himself was a remarkable subject.

He says, "my arrangement of singular pronouns is perfectly harmless, as they might be opposed by nearly the same number of examples, from the same passages, of a plural character;" and alludes to the scribes. It does not at all lessen the force of my argument whether one or ten individuals were guilty of this blasphemy. He must prove that it was a national sin before he assumes that the punishment was national.

With regard to the duration of the punishment threatened, although the original words in Mathew and Mark are sometimes used to signify world, age, or dispensation, yet in Luke they do not admit of equivocation—it shall not be forgiven." This is a full qualification of the meaning of the other parallel passages, and fixes the correctness of the common translation. He refers to Dr. A. Clark's commentary. This I have not access to.

To conclude—We have seen that the malicious scribes wickedly charged the agency of the Holy Spirit to the hellish influence of Satan, and that the Saviour, in voice of awful warning, admonished them that such desperate guilt would procure for them the dreadful wrath of God, never to cease—an awful memento to high-handed sinners in every age. A.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

REPLY TO "A."

SIR,—In attempting an answer to your second communication, I choose to reverse the former mode, and address myself to you. I adopt this method for several reasons which it is not necessary to particularize.

In your answer, you profess to have represented my arguments entire, but of this a generous publick will judge, as well as myself. You say the "query" in your first paragraph respecting the sin against the holy spirit "remains unanswered." Do you mean, Sir, that the subject is not answered according to scripture and reason? or, that I have failed to convince you? If the latter, judging from the character of your reply, I despair at present, of satisfying you. But if the former, the scriptures, and reason, their immortal associate, ought to decide the question, independently of your individual opinion, or mine.—To them I have appealed; and on them I rely for the justness of the cause I have espoused. You have not had the boldness to say, in so many words, that "but" in this controverted passage (Matt. 12 32) is equivalent to except, but you have been begging the question. You observe, however, that what I have said, in regard to it, "is of no consequence to the meaning of the declaration, except on my assumed construction." It seems, then, on my construction there is a difference. But is it "of no consequence to the meaning of the declaration whether, we read but a conjunction or except a preposition? You know better, sir; and the readers of the Advocate will award you a proper meed for this perversion of scripture; and beware, lest God add to you the plagues you have merited. That there is a difference in the meaning of these words, is too plain to admit a question. And if the difference is of "consequence to the meaning of the declaration" on my construction, it is of the same "consequence to the meaning of the declaration" itself; for it was there before I gave my construction.

You say, sir, you "believe that all manner, of sin except the one in controversy, shall be forgiven upon the condition of repentance."—Do you mean to be understood, that you do not believe "the one in controversy shall be forgiven upon the condition of repentance?" "My Bible plainly asserts," that, "if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us FROM ALL UNRIGHTEOUSNESS." And "WHOSOEVER calleth on the name of the Lord shall be saved." But, sir, when have you inserted 'conditions' in your creed? You tell us in your communication about "God's promises to his chosen people" of his having "mercy" on some, and "hardening" others! what are we to understand by this? Had you forgotten, that it is "without any foresight of faith, good works, or ANY CONDITIONS PERFORMED BY THE CREATURE," that God displays his "electing and distinguishing grace." The publick may not be aware, that the above is taken from the creed of Calvin whose sentiment you here acknowledge, and betray the most consummate folly in quoting from the ix. of Rom. to prove it. Is it not according to your creed, sir, that God has, "unconditionally, elected some men and angels to everlasting life, and ordained the rest to eternal death?" And if so, can you avoid believing, that he has, "unconditionally," appointed the means to accomplish both? If this be not the case, on the scheme you have disclosed, what becomes of the "final perseverance of the saints." What, of the doctrine, that "they may fall partially, and would fall totally and finally, but for the grace of God which keepeth the feet of his saints?" Do you give up, sir, that the number of the elect, and of the reprobate, "is so definite and certain," that the one cannot admit of an addition nor the other of a diminution? Are the above absurdities calculated "to comfort all (or any) that mourn?" You must first ascertain who have, and who have not, committed the sin against the Holy Spirit. And to whom will you go? to the saints? They have all sinned against "light and knowledge." Dare you presume to comfort them? Will you go to the "unregenerate?" Your creed furnishes no warrant to administer consolation to them! And if you attempt it, sir, the publick may be assured you do it at the expense of Calvinism! Only let your doctrine be exposed, and it would sufficiently disgrace itself. But you can pretend to conditions too!! I perceive it is becoming extremely unfashionable to preach or publish Calvinism without a little Armenianism with it!! Go on, Sir, and you will learn that community are not as stupid as you imagine. Their eyes are opening! By and by they will discover the trick and expose the artifice, and leave you and your order to weep and gnash your teeth! Modern preaching plainly shows, that the scheme of election and reprobation is good for nothing without an admixture of Armenianism; and the modern covenant of works has usually made some pretensions to grace to keep it from sinking. Add these two systems together and what is the amount? Naught to naught, etc!!

You say, Sir, "you do not believe all mankind shall unconditionally share the forgiveness and favour of God," (and what of that? Will your unbelief make the faith of God without effect? But your reason comes) "because your Bible asserts to the contrary." Indeed! Is your Bible different from those in common use! "My Bible plainly asserts," "And in this mountain SHALL THE LORD OF HOSTS MAKE unto ALL PEOPLE a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees; of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And HE WILL DESTROY in this mountain the face of the covering cast over ALL PEOPLE, and the veil that is spread over ALL NATIONS. HE WILL SWALLOW UP DEATH IN victory, and the LORD GOD WILL WIPE AWAY TEARS FROM OFF ALL FACES; and the rebuke of his people WILL HE TAKE away from off ALL THE EARTH." Isa. xxv. 6, 8. Are there any conditions here? Again, "My Bible plainly asserts," "For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their minds and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for all shall know me from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." Heb. 8. 10, 12. Do you perceive any conditions here? Further; "My Bible plainly asserts," that the mystery of GOD'S WILL according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, is, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times HE might gather together in one, ALL things, in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth." And we are assured, "that he works all things after the counsel of HIS OWN WILL." Eph. 1, 9, 11. And further; "My Bible plainly asserts," that GOD "WILL HAVE all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth."—And Jesus "gave himself a ransom for ALL to be testified in DUE TIME." 1st Tim. 2 4, 6. I could collect evidence from the testimony of all the holy prophets by whom God has spoken of "the restitution of all things," (Acts 3. 21,) but the above is sufficient. When you have ability and leisure, show me and the publick the "conditions," in these texts, if there be any.

Sir, I profess not to be faultless in life nor in sentiment. But I will venture an opinion, that no candid mind would dictate, nor honest inquirer after truth assume the trifling course you have taken. Shall we never have done with assertion without proof, and low evasion?

When you show by direct scriptural evidence, that the Jews were not punished nationally, for their accumulated crimes, that the sin against the holy spirit was not one of them, and, that the duration of their punishment was not limited to the then existing age and the one to follow, as clearly as I have proved the affirmative, I will not neglect to answer you. You may object, that it is not your province to prove a negative. I reply, your negative came when I had adduced my arguments and testimony, and you must prove them false, or misapplied, before mere assertion will be considered valid.

Your strong hold appears to be the subject of the holy spirit. I have said, Sir, and think I have furnished some evidence of the fact, that the holy spirit (Matt 12 32) implies the holy doctrine of Jesus. My proofs and arguments you have not attempted to answer. And until you meet what I have said it is useless to add more in its defence. Be patient Sir, in due time I will notice what you have said concerning demons, which appears not to be involved in the present subject. See current volume Gospel Advocate, page 93, vol. 2, 1, §.

Your caution respecting the trinity was well timed. But if I may with the same propriety use William, Thomas, Henry, indiscriminately, as the names "of the three persons in the trinity," has not trinitarianism ceased to be what it was formerly?

I fearlessly submit to the publick what I have said of the forgiveness of God in my Exposition and reply to you without adding a word here. But as before, so I say now, when you shall have disproved my arguments it will be time enough to meet you. Mere assertion you will find of but little service to you.

What I have said about your "singular pronouns," it appears, "does not at all lessen your argument!" O no! nothing will lessen your argument! there is no difference between "one [and] ten individuals," nor between "one and three" if it be but orthodox!! But where is your argument? Sir, when you point it out, I will look at it.

You admit, that the word Aion, sometimes is "used to signify world, age, or disension." Very well. But in Luke the subject admits of no "equivocation,"—"it shall not be forgiven." Perhaps, then, because it is said of Idumea, &c "it shall not be quenched night nor day, the smoke thereof shall go up for ever, from generation to generation it shall lay waste, none shall pass through it for ever and ever." (Isa. 34, 10.) The fire shall burn to all eternity! Sir, look at your logick. If the subject admits of no equivocation I will only add "Physician, heal thyself."

"To conclude," you say, we have seen &c. And what have we seen? Why among other things, "that the Saviour, in a voice of awful warning, admonished them that such desperate guilt would procure for them the dreadful wrath of God, never to cease!" And where have we seen this? in your arguments? I never disputed that every one shall receive according to his deeds. As you, in conclusion, have told us what "we have seen," I, "to conclude," will observe what John heard. "And every creature which is in heaven and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea; an ALL THAT ARE IN THEM, HEARD I SAYING, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be to him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb forever and ever." ## ADVOCATE AND INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

GOOD TIDINGS FROM THE WEST.

A letter from an esteemed correspondent, bearing date Cincinnati, O. June 21, 1827, has been received which brings the welcome intelligence that our brethren there have been favoured with a visit from brother E. Case, Jr. whose gifted labours were well received. He tarried at that place about four weeks. Our correspondent adds:—"A lot of ground, and materials for building a Meeting house have been procured, and the house will probably be erected this season. A Universalist Society has been lately formed in this place, and incorporated." Thus, then, we behold the march of Truth! Truly, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth! How fervently ought we to bless the Father of Mercies for what he is doing in our world!

Although the powers of the earth seem to have combined their strength to stop the progress of liberal principles, yet truth marches onward in an unprecedented manner, demolishing the airy fabricks of error, and pulling down the strong refuges of the adversary. Truly our eyes have seen the salvation of God, and our ears are saluted with good tidings of great joy.

NOTICE.

We are requested by Mr. George W. Brooks, of Sullivan, Madison co. N. Y. to give notice, "that he is no longer an Universalist Preacher, and disclaims all fellowship with the order." His reasons for this withdrawing himself are not communicated. N. B. Editors of Universalist publications are requested to give this an insertion. ED. GOS. ADV.

THE OLIVE BRANCH, &c.

The above is the title of a religious paper, published weekly at N. Y. by the N. Y. Universalist Book Society, and devoted to the cause of Truth. We conclude it is conducted by the President of the Book Society, Br. A. Kneeland, assisted by other gentlemen of that association. The well known talents of Br. K., we doubt not, will secure the Olive Branch a favourable reception from the publick; and we sincerely hope it may obtain a liberal patronage.

As we are frequently called upon for information relative to the merits of the different publications in this State, we embrace this opportunity to give an opinion. This is done with a view to promote what is honestly considered the publick good, and does not arise from interested motives. And, if there should be a greater degree of freedom used by the editors of universalist papers in expressing their views on the subject, it would doubtless produce more concert of action and unanimity of feeling than has hitherto existed among them.

There are at this time no less than five papers published by our order in the State of New-York; viz. the Olive Branch, at New-York; the Evangelical Repository, at Troy; the Utica Magazine, at Utica; the Day Star, at Potsdam; and the Gospel Advocate, at this place. A word as to their claims on the patronage of the order.—The Olive Branch is entitled to the support of the publick on many accounts. Its size, its location, the ability of its editors, &c. &c. are so many reasons why it should be upheld and sustained. New-York, being the great commercial emporium of the State, affords facilities for obtaining and circulating information, not possessed by any other place in the Union, and so long as the Olive Branch continues to be faithfully conducted, it shall receive all the aid in our power to bestow. The Evangelical Repository at Troy, is edited by our esteemed and worthy brother L. Willis. It is of the same size of this paper, and conducted with moderation and ability. It is published semi-monthly, and neatly executed. We have always doubted the propriety of having so many papers, and still have serious apprehensions that a pecuniary loss may be sustained by the publisher of the Repository;—we hope, however, our apprehensions may never be realised. It is cheerfully conceded that local feelings should be gratified, in all cases where it can be done without detriment to the cause generally; but facts which have already transpired, prove incontestibly, that the general, and not the local advancement of the cause should be the governing motive with our brethren. Next in order is the Utica Magazine. It is edited by our excellent brother D. Skinner, and published "under the patronage of the Convention of Universalists of the state of New-York." We hope our readers will not be alarmed at the name of this Convention, which has taken a paper under its protection; for we conceive the name of more consequence than all it ever has done, or ever can do in either benefitting or injuring the cause of universalism in this state. The Magazine is well conducted—and we hope well supported. But we protest against official interference in its behalf. We deem the measure unjust, oppressive, and fraught with the very worst of consequences to our order. It is unjust, because the Convention, in extending their official patronage to any one periodical, necessarily infringes upon the rights of others;—it is oppressive, inasmuch as it is designed to bring into the field of fair competition, the magick influence of a name, calculated to add a nominal value to the paper of their choice:—it is fraught with the worst of consequences, because it establishes a precedent, which, if followed by the order generally, must unavoidably lead to difficulties more easily imagined than described, and more easily prevented than cured. When, therefore, the respected editor of the Utica Magazine, shall see proper to let his paper stand on its own merits, and take from its imprint the name of a self-created Convention, the authority of which has never been acknowledged by our order generally, (and we predict it never will be acknowledged in its present form) then, we shall be proud to prove ourselves its friends. Of the Day Star, we can say nothing, as those who conduct it, have not condescended to forward the numbers to us.

If dear SELF may come in for a share of this notice, we would only say, the Gospel Advocate, is, and ever shall be devoted to the cause of divine truth. We have persevered in the good cause—and, our word for it—no pains shall be spared to render it interesting and useful to our kind, liberal, and indulgent patrons.

THE MOUNTAIN IN LABOUR.

In the "Albany Christian Register" of June 30, is an apology of a reply to a correspondent of ours, who in answer to a passing remark which appeared in a former number of the Register, stated certain stubborn facts relative to the sentiments of divers persons who have committed suicide and other enormous crimes. The compiler of the Register seems to have no time at present to reply in a "suitable manner" to our correspondent; and so we are left to wonder what awaits us in the womb of time. If the publick can endure such improper trifling as is conspicuous in the columns of the Register, upon so important a subject, we deplore the moral condition of our world. We press the matter home, and demand a candid reply to the facts as stated by our correspondent. If the conductor of the Register fails to reply in an ingenuous manner, we shall beg leave to think he cannot. His vulgar attempts at ridicule and his effort to pervert the title of our paper, are alike ungenerous and unchristian. We have read something about "hypocrites and unbelievers"—and if nothing prevents we may write something about such characters.

ERROUR EXPOSED.

"The editors of the 'Gospel Advocate,' printed at Buffalo, have made themselves quite merry at the circumstance of one or two professors of religion being engaged in the counterfeiting business here, and supposing that they have made out a stiff argument in favor of their own particular tenets, universal salvation. No one believes that a mere profession of religion is a guarantee to the public against crime.—But when they advert to the subject again they can mention on as good testimony as they did in the other cases, that some half a dozen persons professing a belief in the doctrine which the "Advocate" inculcates, are also implicated, and a preacher of it among the rest."

The above is extracted from the Painsville, O. Telegraph of June 22. It alludes to an article in our twenty-third number, under the title of "Black List, No. 2." The statement then made by us, was simply this; viz. that one P. B. Andrews, a great stickler for the "salu- tary" doctrine of hell-fire, and brimstone for the wicked, was found to be guilty of "making the dies for stamping counterfeit coin" for a gang of counterfeiters recently detected at Painesville,—and, "that the father of the young coiners (a member of the Methodist church) held prayer meetings and conferences at his house, &c. while his sons were in the cellar making spurious coin."

Our statement seems to have given offence to our friend of the Telegraph, and, judging from the spirit of his article on the subject, we conclude he has been wounded in the house of his friends. One fact appears very plain. The editor of the Telegraph knows our remarks were substantially correct, and with all his hard faced prejudice he has not dared to contradict them. It stands confessed, then, that P. B. Andrews, who was so afraid licentiousness would prevail in consequence of preaching universalism, that little more than a year since he went from house to house to prevent people from attending our meetings—yes, and exhorted universalists to forsake their doctrine, lest it should lead them to some dreadful end; this same godly, pious, sanctified P. B. Andrews is acknowledged by his friends, to have been guilty of a heinous offence against the laws of our country. And farther:—it is tacitly acknowledged, that other professors of religion (endless misery) have also been guilty of the same crime! Now really, we do not expect to make out of all this, and a thousand other instances of the same kind, a very "stiff argument" in favour of our tenets; we only gave it as a set-off against the slanderous accusations of our misguided orthodox brethren. We are not the aggressors:—they began the game, and we mean they shall have their due.

We are next told by Mr. Howe of the Telegraph, "that some half a dozen persons professing a belief in the doctrine which the Advocate inculcates, are also implicated, and a preacher of it among the rest." We have delayed any reply, until a statement of facts could be obtained from some "good testimony"—even better than the editor of the Painesville Telegraph can afford. The result is as we expected. Gentlemen of the first respectability have called upon the editor of the above paper, and he refused to mention a single universalist who had been either directly or indirectly implicated in that disgraceful transaction!! And, what is more,—we are now prepared to state, for the information of the publick, that the charge preferred against us, and our order, by the editor of the Telegraph, above quoted, is a base and infamous falsehood! There is not (we assert it from a full conviction of the facts,)—there is not the shadow of truth in his assertion that any person professing our doctrine, or known as a universalist, much less a preacher of our sentiments, ever has been justly implicated in that disgraceful affair. And if the said E. D. Howe refuses or neglects to make all suitable acknowledgements to the publick, and perseveres in his malicious insinuations, we have good reason to believe that he will find out by sad experience, that all his assumed sanctity will not shield him from a just recompense of reward.

N. B. We deem it an act of justice, to state, that the "father of the young coiners," alluded to in our former remarks, was not a member of the methodist church.—The person who prayed, and exhorted so much, while his accomplices were carrying on their work, was a methodist Exhorter, by the name of Munn. The father of the young men was not chargeable either with having added to the guilt of counterfeiting that of hypocrisy, nor of counterfeiting at all. He is, for aught that appears, entirely innocent.

A most wonderful dog has lately been exhibited at Scudder's Museum, N. York. He will do acts at the bidding of his master, which would seem almost incredible—picking out particular cards, &c. An estimate of his value may be judged of, from the fact that three fourths of the property of him, was last week sold at $1000; the original owner retained the other quarter.

GOD IS LOVE.

Who with unhallowed breath doth dare refute,
This mandate written in the azure skies?
Who's he that would spread o'er this beauteous earth,
The threats of an eternal woe to man?
Was't not the fiat of the Great Supreme,
That in His image He did man create,
And poured His spirit into human clay,
And gave him life to yield him every good,
Commensurate with his imperfect state?
And did he love him not? Did he not give
A proof that man should be immortal, there,
Where seraph spirits worship and adore,
Singing the theme eternal, God is Love?
The flesh may sink into its mother earth,
And worms may riot on its cold remains;
The gates of Hades shut it from the light,
And into dust primeval it may turn;
But that pure spirit which th' Almighty gave,
Holy—unsullied from the fount of heaven,
Shall still retain its essence, all divine,
And bloom ethereal in those realms on high,
Where angels chaunt forever, GOD IS LOVE.

CONTROVERSIAL.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

SIR—Agreeably to promise I enter upon an examination of the doctrine of demons, to which allusion is made in your letter.

You observe, that from my use of the word demon, I probably agree with you in "supposing them literal beings." We shall see, presently, how far we agree, in this, if you suppose them "literal beings." By which you probably mean intelligent spiritual "beings," tormentors of mankind, acting in conjunction with their prince.

As I look upon this doctrine as dishonourable to Him 'who is GOOD to ALL and whose tender mercies are over all his works,' I am either mistaken in regard to it, or what tends to honor and glorify God. In my examination of this article, I shall take up the subject without any particular regard to the one which induced this controversy. And although, as you say, by admitting that Jesus casts out demons by the power of God, I have "entirely overthrown my former arguments," if I should admit any thing here, tending to a farther debasement of my arguments, let it be so, if by the means, truth may be brought to light. I will only observe here, that I knew what I said; and why I said it, when I declared that in which you think you see an overthrow of my arguments. In a subsequent communication we and the publick may see how justly you exult, and how far my concessions have established your "arguments."

In, a question like the one here presented, it is necessary to inquire, 1. Is the common belief of the doctrine of demons consistent with common sense, and sober reason compared with the revealed character of our Heavenly Father. 2. Is it consistent with the views of antiquity. 3. Is it consistent with the doctrine of the New Testament, properly understood.

1. Common sense and reason teach, that as man was formed of the earth—that his temporal nourishments are all from the same source, and perishable like himself—that in him are contained the means of transmitting mortal existence to his species, who, of course must grow in wisdom and stature, it is not possible, that the human mind or body should be unsubjected to change. The passions and propensities of mankind, which are necessary to their existence, happiness and protection, are a farther proof of this. These passions were no more made for purposes of rebellion, than our teeth were for the purpose of aching. Our teeth were given us for ornament and use; but from their very nature they are liable to decay, and, consequently, to pain. Our passions, likewise, were given us for the best purposes; but from the mutability of our nature, and their very constitution they are liable to err, otherwise we never should err. We ought to look upon our passions and propensities, as a family of subjects needing government, though useful in their proper place, and we should allow reason to preside over, and direct them, and keep them within due bounds. But how frequently do our passions rebel, and precipitate us into misery! How much caution and watchfulness are necessary, then, that the end for which they were bestowed may be answered! And, frequently, when we would do good, evil is present. The very circumstance, that we are often overcome by them, proves, that they are sometimes, more than equal to the force we oppose. But this, in my apprehension, may successfully be guarded against, if we would let reason prescribe, by taking into consideration all the unhappy circumstances which inevitably arise from vicious conduct. Now as these defects arise from our very constitution, which necessarily should be as it is, or it would have been different, no one can infer any want of goodness in the Deity for making us just such creatures as we by nature are—especially, as the Scriptures "abundantly" testify, that he chastens us for our profit. For one, I can say, I am satisfied with my existence, and believe it was an act of goodness in bestowing it, but I am not without error, weakness nor want. But are all our constitutional appetites and passions insufficient, and has the Almighty permitted, or superadded a host of malicious agents for the trial of our virtue? Is it reasonable to say, that, in addition to the law in our members which wars against the law of the mind, and brings us into captivity to the law of sin, the God of Heaven, instead of providing a way whereby we may escape temptation, or enable us to bear it, will add force to force? Is this consistent with the character of HIM who is "kind to the unthankful and the evil—who sends rain on the just and on the unjust, and causes his sun to rise on the evil and on the good?" Is it consistent with the loving kindness of HIM who succours his distressed, afflicted and tempted children, and is the Friend, and not the enemy of mankind?

2. Demonology is a very ancient doctrine, but it has undergone some considerable change. *"Some have supposed that the word demon, in the sacred writings, always implies an evil spirit or devil; but this is a conceit of St. Austin and others which will not bear investigation. Demons, according to the Gentile Mythology, were middle powers between the sovereign God and mortal men, who performed the office of Mediators and executioners of the divine purposes. Of this opinion was Plato, the most competent judge and consummate writer on these subjects.—Apuleius de Deo Socratis, affirms "the demons are middle powers by whom all our desires and deserts pass to the gods. It would derogate from the majesty of the celestial Gods to be concerned about such things; therefore all things are done by the will, power and authority of the celestial Gods but by the obedience and ministry of the demons."

"It is abundantly manifest from the best writers of antiquity, that demons were the supposititious ghosts of dead men. Hesiod, a most ancient writer, who flourished nine hundred years before Christ, describes that happy race of men who lived in the first, or golden age of the world as being promoted, after death, to the rank of demons by the will of Jupiter; and appointed to be the guardians of men, and the observers of their good and evil actions. Plato agrees with Hesiod and admits, that he and many of the poets speak well in affirming, that when good men die, they obtain great honour and dignity, and become Demons. In another place he maintains, that all, who die valiantly in war, are admitted into Hesiod's golden generation, and constituted Demons. Eusebius and Theodoret both cite and approve these passages from Hesiod and Plato, and use them as an argument for similar dignity and honours being bestowed on saints and martyrs. Hence it is clear from the writings of the greatest men of antiquity, that the term demon, originally and properly applied to deified dead men. In this very sense it was understood by the philosophers at Athens in the days of Paul; for when he preached Jesus and the resurrection, they thought he wished to introduce Christ to them as a demon, or deified dead man. Accordingly they say, "he seemeth to be a setter forth of strange Demons." Acts, 17, 18. But here our translators, for the only time, have rendered the word Gods! From Plutarch we learn "it was an ancient opinion, that some of these demons, fearing, that good men might rival them in honour and happiness, or attain to equal dignity, endeavoured to prevent them in the pursuit of virtue. Accordingly, it became the opinion of later philosophers, that part of the demons were wicked and malignant. Josephus', wars, B 7. C. 6. says, "these evil demons were no others than the spirits of the wicked, who enter the bodies of the living and kill them, unless they obtain help against them."

From all that I can gather from the opinions of learned ancient writers, among whom is Origen, Plotinus, and Hypocrates, who was the father of medicine in his day, the sum of the doctrine under view, is well expressed in the following moral from the work mentioned in the margin. "Demoniacs were insane or epileptic persons, who were incurable in those days of medical ignorance; and therefore, from the violence of the symptoms, were regarded by the superstitions, as possessed by diabolical agents. See the learned Joseph Mede on John 10, 20, and "Lardner and Farmer on the Demoniacs of the New Testament."

3. The general opinion of eminent men of antiquity should have some influence in settling this question. And the most, I apprehend, that can be said in opposition to the view advanced above, from the New Testament, is a mere play of words. In the common version, we read of some sacrificing to devils, Lev. 17, 7, 2. and Deut. 32, 17: of priests for the devils, 2. Chron. 11, 15: of some sacrificing their son's to the devils, Ps. 106, 37: of table, cup, and fellowship of devils, 1. Cor. 10, 20, 21, when we are told by Paul that the "things which the Gentiles offer, they offer to demons, and not to God." The chief difficulty attending this subject, is, that the demons are represented as speaking aside from the possessed. But a little attention to this matter, will, I think, with many, remove the obstacle. How often do we hear it said of persons under the influence of violent passion, or of ardent spirits, that they are not themselves—that they are mad-men, or beasts, i. e. because their conduct is mad and beastly. This is almost the exact language employed by the Jews against Jesus, John, 10, 20, "he hath a demon, and is mad." Now, that they did, sometimes, call the person supposed to be possessed the demon itself, see the reply, v. 21. "These are not the words of him who hath a demon. Can A DEMON open the eyes of the blind?"

It will be admitted that most of the Evangelists wrote in Greek, the prevailing language in their day. And we have seen, that demonology, in the time of our Lord, was not what it was more anciently, though we read of "a spirit of an unclean demon," which certainly supposes demons of an opposite character. "To be clothed with a person, or thing is a Greek mode of speech," says Dr. A. Clarke, "for being that person or thing, with which a man is said to be clothed." See his note on 1 Pet. 5, 5. I would here suggest for candid consideration, then, whether in common language, "to be possessed of a demon," was not also a "Greek mode of speech for that demon of which a man was said to be possessed."—Comp. John 10, 21, above. That this is a mode of speech among us, with some modification, is obvious. And the instances mentioned in this article, I think make it manifest. Instance a man intoxicated with ardent spirits—his whole conduct and conversation are changed, and he appears in an entirely different character. In this case, do we not, with propriety, say, that the whole action and discourse of the man proceed from the demon or spirit of which he is possessed? The same may be said of violent passion, fits, and insanity.

Allowing, then, the validity of the above "Greek mode of speech," which I think will not be controverted, where is the perplexity in understanding how demons spake? I freely acknowledge, that, at first view, there appears a difficulty in the circumstance of Jesus not suffering the demons to speak because they knew him. But it is not improbable, that those demoniacs had seen Jesus before, and if they had not, it is manifest, that they had heard of him, and could distinguish him by the marked attention he received from his disciples and the multitude. And, as it is the case, that, under the influence of mental derangement, and other diseases where bodily vigour is not impaired, as was the instance under review, the powers of recollection in regard to some particular facts, are remarkably acute. It ought to be noticed, that, according to the account, they did speak, and that irreverently too. And, perhaps, all that was intended, by the expression, was, that, as their language had been improper, he suffered them not to continue while under the influence of madness. Should it be objected, "that Jesus addressed himself directly to the demon," saying, "Come out, &c. thou foul spirit," I reply, I can see no weight in the objection, allowing the application of the above "mode of speech," and nearly the same use of it amongst ourselves: for the disease gave character and tone to the man, who in familiar speech, had ceased to be himself. Another difficulty here presents—the petition of the demons to go into the swine. But this single circumstance, though it may not be easily accounted for, should not militate against the subject as far as my other facts render it plain. For as personification of the supposed demon, or discase, had been introduced, perhaps no more was designed than to continue the narrative in a connected, unbroken, though figurative style, to account in the way he had commenced, for the passage of the demons into the swine. Or it might have been recorded in a more rigid compliance to the particular views entertained in those days: And though neither of these suppositions may be entirely correct, yet as the general features of the case are easily developed, I think particulars in a question like this, candour will not insist on. These things apart then—as the owners of the herd professed to keep the law, and carried on a traffic in direct violation of the law, it is not unreasonable to suppose, that Jesus, by his miraculous power, transferred the disease whatever it may have been, from the man or men, to the swine as a judgement upon those violations of that law which forbid the use of swine's flesh.

It will, likely, be objected here, that this view of the subject represents Jesus as acting a double part. But I must think otherwise, and think I can make it appear, but want of room will oblige me to curtail my remarks more than I could wish. Then let it be noticed, 1. Jesus came to bear testimony to the truth, and not formally, to refute the thousands of superstitions prevalent in his day. For if he had, he might have been constantly employed aside from the purpose for which he came. Besides his own doctrine contrasted with the sottish notions of the Jews, and thereby showing its preference, would be more likely to produce conviction than a different course.—2. It is not derogatory to the character of Jesus, to say, that he availed himself of the sentiments of the people by which he more directly approached their sympathies. This was both proper and necessary, as the people were not in a situation to be reasoned with, but he, by no means, adopted their views as his own. Take for an example, the case where Jesus asks, Should not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom satan hath bound, lo! these eighteen years, be loosed on the sabbath day? But observe, he expressly calls her case an INFIRMITY, which, perhaps, was no more than general debility, a disease common in all ages. 3. The labours of Jesus in the days of his flesh, were rather introductory to his heavenly system, than otherwise. And his apostles, when commanded to preach the gospel to every creature, opposed openly and with their might, the superstitions and idolatry of the people, and before this time the "demons were subject to them." Nor have they any where countenanced the doctrine of demons, but have stoutly opposed it. See 1. Tim. iv. and 1. Cor. x. chapters, &c. So far then from Jesus acting a double part, he took the course that would best subserve his purpose.

Yours, &c.

AN INQUIRY.

MR. EDITOR:—You will confer a favour upon one who sometimes reads the Advocate, by giving your views on Luke xi. 26. last clause; ["and the last state of that man is worse than the first,"] and reconcile it with the sentiments of Universalists. J. E.

REPLY TO THE FOREGOING.

The passage quoted by J. E. relates to the past, and then present, condition of a man, who, after having been divested of an evil spirit, concluded to take to himself seven other spirits worse than himself, and return to the house whence he came out, and dwell there.

The first and last conditions of the man spoken of, are relative to each other, and do not imply the idea that the first was in this life, and the last in eternity, as has been supposed. This will appear from what follows.

The first state of this man was distinguished by the circumstance of his having one "unclean spirit."—This is evident from the context, verse 24. His last state was that in which he concluded to take to himself seven spirits more wicked than himself, and return to his house, which had been swept and garnished. His entering in and dwelling there, in company with so many wicked spirits, was truly a deplorable state of things—as much worse than his former condition, as it is to have seven devils rather than one. The following facts justify this interpretation:

1. There appears to be a direct allusion in the text, to the circumstance of his having seven evil spirits, when mention is made of the last state or condition of the man, and the taking to himself those spirits, is what rendered this last state so much worse than the first.

2. There is nothing in the text or context to justify the common opinion entertained by our orthodox friends, and therefore, we ought not to receive such unsupported assumptions.

Now, if the question should be asked, why was the last state of that man worse than the first, our answer is, seven evil spirits are worse than one. If it should yet remain in the dark, we would beg attention to what follows.

Our Lord introduced and used the subject under examination, to illustrate and enforce an important fact; to wit, that a man may be divested of an impure propensity, and be renewed in the spirit of his mind, and afterwards become more a "child of hell" than before. The subject teaches us, that merely casting out an impure spirit, is but the preparatory step to a genuine reformation. It is a fact, attested by the experience of every man of observation, that converts, who for a season enjoy the renewing influence of divine grace, frequently return to their "wallowing in the mire," and take to themselves more evil spirits than they possessed before their minds had been exercised. We assume this as a fact, without stopping here to consider the ordinary causes of such unfortunate results.

Persons often imagine they are converted to a love of God, and think they have got religion, when in fact they have only lost, for the time being, an impure spirit. How frequently do we hear the shouts of the happy subjects of God's love—their cry of liberty—their strains of praise, when if they are interrogated, they are found unable to give a reason for their hope, or assign a cause for their happiness. These persons have only been delivered of an evil spirit, and are liable to seek unsuccessfully for rest, and finding none, they often take to their former practices, and become worse than ever they were before. Unless the love of God is shed abroad in the heart, and has its influence upon the understanding, there is no certainty of a continuance of those ecstasies which most generally follow the expulsion of a devil.

Again:—The impure spirit, which in the first instance went out of the man, has been supposed to be a fallen angel, or orthodox devil; but it is not essential that we should assent to such an opinion. The term "spirit" is used, frequently, to signify doctrines, and propensities of the heart. See 1. John iv. 1. "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world." It may be supposed, then, that the unclean spirit was a propensity to neglect the great salvation. It was not an adversary to the truth, but a disposition to disregard it—not a spirit of direct and open hostility to Christ, but a predominant inclination to say "let us alone, what have we to do with thee" &c. The seven wicked spirits, which the man in his second state took to himself, may also be considered as evil propensities, engendered in the heart by false doctrines, and possessing a degree of malignity beyond that which had influenced the man while in the condition first described. Whenever a doctrine is received into the heart, it has an effect; and such effect is either good or bad, according to the nature of the doctrine believed. Grapes cannot be gathered of thorns, nor figs of thistles; neither can the heart remain pure while the doctrines which influence it are corrupt.

An illustration of the foregoing facts is furnished in a modern conversion. The subject, in his first state, is indifferent in his feelings and views of religion; he has heard of Christ and him crucified; but neither the magnitude of His love, nor the efficacy of His grace, has any considerable effect upon his heart, or his life. True, the natural benevolence of his soul is brought into operation by the miseries of suffering humanity,—he mourns with those that mourn—rejoices with those that rejoice, and weeps with the afflicted; but as yet he is not alive to those momentous subjects which concern his present and eternal peace. At length, the spirit of slumber leaves him, and his eyes are opened; he sees "men as trees walking,"—he has a glimpse of the love of God, and his soul is in an ecstasy! His language then is,—"of the bounties of God's house there is enough and to spare." He then regards all his fellow beings with love and kindness; and thinks, and feels, that he would as soon be damned himself, as to have others damned. He realizes, that the unclean spirit is gone out of him; and for a moment enjoys a "comfortable hope." But not finding the condition of others like his own, and being yet unacquainted with the exceeding riches of the grace of God, as exhibited in the gospel, he soon begins to doubt the salvation of his fellow beings! He finds in his own heart a desire for the conversion and deliverance of the whole world,—he prays for it; but alas, HE DOUBTS! He cannot make "the prayer of faith." He seeks for rest; but finding none, he forms the resolution to conform to popular opinion; and, ten to one, he becomes possessed of as many devils as were cast out of Mary Magdalene in days of old.

Perhaps this unfortunate man, at first imbibes the opinion, that although his own deliverance from an unclean spirit, was entirely a work of grace, yet, that other sinners, no worse than himself, are objects of divine indignation. This produces a partial frame of mind, and leads to a partial course of conduct. He at once adopts the wisdom of this world, which is opposed to that which is from above, and soon begins to say, that it would be just in God to punish, everlastingly, nine tenths of the human race. This spirit soon engenders another kindred propensity; and Hatred is cherished in the heart towards all whom God is supposed to hate. At length these two spirits give birth to a third: A spirit of Cruelty and Revenge, begins to take the place of love; and soon we hear this child of God declare, that "if every body goes to heaven, he does not wish to go there." He talks about the happiness to be derived from beholding the miseries of the damned in hell; and tells the world, that he can witness the untold sufferings of "infants not a span long," without any unpleasant sensations! Anticipations like these, soon produce in his mind a spirit of Indifference towards mankind here on earth. While beholding the miseries of the widow, and fatherless child, he pauses to inquire whether they have "got religion;" and if they do not belong to the "household of faith," he turns from them with complacency, and gives what he has to bestow, to "convert the heathen" to his own precious faith! Soon a spirit of Persecution enters his heart; and he begins to "deal damnation round the world, on each he deems his foe." He reviles the characters, misrepresents the faith, and neglects the persons, of those who differ with him in matters of opinion. Indeed, if he can gain some particular object, he may indulge a lying spirit, thinking the end will justify and sanctify the means. Next, Pride predominates in the heart, and from the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh. He begins to thank God that he has been converted, and is "not like other men;"—he talks about the popularity of his views—the antiquity of his religion—the respectability of its votaries—the elegance of the house in which he worships, and the satisfaction he derives from humility! Last, as a necessary concomitant of the preceding, Hypocrisy becomes an inmate of his heart! Notwithstanding he professes a willingness to have thousands damned, he prays for the salvation of all;—although the malignity of hell dwells in his bosom, he professes to love his fellow creatures;—although he is unwilling to enter heaven in company with sinners, he would have the world consider him an example of humility!

The foregoing hints will serve as a brief outline of our views of this subject; and if we are not deceived, the last state of many professors, is much worse than the first. The pride, partiality, hatred, cruelty, indifference, malignity and hypocrisy, which of necessity are engendered in the heart by the partial systems of religion now propagated in our world, are so many spirits, which are begotten of hell. Indeed, we have often thought, that those feelings, and emotions, which are engendered by the partial systems of the day, although they are sought after with honest zeal, are almost without an exception, the worst evils that can befall the human race.

REMARKS.

1. Love and charity can only be produced by a sense of the divine and impartial love of God. A full conviction of the fact, that God loves ALL HIS CREATURES, furnishes permanent rest, and enduring joy to the soul; but any thing short of this, may endure for a moment, but can never afford substantial happiness. How necessary it is, then, that all should know the truth that maketh free.

2. Much depends upon the manner of casting out an evil spirit. The Jews accused our Lord of casting out demons by Beelzabub, the prince of demons, but in reply to their accusations, he gave them to understand, that a house divided against itself cannot prosper, and therefore, it should be inferred, from the efficacy of his attempts to expel impure spirits, that he cast them out by the power and wisdom of Heaven. Whenever, therefore, our christian brethren of the limited faith, attempt to cast out devils, they should do it in the name of the God of Love, and not by the fear or influence of the devil. Experience proves, that whenever an impure spirit is cast out of a man by the fear of the devil, the subject will return to his former practices as soon as his alarming apprehensions subside.

3. It is true, we honestly believe, that, in a majority of instances, those who are converted to the orthodox faith, by orthodox means, are generally in a worse state than before. They too often become bigotted in their opinions, illiberal in their feelings, and haughty in their deportment. If we are wrong in this opinion, we are ready to be convinced of our error by beholding something like humility and condescension on the part of those who think they are righteous and despise others. Words, unaccompanied by suitable conduct, will fail to convince us.

The above observations are respectfully submitted for the consideration of J. E. and our readers generally, with a full conviction that they originate in a good intention. It is unnecessary to make any attempts to reconcile the text with the views of Universalists, as it will be obvious, to the reader, that it implies nothing like unreconciliation with the doctrine of an universal salvation from all things that offend, and all misery consequential on the existence of evil spirits.

TO OUR PATRONS AND READERS.

During an absence of a few weeks, there appeared in the Advocate some articles on the preaching of females, over the signature of T. F. (at that time the junior editor of this paper) which seem to have given umbrage to our readers. Several communications on the subject have been received since Br. T. F. has left the establishment; and were it not entirely inexpedient, they should be inserted. We would ever be frank and ingenuous in acknowledging our own faults; but it would be imprudent and quite repugnant to our feelings, to make confessions for others, even should candid reflection produce in them, a sense of the impropriety of the measures they may have pursued. We honestly believe that T. F. intended no harm in the publication of the articles alluded to, but years of experience will doubtless convince him of the propriety of a more guarded manner of communicating his ideas. And, indeed, no one, we venture to affirm, can more regret an injury to the feelings of others, than he whose remarks have been censured.

The foregoing, we hope, will serve as an apology to our friend S. H. F. of Ashtabula, for not inserting his well written remarks; and while we reluctantly lay aside his communication, we seriously promise to do all in our power to prevent the recurrence of a like "cause of offence." We must also apologize to our fair correspondent, "Sylvina" for not inserting her admirable communication on the same subject, dated Columbus, Ohio, June 29. We should be quite happy to receive from her pen, essays on any other subject, suitable for the columns of the Advocate, but beg to be exonerated from any censure for not complying with her wishes in this case. Whatever may be the impressions received from the perusal of our pages by "Sylvina," we assure her, that we do not intend "to cast a slur upon the female world:"—the virtues, the exalted worth of the female character, with few exceptions, entitle it to our respect; and never have we been, intentionally, the cause of an unnecessary pang to the feeling bosoms of the "better half of God's creation."

NOTICE. Br. George Messenger, we are happy to learn, has received and accepted an invitation to preach the everlasting gospel to the Societies in Egremont, Mount-Washington, and Sheffield, Mass. May the Lord prosper, sustain, and bless him, together with the people of his charge. They have it in contemplation to erect a meeting house at Sheffield the ensuing year for the worship of the Universal God.

CHURCH AND SHOP.—Messrs. Sherman and Thompson, wholesale and retail dealers of dry goods, in Utica, have a nota bene to their advertisement, to inform their readers, that they make a discount of six per cent. to the CLERGY. They deserve the prayers of the Church, if they fail in obtaining the custom of the state; and as long as the people are unwilling to be taxed six per cent. for the Clergy, so long will they keep clear of Messrs. Sherman and Thompson's shop.

SENTIMENTAL.

'We had not risen from the breakfast table one morning, when a female, rather young, and fashionably dressed, entered the room.—After a few common place civilities, she turned to Mrs. Clifford, saying, 'I called to tell you that Mr. S—— is in town, he preaches to-day at——, and you must positively put on your things, and go with me to hear him.'—'Could I consistently do so,' replied her friend, 'I should be very happy to accompany you; but, excuse me if I say, that were this excellent man to see the dear little group by which I am surrounded, he would be the first to forbid my leaving them to listen to his sermon.'

'Perhaps the conscious recollection of some duty unperformed at home, just then stung the feelings of our fair devotee; or it might be purely a misguided zeal, which reddened on her cheek, as she retorted, somewhat sharply, 'When, like Martha's, the heart is careful and troubled about many things, it is easy to find a pretext of duty to prevent our listening to the words of Jesus.'

"Mrs. Clifford mildly answered, 'I hope I am aware of this plausible deception, but in the present instance I am not conscious of merit the rebuke. You may remember, my dear Mrs. Hammond, that Martha was not censured for a necessary attention to her ordinary and relative duties; but for an undue anxiety, and ostentatious and ill-timed desire of providing 'things, more than hospitably good.'—Perhaps, too I may remind you, that there subsists a visible difference between her neglecting to hear the words of the Redeemer, when he honoured her roof with his sacred presence, and my declining to attend the discourse of one of his servants, when such an attendance would necessarily involve a neglect of duties, more strictly enjoined upon me.' 'You have always a great deal to say about duties, my dear,' resumed the lady, 'but if I read my bible aright, no duties are so acceptable with God, as an affectionate reception of his gospel, and a desire to see his kingdom advanced in our own hearts, and in the world around us.' She then magnanimously declared her resolution 'to persist in her attachment to the 'word preached,' although it continued to expose her to many domestick sacrifices, and involved her in several petty persecutions.'

"I believe Mrs. Clifford could have evinced to her fair friend, that she had not 'read her bible aright;' but as a spirit of recrimination certainly was not the temper by which she sought to maintain the honour of religion, she thought it better to drop the subject, than to expose her visitor to the imminent risk of losing her temper.

"A short silence therefore ensued, till Mr. Clifford inquired of Mrs. Hammond, whether she had yet an opportunity of visiting the sick woman, whose case he recommended to her? 'No, really,' she replied. 'I have not had one moment of leisure since you named her to me. On Monday I was at a Bible Society's meeting; Tuesday, I went to hear Mr. ——— preach; Wednesday, I dined at Mrs. Nelson's, where a select number of serious friends were assembled to meet the Rev. Mr. H——; all Thursday, I was occupied in endeavouring to procure subscribers to our Dorcas Society; and to-day, I shall hardly have time to swallow my dinner, on my return home, before the arrival of a lady who has promised to go with me to hear a sermon for the benefit of our Sunday Schools.

"As Mrs. Hammond paused, I asked my friend, in a low voice, 'Is it possible to be religiously dissipated?' 'I fear it is possible, though not, I should hope, a very frequent case,' he observed; then turning to the lady who had been the birth of the supposition, he said, 'As your engagements are already so numerous, I fear your intended charity will come too late for poor Susan. Our Emma saw her on Wednesday—she was then almost incapable of receiving any nourishment; and, I believe that in a few days, her sufferings and her wants will cease.'

"If I mistake not, Mr. Clifford designed to convey a practical reproof to this 'wandering star', and perhaps for a moment it was felt as such; but soon the salutary effects of her regret evaporated into extravagant expressions of sorrow. 'Surely,' she exclaimed, 'there never was so unfortunate a being before. I would have made any sacrifice rather than to have lost the opportunity of hearing the dying language of this poor but pious creature!' Then addressing Emma, 'How I envy you, Mrs. Clifford; it must be a sweet satisfaction, to reflect on the many hours which for this year past, you have spent in reading to the aged sufferer. Perhaps, my dear, you will write a short narrative of her—it would be a charming obituary; send it to me when it is drawn up, and I will get it published next month. Don't you think it would be very interesting, Mrs. Clifford?' she continued, turning to her, before she had given Emma time to reply.

"Emma bit her lips to prevent a smile, though the mention of Susan's name at other times, might have more easily drawn a tear to her eyes.

"Mrs. Clifford replied, 'to us who have so long witnessed her patient sufferings, every circumstance of Susan's death would be highly interesting; but I doubt whether it would be equally so to the public eye. I agree with you, however, in thinking that Emma has been highly privileged in reading to her from that sacred volume, which has furnished the comfort and support of a long life. In witnessing the triumph of a faith like Susan's, at once so humble and so strong, she has enjoyed an opportunity of instruction, which may never again occur, and which, I trust, she will not fail to improve.'

"The clock now struck nine, and our morning visitor, starting from her seat, took a hasty leave, alleging, that she had a long way to walk, and must be there by 10 o'clock, for, if she were not in time for the prayer, she should have to stand all sermon time, as it would be impossible to obtain a seat afterwards."—W. Messenger.

[From Dick's Christian Philosophy.]

The economy of the human frame, when seriously contemplated, has a tendency to excite admiration and astonishment, and to impress us with a sense of our continual dependence on a Superior Power. What an immense multiplicity of machinery must be in action to enable us to breathe, to feel, and to walk! Hundreds of bones of diversified forms, connected together by various modes of articulation; hundreds of muscles to produce motion, each of them acting in at least ten different capacities; hundreds of tendons and ligaments to connect the bones and muscles; hundreds of arteries to convey the blood to the remotest part of the system; hundreds of veins to bring it back to its reservoir the heart; thousands of glands secreting humours of various kinds from the blood; thousands of lacteal and lymphatic tubes absorbing and conveying nutriment to the circulating fluid; millions of pores thro' which the perspiration is continually issuing; an infinity of ramification of nerves diffusing sensation throughout all the parts of this exquisite machine; and the heart at every pulsation exerting a force, of a hundred thousand pounds, in order to preserve all this complicated machinery, is in constant operation! The whole of this vast system of mechanism must be in action, before we can walk across the apartments! We admire the operation of a steam engine and the force it exerts. But though it is constructed of the hardest materials which the mines can supply, in a few months some of its essential parts are worn and deranged, even although its action should be frequently discontinued. But the animal machine, though constructed, for the most part of the softest and most flabby substances, can go on without intermission in all its diversified movements, by night and by day, for the space of eighty or a hundred years! the heart giving ninety-six thousand strokes every twenty-four hours, and the whole mass of blood rushing through a thousand pipes of all sizes every four minutes! And is it man that governs these nice and complicated movements? Did he set the heart in motion, or endue it with the muscular force it exerts? And when it has ceased to beat, can he command it again to resume its functions? Man knows neither the secret springs of the machinery within him, nor the half of the purposes for which they serve, or of the movements they perform.—Can any thing more strikingly demonstrate our dependence every moment on a Superior Agent, and that it is “in God we live, and move, and have our being?” Were a single pin of the machinery within us, and over which we have no controul, either broken or deranged, a thousand movements might instantly be interrupted, and our bodies left to crumble in the dust.

It was considerations of this kind that led the celebrated physician Galen, who was a skeptic in his youth publicly to acknowledge that a Supreme Intelligence must have operated in ordaining the laws by which living beings are constructed. And he wrote his excellent treatise “On the uses of those parts of the human frame,” as a solemn hymn to the world.” “I first endeavour from His works,” he says, “to know myself, and afterwards by the same means to show him to others, to inform them, how great is his wisdom, his goodness, his power.” The late Dr. Hunter, has observed that astronomy and anatomy are the studies which present us with the most striking view of the two most wonderful attributes of the Supreme Being. The first of these fills the mind with the idea of his immensity in the largeness, distances, and number of the heavenly bodies: the last astonishes us with his intelligence and art in the variety and delicacy of animal mechanism.

Sentence has been pronounced at New Orleans, upon the officers and crew of the sloop Bolivar, who had been convicted under the act of Congress, of March 1825, of firing on an American vessel with intent to plunder.—The commander Chicot, was sentenced to four years imprisonment, the Lieutenant, Charles Chitty to three years, the marine officer Goudre, to three years, the other officers to two years, and the crew to one year, excepting one sailor, who on account of some mitigating circumstances was sentenced to three months.

FRIGHTENED CHILDREN.—A short time ago, in this neighbourhood, a young girl of seven years of age, whose imagination had been filled with those frightful nursery tales that are conjured up by ignorant servants and others to frighten children into obedience, was thrust into a dark closet for some tale she had carried to her parents. The poor thing continued to scream with the most violent apprehension; and, when the door was opened to take her from her abode of terror, she was lying on the ground in strong convulsions.—The conflict was too powerful for her tender reason, and she now exists, one of the most miserable objects of human sympathy. Her parents and friends see their hopes blasted—their interesting little favourite is now an idiot!

THERE IS A WORLD WE HAVE NOT SEEN.

There is a world we have not seen
That time shall never dare destroy,
Where mortal footstep hath not been
Nor ear has caught its sound of joy.

There is a region, lovelier far
Than sages tell or poet's sing,
Brighter than summer's beauties are,
And softer than the tints of spring.

There is a world, and O, how blest,
Fairer than prophets ever told,
And never did an angel guest,
One half its blessedness unfold.

It is all holy and serene,
The land of glory and repose,
And there, to dim the radiant scene,
The tear of sorrow never flows.

It is not fanned by summer's gale,
'Tis not refreshed by vernal showers,
It never needs the moon-beam pale,
For there are known no evening hours.

No; for this world is ever bright
With a pure radiance all its own,
The streams of uncreated light,
Flow round it from the eternal throne.

There forms that mortals may not see,
Too glorious for the eye to trace,
And clad in pureless majesty,
Move with unutterable grace.

In vain the philosophick eye
May seek to view the fair abode,
Or find it in the curtained sky,—
It is the dwelling place of God.

MR. BADGER'S REPLY TO MR. REESE.

NO. I.

"He that answereth a matter, before he hear-eth it, it is folly and shame unto him."

SOLOMON.

MR. W. I. REESE, SIR,

The papers you have had the goodness to loan me last evening, which contain your two first letters to me, I have read with careful attention, and think they demand a brief reply. Your conduct, sir, in this affair, is strange, mysterious; what your motive can be in such a violent and unprovoked attack on me, I cannot imagine, unless it is to make a display of the "importance of your person," "character," "erudition" and "talents;" that you drag my name from its "repose in the unvisited shades of forgetfulness," as you please to term it.

In the first place, sir, my appointment was made by the particular request of the gentleman with whom you board, and he pledged himself that he and you would attend, and that you would answer my objections against universalism let them be what they would; and named it repeatedly as a request from you that I should do so, and not only invited, but in company challenged me to make an appointment; and after a year had passed away, your host informed me you considered that I had treated you with great neglect, that I had agreed to make an appointment which I had not done—I would not—I dare not &c. And to allay your fever, and put an end to his teasing, I consented to give an appointment the 27th of May last at the Christian Meeting-house at which time and place I was to give three reasons why I was not a Universalist. My appointment was made known in April; a gentleman of respectability immediately called on you (as he informs me) and invited you to attend, to which you replied with your usual egotism, "He will not give any reasons which are reasons." The apology, sir, I made for this abrupt reply, was your youth and want of experience, and the apology for the retrograde motion you had made, was, I concluded, you reflected upon your unfortunate campaign to West Bloomfield, a few weeks before, against the pious Mr. Millard, which ended your career in that pleasant village.

Again, sir, it is very mysterious to me that you should be so lost and blinded as to the interest of your own cause as to commence a public debate in the manner you have done. I have ever been willing to meet you and any colleagues you should select, before the same congregation or any other, in defence of the reasons I gave in my sermon: This you very well knew, and would not this have been the proper way? But alas; if birds tell the truth, Mr. B. Mr. H. Mr. W. and Mr. R. visited you, and the result of the council was, it would not do to meet me. And if you must have a correspondence by writing, why not give me notice of it? or give me a copy of your manuscript? and if published first why not then forward a copy to your opponent? But this is not done, surely your "importance" "erudition" and "talents" ought to have impressed you with a sense of duty on this point. But the first intimation I received of your writing against me was, yesterday evening a gentleman was at my house who informed me you had been quizzing him to know if he thought I would answer your letter; on the hearing of which, I immediately repaired to your place, WITH A LOW BOW, for the loan of the letters. But in this case I feel disposed to be charitable and make great allowance for your constitutional "erudition."

But the worst of all on this point is, instead of calling on me for a copy of my reasons, you take up with the mistaken rumors of the neighbourhood, or fix out reasons to suit yourself, and then commence your hostilities in the dark, and in a paper which you knew I did not patronize, and would not be likely soon to see.* Was this treating an opponent decently? Was this doing justice to your own cause? No Sir, it was telling your neighbours UNTRUTH, and deceiving them. I do not know what excuse you can furnish for yourself for not calling for a copy of my reasons, when we live in the same neighbourhood, and you was about to assume the judgement seat, before the world, and call me from "the repose of the unvisited"

* We take the fault of not furnishing Mr. Badger with the letters of Br. Reese, entirely upon ourselves. it was the particular request of Br. Reese, to have the numbers containing them forwarded immediately. Our excuse is this. About the time the first letter was published, the Advocate was removed to Auburn, and the papers since then have been prepared for the mail by another person who knew nothing of the circumstance. We hope this will be satisfactory.

shades of forgetfulness" to your tribunal. Was it not because you could answer reasons of your own make, better than those of an opponent? The word "sound reason" which you use so often is not found in my reasons.

Now Sir how must my motto sound in your ears? You have answered a matter before hearing it, you have made a great figure before the publick, and promised WONDERS YET TO BE DONE; you have dealt out judgement without mercy, you have quarrelled with the sentiments of Calvinists, Armenians, Trinitarians, Destructionists, and almost every class; you have made demands with the authority of a Pope, you have propounded questions in a promiscuous manner, and after all this heterogeneous performance, I am constrained to inform my good friend, Mr. Reese, that he is altogether ignorant of my reasons. Of course, "the whole head is sick, the whole heart is faint." As you have published my reasons, there is not one of them correct. You have no standing place, you fight uncertainly, you beat the air, you have taken a long and tedious ramble in the dark, you know not at what you stumble, you have acted the part of the Boy in the fable, who met his enemy with a mallet tied to a string and hit his own head twice, where he hit his enemy once.

If you will now come forward (as you say) like a man. I will give you a copy of my reasons against Universalism, and will meet you in any manner you please, before the publick in their defence. But you must begin right and first, next time, and remember I have nothing to do with Trinitarians, Calvinists, or Destructionists, they are not on trial in this case; but Universalism, and my objections against it, are the only subjects of controversy between us.

There are three things, in your letters which I wish you to bestow a moment's reflection upon: 1. You say in your first letter, "you should know what the sentiment is, and state it fairly and impartially, that the auditors may judge what is and what is not reasonable." This advice sir is good, I profess to be acquainted with universalism, and all my statements concerning it are fair and impartial.—Why did you not adhere to your own advice? He is a good divine who practices his own precepts, but in the very sentence preceding, you present your auditors with three reasons of your own make, and palm them upon me; I hope "ANOTHER SWEEP OF YOUR LEGERDEMAIN" will do me greater justice, and yourself more honour.

2. In your second letter you say "Heaven must frown indignant on the horrid scheme," &c. what sort of language is this for a good Universalist to use. Have you a FROWNING GOD? have you an "INDIGNANT GOD?" I think an intelligent Universalist would tell you, you spake the language of Ashdod; how would the critic in your cause, quibble upon an expression like this from a person who believed in future punishment: "Heaven frown indignant," what worse expression should we expect from a person who believes in eternal punishment.

3. Let your friends and enemies judge as they may upon the merits or demerits of your two short letters, they must all be agreed in one thing, (viz.) they are well impregnated with "REASON;" for you have used the word sound reason once, unreasonable once, Reason four times, Reasons four times, Reasonable five times, sound principles of reasoning, and sound reasoning thirty times. Is this tautology Sir, a fair specimen of your "ERUDITION?"

My Dear Sir, you will not murmur a word at the acrimony with which I address you, when you reflect upon the sarcasm and malevolence with which your letters abound, and the abrupt and corrosive manner of your attack upon me. During ten years residence in this place, I have lived on good terms in general, with the people called Universalists, I wish to do so in future, and with all men; I am the same friend to them, and the same liberal man, which I have been; this I hope my future conduct will prove.

And Sir, you may give yourself no more trouble to enquire of my neighbours, whether I will answer your letters, only begin right, and first, proceed with order and stick to your subject, and I assure you that ere long you will wish you had let my name, "REPOSE IN THE UNVISITED SHADES OF FORGETFULNESS."

With due respect, yours,

J. BADGER.

West-Mendon, July 12th, 1827.

REMARKS.

Mr. Badger is respectfully informed that we comply with his request cheerfully in giving his letter an insertion as soon as circumstances would admit of so doing; nor shall he have cause to complain of a want of attention on our part, to any vindication of his arguments which he may from time to time forward for publication. Of one thing, however, we feel it a duty to apprise him. Hereafter, personalities, having no bearing upon the question in debate, must be avoided. This remark is not intended for him alone—his opponent will of course feel willing to submit to this regulation. We hope the subject will be fairly stated, and candidly discussed by both parties. Our columns are open to both, and we shall not interfere in the controversy any farther than to see that no infringements are made upon the rules of propriety and the constitution of this paper. We feel confident that truth whatever it may be, will receive no injury from candid investigation; and we do believe that good will result from the debate, if christian feeling bears its proper sway over the minds of those who engage in it.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

LETTER FROM A FATHER TO HIS SON.

DEAR SON:—Fearing that your soul or mine may be endangered by a mistake on the point at issue between us, I desire you candidly to reconsider your premises:—“That the book of Revelation and the volume of Nature are transcripts of God is admitted. Inquire, then, whether endless punishment for sin accords with his justice and goodness! And ask whether a finite creature can do an infinite act.” I agree with you in this statement so far as relates to the character of God, but disagree in regard to man.

The soul of man never was finite in duration; and it is the soul that sinneth and shall die for sin. Our premises show us an infinite gradation of being and infinite degrees of crime, which is always measured by the dignity of the character against whom it is committed and not by the dignity of the offender's character, for in such case it has none.—Punishment, therefore, must be proportioned to crime, which is sometimes against an inferior, sometimes an equal, and sometimes a superior grade of being till we ascend to God. Now, God having created man with powers and faculties to obey or disobey his law, (without which he could not be rewardable or punishable) his strict adherence to his own law, as well as his promises to preserve the virtuous, actually require that the wicked be turned out of that city, (which is the place of rest for the saints to be shut out of the kingdom forever.

It would be impossible for the righteous to be happy and dwell with the wicked; for reflect how many vagabonds of your acquaintance there are with whom you could not be happy. And must God drive the wicked back to chaos, abrogate his law, and create them anew in a state in which it would be impossible for them to sin? If so, they would not be rational intelligences. Or will the wisdom of God shine more conspicuously by honouring his own law in the salvation of the faithful, and exactly proportioning the punishment of the wicked to their crime, which is against infinite goodness and mercy—yea, against an infinite law of an infinite God, who alone is capable of proportioning punishment to crime.

Now, my son, take the declaration of him who is the truth. He says, “whoso sinneth against the Holy Ghost, hath never forgiveness, neither in this world, nor in the world to come.” And the future existence of God, the happiness of the saints, and the punishment of the wicked, are all expressed by the same words. This may answer the objection that forever, everlasting, eternal &c. are limited terms. It is admitted they sometimes are used in a limited sense, but they are always defined by the subject of which they treat.

We now come to matters of fact. The angels that sinned before man was created, are not yet released, but are reserved for greater punishment. Had Winchester fixed a bottom to the bottomless pit, and modern writers could frame a bridge across the impassable gulf, I think your arguments would look more rational. But even then your ground would be untenable, if we allow the words of Jesus Christ to be greater authority than the testimony of man. Consider what I have written, and may the Lord give you understanding. DAVID BELL, Windham, Green county, N. Y. April 24, 1827.

THE SON'S REPLY TO THE FOREGOING.

REVERED FATHER:—Satisfied that a difference in religious sentiment will never weaken the ties of common kindred or sever the bonds that unite us as father and son, I shall take the liberty to express my sentiments freely upon this important subject. The grand point on which we differ, is the nature of sin. The question whether sin is an infinite evil or not, is the point which determines our opinions relative to the final destiny of man: For if man can commit an infinite sin, and infinitely injure an infinite Being, then it necessarily follows, that he must suffer an infinite punishment.

In order to establish your premises, you state that the soul is infinite, in duration, and therefore capable of infinite acts. But admit it, and what follows? It must be admitted that infinity is without parts and unlimited; for we could as easily calculate mathematical lines for the boundaries of eternity, as degrees or gradation in infinity. And if the soul be infinite, I would ask how can it suffer—or what power is competent to punish it? God himself is no more than infinite, and to inflict punishment must require superior power. The soul could as easily punish the Creator as the Creator the soul, if both were infinite—it might wage war with the Almighty, and the combatants, being possessed of equal and unlimited power, would produce a contest much more memorable than that of Lucifer, the event of which must be doubtful. The supposition that the soul is capable of an infinite act, produces such a chaos of thought, that it cannot be reconciled with revelation nor endure the criticism of the theologian.

Secondly: You state that it is necessary for the happiness of the saints that the wicked be punished eternally. But would the Almighty, whose wisdom and mercy know no bounds, devise a plan for the happiness of a small part of his offspring, that should require the endless torture of all the rest? You may ask, how can the saints be happy in the presence of the wicked, since there is such a contrast in their characters? But, if there is no change in futurity, I ask, upon the same ground, how can the saints be happy in the presence of one another? For we see them now persecuting each other, and even committing each other to the flames! And as there is none that liveth and sinneth not, consequently all men must die sinners; and if they are not changed in a future existence and sin be infinite, then endless punishment must be the inevitable portion of all mankind. But could I firmly believe that it were possible for any of the human family to suffer endless torture in an immense reservoir of the wrath of Deity, fraught with fire unquenchable, whose circumference must be broad as infinity, and its centre as deep as the penetration of Jehovah—where tears of blood should drop from the fiery eyeballs of its miserable inhabitants to ceaseless eternity; I would fervently invoke Heaven that the Almighty fiat might remand me back to primeval nothingness, where I might remain eternally forgotten in oblivion! But I cannot indulge the dreary thought, that a good, and all-wise Being should unasked force into existence intelligent creatures who had no agency in producing themselves, and punish them eternally!

When I view the vast expanse of Nature, wherein are portrayed in bright and enduring colours, the power and goodness of the Creator, I often wonder how a thinking mortal can dream of endless torture. For, where must sleep the mercy of Jehovah if he can see his own offspring writhing in despair where hope can never come. If, then, the remarks you have made of infinite acts of the soul be anti-scriptural and unreasonable, then the cruel dogma of endless torture cannot exist but in the chimerical fancy of those who are too fast bound in religious thralldom to hearken to the voice of reason.

But the bright hope of the final happiness of all intellectual creation presents itself to the mind founded upon the firm basis of Reason and the asseverations of the living God.—This sentiment harmonizes with all the attributes of Deity, and inspires us with the blissful expectation, that, when earth, and seas, and skies shall be no more—when seasons shall no more revolve, and the long lapse of time shall have written the epitaph of death on all created things—this mortal shall put on immortality, and the soul shall forever flourish in the embrace of her Creator. Methinks this single consideration—the immortality of the soul, capable of such enjoyments and of searching into the works of its Creator, is sufficient to banish forever the thought of its being liable to fall into remediless woe. But as this short epistle will not admit a full discussion of this important subject, I have only answered your two first propositions, and shall defer the rest till I come to your house in the fall;—and then, under the sacred shades of a father's roof, which I shall ever venerate, I shall have full liberty to unbosom my feelings freely, and shall be happy to converse with you upon the sublime subject before us.

I must now close this letter, with the flattering hope, that, when the hand that pens it shall be dust, and the body which has been nurtured by your parental care shall be traceless in the grave, the soul that inhabits it shall be raised to immortal purity to enjoy those blissful scenes to which it is now a stranger.

REMARKS.

The authours of the foregoing letters will notice some trifling emendations, which were unavoidable in preparing them for the press. We have endeavoured, however, to preserve the sense as originally intended. On reading them the following ideas were suggested.

The notion that sin is infinite is effectually exploded in the letter of the Son; but much might be said to advantage upon the arguments usually resorted to in support of the absurd hypothesis. It is said that when mankind sin against an inferior, or an equal, the crime is not so great as when they offend against a superiour. Admitting the statement true for the sake of argument; what follows? Why, that to sin against a peasant, or a slave, is no great affair,—but to sin against a lord, or a prince, or a pope, a priest, or a king—is an enormous crime!! Reader, are you an American—and can you tamely submit to have your reason thus outraged? Are we to be told that the religion of Jesus teaches us to treat men as though they were made of different materials or belonged to different grades of beings. Our republican institutions—our bible teaches us that all men are created free and equal! Shall we consent then to the anti-christian and anti-republican notion that the turpitude of sin increases in proportion to the dignity of the person offended! It is a truth, which cannot be successfully controverted, that the guilt of any prohibited act consists in the intention of the sinner, and not in the character of the person sinned against. O priestcraft, and kingcraft! to trace thy windings and ferret out thy designs upon the liberties of the people, is truly an arduous task! May heaven destroy thy hiding places.

We rejoice in witnessing the emancipation of the human intellect. In the authours of the foregoing letters we behold a fair sample of what is going on in our world. A dutiful son, of nineteen years old, respectfully and feelingly advocates the cause of God and of truth with his revered Father. Truly praise is perfected among the more intelligent of the rising generation! Fathers and mothers, let your children have access to the ordinary sources of information on these momentous subjects, and error will speedily be driven from the world! Instead of sending them to mud-met-meetings and the convocations of fanatics, let them read the Bible for themselves, and encourage them in the work of investigation; and they will grow up under your watchful care, ornaments to the christian name and comforts to your declining years.

And, ye preachers of your own love and the wrath of your God—if ye will suffer a word of exhortation—we would gently entreat you to renounce the hidden things of dishonesty; for, we predict, with the present generation will pass away your craft, your power, your glory, and—your infallibility!—ED.

ADDRESS

TO THE PRINCIPAL OF THE AUBURN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

"REVEREND SIR:"—Having been credibly informed that you are now engaged in a business quite similar to that recorded of Aaron, in Ex. ch. 32. ver. 4. and having some knowledge of your experience in matters of that kind, I think you a suitable person to be called upon to solve the following problem; and also to consider what effect such transactions as are detailed below, (which I copy from the Telescope of June 30,) will have upon the morals of community in this country. The following is the article to which I allude.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago I took up the New York Observer, and noticed among a number of donations to the American Tract Society, one by Joel Post, of 1000 dollars.

Now it is stated as a fact, that a person by the name of Joel Post failed in business a number of years ago, and at first offered to pay his creditors ten shillings on a pound to settle with them. Believing him to be well off, (as I suppose) they refused. After a while, he offered to pay them five shillings;—this they also refused. At last he would not pay them any thing. Since that period he has become very rich, being worth, I suppose, half a million. He could therefore well afford to give $1000 to the Tract Society. But I should like to know if this gentleman has paid his former creditors, as I have ever believed that it is our duty to be just before we are generous.

"As these things are reported of the individual, I hope, if he is not guilty of such injustice, not to say fraud, he will undeceive the publick through the columns of your paper."

JUSTICE.

Now, sir, I offer as a problem to be solved by yourself and your associates, which should have credit on the books of the 'Lords' Treasury' for the $1000, Mr. Post, the donor, or his creditors, whom he cheated out of the money thus contributed.

By giving a speedy solution of the above, you will, I have no doubt, confer a favour on several of your patrons, who are in similar circumstances, and who would be much gratified to know the real value of their stock. And you will also save me the trouble of calling upon you and your aristocratical fraternity, through the columns of every paper within my reach, that dare express to the world the arts by which the people are duped by the designing.

Perhaps you may consider me heretically impudent for speaking thus pointedly; but I have only said what I know, and if the above were all I know, you might rest more securely. I have only to add, at this time, that I am not one of those who aspire after your favours; neither am I a dupe of the New-York Tract Society, nor do I expect the fifty dollar premium offered by the directors of that institution for the best written Novel or Tract; but I am one who is not afraid to oppose, as anti-christian and hypocritical, all such institutions.

H. Z. X.

REMARKS.

The author of the foregoing has entrusted his name with the editor of this paper, which will be surrendered to any one who may feel himself aggrieved. We presume it was not the intention of the writer to single out any one individual as an object of attack; but presuming that the gentleman addressed would be as willing as any one else, to expose to publick contempt an act so evidently subversive of justice and honesty, it was proper to make a personal appeal to him, as a distinguished theologian, and friend to the institutions which are censured (honestly no doubt) by our correspondent. We take this opportunity to state for the information of our correspondents, that hereafter no communication will be inserted in our columns unless the name of the author is known to the editor.

UNIVERSALIST CONVENTION OF THE STATE OF NEW-YORK.

We have, heretofore given our views of the above Convention, but events which have since transpired, seem to require a more full and explicit developement of our sentiments upon the subject. We had cherished the hope, that the matter was at rest, and that the unpleasant task would never again devolve upon us, to say or do any thing about it. But it has come to that, that silence is criminal, and we submit, once more, to give our candid opinion to the publick.

The Convention, distinguished by the words which stand at the head of this article, to be composed of five Ministers from each association in this state, that will acknowledge the jurisdiction which it claims. It is to meet annually to try all cases of impeachment relating to ministers, and to decide such other cases as may come before it by way of appeal from the decisions of the respective associations. This is a brief outline of the plan of the institution according to best information we have been able to obtain. We object to this Convention on the following grounds.

1. It is testified by all our experience, and may be inferred from all impartial history, that it ever has been, and probably ever will be, unwise to give the clergy of any denomination, the power to controul the affairs of the church of Christ. This proposition is too evident, and the facts to be urged in its support too well known, to every well informed universalist, to require proof. And although we have great confidence in the integrity of our ministering brethren, yet that confidence is not so great as to induce the belief that they are infallible. They are like other men; and all men are fond of power, and generally fail not to exercise it to their own aggrandizement when it is once obtained.

Here, the question may arise, whether this Convention would have the power in its own hands, to do any thing, of itself, to injure the order generally. In reply we observe;—if it has no power, it is of course a powerless and inefficient, consequently a useless thing: if it has any power, that power may be abused. We object, therefore, to such an institution, on the ground that it is either useless or dangerous. If it is useless we do not want it to "reign over us"—if it is dangerous we ought to destroy it.

2. The most objectionable feature in the plan of this Convention, (saying nothing at present of its fruits) is that which requires it should be composed "exclusively of ministers." The experience of fifty one years has convinced every well informed American, that an intelligent people can govern themselves; and that it is ever more safe to keep the power in their own hands. The order of universalists in this state, we fearlessly declare, are as virtuous, as intelligent, and consequently as capable of governing themselves, as any other body of men. Hence we infer, that it is unwise, and entirely improper, to put the power of governing the order, or any portion of it, into the hands of a few, or confer it upon any class of men attached to our denomination. The inexpediency of any such arrangement is more apparent, when it is contended by the friends of the Convention, that the clergy are to constitute the privileged few.

To this it may be objected, that this convention only claims the right to govern the ministers, and does not claim any jurisdiction over others. In reply we observe, even admitting the fact, that it claims no other prerogative, ministers ought not to be entrusted with even that. They are, or ought to be, the servants of Christ and of the people; and unless they are under the direction of, and amenable to those who compose the order, they are no longer servants, but masters. It would be, for this reason, if for no other, entirely derogatory to the christian character, and in direct opposition to the genius and spirit of the gospel, to vest the government of these servants of Christ, in their own hands.

But it has been said by the friends of the Convention, that it is only a representative government, of which our national and state governments are the prototype. This we are disposed to deny. Our national and state governments are constituted of representatives chosen by the people from among themselves, with the exception of senators in Congress, who are the minority. Indeed the wise master-builders of our admirable system of government, were careful to have the controuling power in the hands of the people, or their immediate representatives. Hence, while it is the policy of our government to keep the controuling power in the hands of our only sovereign "the people," our brethren seem inclined to place it in the hands of the few.

But it may be said, that this Convention, although it is to be constituted of "ministers exclusively," is nevertheless under the controul of the body generally, and cannot exist without their consent. Admitting, then, for the sake of argument, that this state of things will not remove the government from the brethren composing the order; may we not ask what benefit will result from it? If the members of the order actually govern the body, themselves, while the convention exists, where is the necessity of having a convention at all? But we demand, does not the convention claim the right to govern itself, independent of the order? It does; and the advocates of the measure will not deny the fact. Again. Does it not, at least during its annual session, and even at any ordinary or extraordinary meeting, claim the privilege of ordaining rules for the discipline and regulation of the order generally? It certainly does. And farther; it has its committee of discipline, &c. &c. which acts during the interval between the sittings of the convention. This fact is known both to the friends and enemies of the convention, and will appear more fully from the proceedings of their committee, which we hold in our hands; and which, if necessary, will be laid before our readers. If, however the convention does not claim the right to act for itself, to do its own business, and to regulate the affairs of the order generally, we again ask—what right does it claim?

The foregoing are some of the grounds of objection to the convention, which, in our humble opinion are substantial reasons why it should not be upheld by our brethren. But these are by no means all. These objections are predicated of the plan itself; but there are other reasons why it should not be adopted, of more consequence than the foregoing, which for want of room will be deferred until another time.—Ed.

"THE CORRESPONDENT."

The above is the title of a weekly paper published at New-York by the "Free Press Association." The work is openly and decidedly an advocate of deistical principles, and is strenuously hostile to Christianity. Much ability is displayed in its columns, and each number teems with arguments against the Bible and the doctrines supposed to be therein taught.

It may be expected, that on bringing into notice this anti-christian work, we shall imitate the examples of other editors of periodical papers, by uttering abuse against those who are concerned in it; but if any such thing is anticipated by our readers they will be disappointed. We are not yet convinced of the necessity or propriety of such a course; nor can we consent to vilify and abuse those who differ with us in opinion, merely because they claim and exercise those inalienable rights which are guaranteed to every citizen by the Constitution and laws of these U. States. Neither can we believe that it is our duty, as advocates of impartial truth, to stigmatize with unseemly epithets the editors of the Correspondent. We claim the right of publishing what we believe to be true, and in exercising this right we shall defend our religion, whenever it shall be attacked; but we will not in any way attempt to hinder others from vindicating before the world their views, however much they may differ from our own.

It has become a custom, even in this country, to resort to denunciations against erroneous opinions, rather than to argument; and, though we say it with regret, Christian writers sometimes vilify their opponents. In this way the Christian cause has been wounded in the house of its friends: Such measures can never add permanency to truth. While we boast of the benefits of our holy religion, let us not be outdone in liberal and charitable things by those who discard it.

Should a reason be demanded why we do not openly and pointedly oppose the sentiments advanced by the editors of the Correspondent, our answer is, it is not necessary that we should oppose them. The fundamental errors advanced by the Correspondent, are, in our opinion, too palpable to be believed, and too destitute of support to require a refutation. An open enemy is less to be feared than a secret one; and hence we have more to guard against in the wily adversary, who, under the garb of sanctity, approaches the citadel of truth, than from the bold and manly attacks of the professed unbeliever.

The Correspondent opposes what it denominates Christianity; but if we may be allowed to judge, they mistake the corruptions of our holy religion for religion itself, and impute to it the evils which arise from a destitution of it. Their principal error, therefore, consists in identifying the Christian religion with the abominable follies of those who profess, but do not possess it. They speak of the cruelties, and persecutions, and massacres, and all the black catalogue of abominations of which professing Christians have been guilty, and call these unholy proceedings the religion of Jesus! Where is the believer in God's Universal Benevolence who does not shudder at the recital of such enormities, and pray deliverance from them? But we glory in saying that such transactions are not authorized by our faith.

"Our blessed Master's law of love, Does no such cruelties approve."

How, then, shall we convince the editors of deistical papers of their errors?—Shall we convert them to our faith, and to a love of the Lord Jesus Christ, by imitating the intolerant practices which they honestly condemn? Will they be persuaded into an acknowledgement of the pre-eminent excellence of our holy religion—its purity—its sanctifying influence, by manifesting a disposition to deprive them of their rights as citizens, by detracting from them the respect to which their moral virtues entitle them? We think not. And if we, as a body of professing Christians, become partakers of the uncharitableness of other denominations it will be impossible for us to escape the destiny that awaits the intolerant.

The above Epitaph, it is believed exhibits the leading facts in the history of Calvinism.

It was written to be prefixed to a certain Calvinistick creed; in which the doctrines offensive to Scripture and common sense, were professedly couched in ambiguous language, that would admit of being explained as occasion required. In this creed, Calvinism may properly be said to lie couchant, for though it holds forth a free salvation yet it breathes in coverture the miasm of Geneva.

This creed stands not alone—too often for unsuspecting credulity, is this heaven impeaching doctrine, dressed up in disguise.

I would attack no honest man's faith, but in the language of compassion and forbearance; but every error in disguise, I would gladly draw from its coverture, and expose it in its native deformity.

[The following is a translation from an ancient Spanish Poem, which, says the Edinburgh Review, is surpassed by nothing with which we are acquainted in the Spanish language, except the Odes of Lewis de Leon.]

Oh! let the soul its slumbers break,
Arouse its senses and awake,

To see how soon
Life like its glories glides away,
And the stern footsteps of decay
Come stealing on.

And while we eye the rolling tide,
Down which our fleeting minutes glide
Away so fast:

Let us the present hour employ,
And deem each future dream a joy
Already past.

Let no vain hope deceive the mind—
No happier let us hope to find,

To-morrow, than to-day;
Our golden dreams of yore were bright,
Like them the present shall delight—
Like them decay.

Our lives like hasting streams must be,
That into one engulfing sea,

Are doomed to fall—
The sea of death, whose waves roll on,
O'er king and kingdom crown and throne,
And swallow all.

Alike the river's lordly tide,
Alike the humble riv'lets glide
To that sad wave;
Death levels poverty and pride,
And rich and poor sleep side by side
Within the grave.

Our birth is but a starting place;
Life is the running of the race;

And death the goal;
There all those glittering toys are bought
That path alone, of all unsought,
Is found of all.

Say then how poor and little worth
Are all those glittering toys of earth,
That lure us here?

Dreams of a sleep that death must break,
Alas! before it bids us wake,
Ye disappear?

Long ere the lamp of death can blight,
The cheek's pure glow of red and white
Has passed away?

Youth smiled and all was heavenly fair:
Age come and laid his finger there,
And where are they?

Where is the strength that spurned decay,
The step that trod so light and gay,
The heart's blithe tone?

The strength is gone, the step is slow,
And joy grows weariness and wo
When age comes on.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

Sir,—Though sensible, that your queries did not demand the entire course taken in my former communication on the subject of demons, I deemed it proper to bestow some labour on what appears your chief weapon against my views of the blasphemy against the holy spirit. From my remarks, you will perceive how nearly I agree with you "in supposing them literal beings." I am still of the opinion, that your questions, in the second paragraph of your first letter, did not touch the subject in dispute.

The question here to be settled is, or ought to be, Did the scribes and pharisees wilfully and knowingly blaspheme the very spirit by which Jesus cast out demons and wrought other miracles? or did they design, by ascribing his miracles to Beelzebub, to detract from his doctrine, in order to bring it into disrepute?—When I shall have attempted an answer to these inquiries, we will see what advantage you have gained, by my acknowledging, that Jesus performed miracles by the power of God.

1. It is allowed, that the Jews were a superstitious, wicked people, when we compare their conduct with the righteousness of that dispensation of mercy which they opposed. Yet it will be owned, that they believed in, and meant to reverence God. They believed the "holy Temple" was established by His express command. They believed He had distinguished their nation in many important respects—that he had raised up to them a leader and law-giver, Moses—that their law, which they venerated, was given by the direct mandate of Jehovah—that their prophets spoke by the special influence of the spirit of God. "That they could not have the holy spirit without faith," was also a doctrine of the Jews; hence it is said, Mechilta fol. 52. "That faith was of great consequence, with which the Israelites believed in Him, who, with one word created the universe; and because the Israelites believed in God, the Holy Spirit dwelt in them; so that, being filled with God, they sung praises to Him." See Dr. A. Clarke on Gal. 5. 5.

Indeed the Jews appear to have had no objections to men's worshipping God, and believing in his holy spirit, if they did not oppose their institution. Hence the charge against Paul, was, "This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law." Acts 18, 13. I think we have, in Paul, before his conversion to christianity, a picture of the cruelty of the Jews, generally. He says, he punished the Christians "oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme: and being exceeding mad against them he persecuted them even unto strange cities." Acts, 26, 11. But can we infer, that Paul even blasphemed, or compelled others to blaspheme, that God, whose glory he was zealous seeking to promote, or his holy spirit, which he believed influenced Moses and the prophets to reveal sacred truth? We cannot. And this will appear obvious, "when we consider the honourable testimony which this apostle, after his conversion, did not hesitate to give of his own piety when a Jew;" "Brethren" said he, "I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day." Acts, 23, 1.

Blasphemy "denotes calumny, detraction, reproachful or abusive language." And what is necessary to constitute blasphemy against God or his spirit, is, 1, to possess a hatred of Him, and 2, to attempt to lessen men's esteem of Him. "He is one, says Dr. Campbell, who by his impious talk, endeavours to inspire others with the same irreverence towards the Deity, or perhaps, abhorrence of him, which he indulges in himself" Diss. 9, Part 2 sec. 6.

Now, as it will not be urged, that Paul blasphemed his Maker in his holy spirit, by any who are acquainted with the meaning of terms, or understand the history of his life, so neither can it be supposed, that the Jews blasphemed God in his spirit; for the apostle bears the same testimony to the sincerity of their motives, that he did to his own. See his words, ¶ "I am verily a man who am a Jew, born in Tarsus a city in Cilicia, yet brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and was zealous towards God, AS YE ALL ARE THIS DAY. And I persecuted IN THIS WAY (i. e. the way in which the Jews were then persecuting him,) unto the death, binding, and delivering into prison both men and women." Acts, 23, 3, 4.

Yet Paul had been, and his brethren, the Jews were, blasphemous. But what did they blaspheme? objects which they venerated? Certainly not. Then they were those which they hated and despised—and these are easily pointed out. They despised Jesus, because said they, "he deceiveth the people." They hated his doctrine, because they thought it pernicious, and feared it would supplant their own which they regarded most essential to the glory of God.

2. Having discovered, as I humbly think, from the testimony of revealed truth, that the Jews, considering their veneration for the fathers, the law and the prophets, and their high sense of the many favours and manifestations of the hand of Providence, towards them, did not calumniate or blaspheme God or his holy spirit, I shall endeavour, with care, to ascertain what they did blaspheme. It will be of no importance to object here, that the method adopted by the Jews to maintain their cause was wicked and improper, as "the merit of human actions depend" altogether on the motive, which has been sufficiently vindicated, though their conduct is, by no means, to be justified; and we see too much, in the present day, that savours of the Jewish spirit of persecution.

Let us, then, candidly consider this important subject, and see what can be made out from it. At the 22. verse of Matt. 12 chap. we are informed, "There was brought unto him one possessed of a demon, blind and dumb; and he healed him, insomuch, that the blind and dumb both spake and saw." This produced a most salutary effect on the people, for they "were all amazed, and said, is not this the son of David?" verse 23. The question, "is not this the son of David?" is the same as if they had said, "Is not this the Messiah?" The miracle had excited the greatest attention, and the people were on the point of receiving him as the Christ! The greatest fear of the Jews was that the multitude would believe on him. And here it is plain, that, had they accepted him as the Messiah, they would have received his doctrine and his miracles as divine. The Pharisees never enquired whether Jesus performed miracles, but "have any of the rulers believed on him," &c. In this case something was thought necessary, and they ascribed the miracle to Beelzebub, denominated by them, "the prince of the demons," an idol god in the land of Ekron, 2 Kings, 1 chap. Perhaps it was believed, that this idol had some skill in the power of magic, and the Jews expected to get rid of the miracle in that way. After he had refuted them on their own premises, vers. 25, 27, he observes ver. 28. "But if I cast out demons by the spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you." Now although the Pharisees said "He hath an unclean spirit," Mark 3, 30, his own reply to them shows, that they had not blasphemed the spirit of God; for he says, "if I cast out demons by the spirit of God," and NOT AS YOU SAY, by the spirit or influence of Beelzebub, then the kingdom of God is come unto you." They spoke against Beelzebub, it is true, but this was a small consideration with them, as their whole object was to prevent the people believing on him, by ridiculing his miracles, and of course, prevent the spread of his doctrine. As you cannot deny, that the ultimate object of the miracles of Jesus was to establish and give currency to his exalted dispensation of truth, so, I think you will not deny, that the design of the Jews was to prostrate that object. But this fact I have shown in a former communication.

Upon the whole, Sir, of only what has been said, is it even probable, that our Lord meant to be understood, that the Jews had spoken blasphemy against the spirit of God? Did they, bad as they were, add any thing after he informed them, that he cast out demons by the spirit of God? You cannot affirm that they did. And, even if they had, it would have resulted from a want of faith or confidence in Jesus, rather than a want of reverence for the holy spirit, as has been shown above; and in this case it could not have amounted to blasphemy against that spirit whose purity and influence they, by no means, designed to depreciate. There is, then, no alternative. I have said the "holy spirit," in this text, implies the holy doctrine of Jesus, and think I have made the fact pretty clear heretofore, and shall not repeat here what has been said. I proceed, then to continue my views.

Let it be observed, that, though rhetoric may not have been studied in the days of our Lord, yet in scripture there occur many rhetorical figures. But figures of speech are rather discovered and distinguished than created. In the instance before us the language is given under a figure of speech called Metonymy which puts the cause for the effect, as Jesus for his doctrine, Acts, 17, 18, "he preached to them Jesus and the resurrection," i. e. the doctrine which Jesus revealed by his resurrection, Acts, 8, 35, Philip "preached unto him Jesus," i. e. the doctrine of which Jesus is the giver and disposer. Rom. 16, 9, "our helper in Christ," i. e. in the faith or doctrine of Christ. The authors for their works or writings, Luke, 16, 29, "They have Moses and the prophets," i. e. the books or writings of those men, 24, 27, "And beginning at Moses and the prophets," i. e. what those men had said "concerning himself." Mouth for speech or testimony, Deut. 17, 6, and Matt. 18, 16, "in the mouth of two or three witnesses," i. e. by the testimony or word of that number of witnesses. And by a careful investigation of the subject I feel authorised to add, the holy spirit for the doctrines revealed by the holy spirit,* Matt. 12, 31, 32, Mark, 3, 29, and Luke, 12, 10. I have here added Luke, because it is evidently parallel with the other two, though the history of the blasphemy is recorded in chap. 11, 14, 26; but the circumstances are the same. But you may object here, that in the 12th v. of Luke, it is said, "For the holy spirit shall teach you," &c. You will notice, however, as has been shown above, in speaking of the Jews, and may here be said of the synagogues, magistrates and powers, ver. 11th; the sincerity of whose motives, Paul did not question, that they had too high a veneration for the spirit of God, to vent blasphemies against it. You may object again, that it is said, they always resist the holy spirit, Acts, 7, chap. 4,—but they resisted the holy spirit the same as they made "void the law of God, through their traditions," as it was manifestly their design to honour both, however much mistaken they may have been.

I have reviewed this subject, sir, with all the candour and impartiality that I could command; and must own it is plainer to me than it was before, though I have long since been satisfied in regard to it. And you will perceive, I think; that, by admitting, that Jesus cast out demons by the power of God, I have not "entirely overthrown my former arguments," nor done much to erect yours "in their stead."

You have made two quotations in your letter, but have not referred to book nor chapter where they are found; but which, I venture to say, are as far from proving your doctrine, as the latter is from benevolence. The first is Luke, 13, 3, "Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish." How should they perish? Why similar to those Galileans whom Pilate mingled with their sacrifices; and those "eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell and slew them!!!!" ver. 1, 4. The next is Psalm, 7, 11; "God is angry with the wicked every day." The Psalmist said, "God is angry every day," and our translators had added "with the wicked." You will please to solve the difficulty sir, how, strictly speaking, God could be "angry with the wicked every day," and still SO LOVE THE WORLD as to give his son to die for it, and COMMEND HIS LOVE TO SINNERS, St. John, 3, 16, 17; Rom. 5, 8. God is angry in the same sense that the sun rises and sets, both of which are true in popular speech, but neither is true in a philosophical sense.

* The same figure of speech is used where our Lord calls himself "the way and the truth and the life—the resurrection and the life—the bread of life:" where he is called, "the true light," and his disciples "the light of the world." Examples of this fact abound in scripture, but they need not be multiplied. In Melotomy, the effect is sometimes put for the cause, or one word for another, &c.

Should you be so good as to favour us with another communication on the subject, endeavour to inform us, sir, a little more than what you are "at a loss to know," and "cannot see," &c. The matter is too serious to be trifled with; and I apprehend you will not deny, that you have endeavoured to throw difficulties in the way, rather than to illustrate facts. You are aware, sir, that your "arguments" are read by thousands; but like your doctrine, your name is a secret! What I have written, I fearlessly submit to a generous and enlightened publick.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

CANANDAIGUA, JUNE 1st, 1826.

To Mr. A. Field and Miss A. Beals.

My young friends, perhaps you may be surprised to receive a letter from a person who is unacquainted with you. But upon enquiry, I found you to be the persons who had the goodness to call at the house of my father, to warn both him and his family, of their final destiny. And I think you treated them, not only unhandsonely, but with nothing less than insult. What opinion would you have of me, were I to enter the house of your father, and treat your parents in the same manner which you did mine? I think you would suppose me, not only destitute of Christianity, but of common politeness also. Of what crime are we guilty, that we must receive such treatment? Ah! I am sensible from whence it proceeds; the crime falls on myself and sister;—and here we shall see what it is. We chanced to be at the house of Mr. Phelps, when Mr. Eddy* called to see Miss Laura.† After enquiring who we were, he began to question us upon religion; this was all very well. But when we had the audacity, (as I suppose you will call it,) to reply without hypocrisy to his questions, according to our belief, he did not fail to say, that God's justice would send me to hell, and that he should have nothing to do with me; though he appeared to be more solicitous for the soul of my sister. When I confessed myself a sinner with all the rest of mankind, he disputed me, and said that I did not think myself a sinner. And when I told him that I put my trust in God, and not in the arm of flesh, he replied, that I said what he dared not say.

Now I would ask where Mr. Eddy puts his trust, if not in God? He thought me on a slender foundation; but can he find a more sure foundation than God? If he dare not say, that he puts his trust in God, how dare he profess himself a Christian and teacher of the meek and lowly Jesus? Ought not a teacher of Christianity to know that his trust is in God, the parent of all good? Furthermore, how did he know that I did not think myself a sinner? Is he authorized from above to judge the thoughts or heart of another? Let us look into our own hearts, and see if we do not find some noxious plants there, before we attempt to search or judge the heart of our neighbour.

My young friends: I suppose our conversation with Mr. Eddy, is the cause of your visit to this house; and if replying with sincerity from the heart, be a crime, I confess guilty; but if not, I am innocent. I think you must have forgotten, that this is a free country, and poor people have the liberty of conscience and speech as well as the rich! My mind is quite as independent as though I were possessed of all the wealth of the Indies. I do not fear to express my sentiments when accosted. I court not the favour of the rich; though I value the friendship of every candid, honest mind, yet I stoop not to hypocrisy, to gain the applause of man; I feel that God is my friend, and on his friendship, I can rely with safety; and I firmly believe Him to be a friend to all mankind, not an enemy as He is often represented from the sacred desk.—His goodness and tender mercies are over all the works of His hands; and I believe His justice to be in perfect unison with His goodness and mercy. Can any reasonable being suppose God to be possessed of two attributes, viz. justice and mercy, continually at variance; mercy pleading for the sinner, and justice warring against mercy. Where could be His happiness? The thought is absurd.—Consider that God is infinite, knowing, before He created man, all things that would take place with him; and it is His will, that all should come to the knowledge of the truth and be saved. And shall we, poor, weak worms of the dust, rise up and say that God will not have all His pleasure; when He expressly declares it. Nothing is more dishonourable of God, than to suppose that He, being infinite in goodness, could form a being for the purpose of making it endlessly miserable; neither suppose He can possibly be disappointed in his plan.

I have charity to think that you were sincere, and thought you were doing your duty in calling to lecture old people, who have probably had as much experience as you will have, should you arrive at the age of fifty years.—Should you ever arrive at that age, you will, probably, look back with shame, and regret that you ever made use of such uncouth language to people of their age. I think it to be the effect of an over-heated zeal for their welfare. I humbly hope and trust, that you will cherish heaven-born charity, of which here is a description:

"WHAT IS CHARITY."

"'Tis not to pause when at your door,
A shivering brother stands;
To ask the cause that makes him poor,
Or why he help demands;

'Tis not to spurn that brother's prayer,
For faults he once had known,
'Tis not to leave him in despair,
And say that I have none;

The voice of charity is kind,
She thinketh nothing wrong;
To every fault she seemeth blind,
Nor vaunteth with her tongue;

In penitence she placeth faith,
Hope smileth at her door,
Relieveth first, then softly saith,
Go, brother, sin no more."

I think charity is one of the brightest ornaments that can adorn the mind of a Christian. St. Paul says, "though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing," &c. We are commanded to have charity one for another. But, Mr. Field, does it look like charity, to assume the authority of a judge, and condemn others, because they differ from you in opinion. Remember that you are but a man, and as liable to be wrong as your neighbour. Do not say to thy brother, stand by thyself, I am more holy than thou! Remember that Christ says, with what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged; and, with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. My young friends, do not trust in yourselves, that you are more righteous than others. Remember that in due time, Christ died for the ungodly; and O! what praise and adoration do we not owe to that divine Parent for His goodness, in sending his only begotten-son, to be a propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world. When I take a survey of his goodness, I am filled with inexpressible joy; then it is I can say in my heart, that neither angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, is able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.—Being conscious that I intend no evil to any one, I feel that faith in God, which it is not in the power of man to take away.

Here are a few lines expressive of my sentiments:

CONSCIOUS RECTITUDE.

"Steadfast and true to virtue's sacred laws,
Unmoved by vulgar censure or applause,
Let the world talk; my friend, that world we know,
Which calls us guilty cannot make us so;
Unawed by numbers, follow nature's plan,
Assert the right, or quit the name of man.

Consider well, weigh strictly right and wrong,
Resolve not quick, but once resolv'd, be strong;
In spite of dullness and in spite of wit,
If to thyself, thou canst thyself acquit,
Rather stand up assured with conscious pride, Alone—than err with millions by thy side."

I had rather have the applause of my own conscience, than of millions. I have written more than I intended, but shall trust to your generosity to pardon me for presuming on your patience; likewise to pardon the imperfections you will find in this letter, for it is from the hand of an imperfect young woman.

I hope that I have not written any thing to injure the feelings of any one, for it was not my intention. I have thus written to let you know, that it is not in the power of man, to change my mind. It must be by the Almighty power of God, if it be changed. I must close by subscribing myself your friend, &c.

LASIRA I. OSBORN.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MR. EDITOR—The following questions, I desire to have answered in your paper; if they could be scripturally and rationally replied to, I think it would do good.

1. Why did Christ say that there was a character, who was in danger of "eternal damnation," if it were not possible for such a thing to be?

2. What is the sin unto death, which hath no forgiveness in this world nor that which is to come?

3. Are not two characters set forth in the Scriptures—viz. the righteous and the wicked,—and the promise of heaven to the former and hell the latter?

4. What are we to understand of the separation of the sheep and the goats, and the everlasting punishment threatened the goats?

5. Satan said, "thou shalt not surely die;—is not the doctrine of universal salvation to the same purport and effect?"

6. Is universalism a proper doctrine to preach in the world? and does it not lead to licentiousness, or make people worse, instead of better, as all will eventually be saved if the doctrine be true?

P. DAY.

Answers to the above questions will be given as time and room will permit. Although each subject proposed has been heretofore considered in our columns; yet, as many who now take our paper have not heretofore perused it, it is hoped that it will be satisfactory to all, to hear again of the matter. Ed.

ANECDOTE.—Two persons met at the house of a Friend, and spent several long hours in telling over their conviction, conversion, religious discoveries and exploits; both of them frequently asserting their change from nature to grace. At length, having mostly exhausted their fund of intelligence, one of them began to sigh and groan, and disfigure his face, —complaining bitterly about his hard and deceitful heart, which he said, was desperately wicked. The other, being more sincere, or supposing there was no necessity for such pious apologies at that time, expressed his serious doubts of the correctness of such language. But the Deacon would not give way in the least; he insisted that he was actually as bad as he had described himself to be. And just as the other professor was about to reason him out of his humiliating confession, the Quaker interrupted him—"Friend, thou wouldst do well, first to make thyself acquainted with this Deacon's character among his neighbours; by which thou wouldst be convinced that he had at least, once told thee the truth."

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

UNIVERSALIST CONVENTION OF THE STATE OF NEW-YORK.

Having stated, in our last number, some objections against this Convention, on the ground that the plan is imperfect, it may now be pertinent to offer, for the consideration of our readers, a few reasons why it should not be adopted, on the ground that its proceedings are incompatible with the spirit of Christianity, and consequently detrimental to our cause. And here I would remark, that the following statements are made under the influence of charity for all concerned, and with a view only to subserve the best interests of our cause in this state. If we know our own hearts, there is not the semblance of hard feeling cherished by the writer, towards either of the individuals friendly to the measure we oppose. On the contrary, we would impute to them all, the best of motives;—but even the purity of their intentions may be exhibited with advantage, to show the corrupting effect of the convention. And in noticing the transactions of the convention it will be seen how the best of men may be led into error, by adopting a bad plan of government.

1. The Convention has already dictated, in matters of conscience, to those who have acknowledged its authority. It is well known, that many of our brethren in the ministry are conscientiously opposed to ordinances, believing that such things are unnecessary and anti-christian. We only mention this circumstance as a matter of fact, without expressing an opinion as to the utility or inutility of such ordinances, and without advocating either the affirmative or negative of the question. Now, it has ever been a custom amongst us, until this convention has had a name to live, as an order, to leave every matter of conscience to be decided between the creature and the Creator. But one of its first undertakings was, to produce an uniformity throughout the associations and societies under its jurisdiction, in matters of this kind. This fact is testified by minutes of their proceedings. Here, then, during the infancy of the convention, while it was panting for existence, it assumed the right to infringe upon the ancient usages of the order, by dictating in matters of opinion! True, it has not yet adopted a creed; but the constitution of the convention serves as a substitute; and at any future meeting, they may adopt one.

Again:—The convention has not only issued its public instructions, in the form of resolutions, &c. but it has actually, through its committee appointed for such purposes, at least in one instance, sent forth an admonitory letter, plainly censuring a brother in the ministry for holding and propagating certain sentiments therein mentioned, supposed by the convention to be erroneous, relating to the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper. In this letter, the one to whom it was addressed, was reminded of his supposed error of opinion, and admonished to abstain from inculcating it on pain of the disapprobation of the convention.—We do not pretend to give the words of the letter, not having it in our possession, but the foregoing is substantially its import. Now we do say,—and we appeal to the good sense of every reader in confirmation of it—this measure is entirely subversive of the principles of our doctrine, and destructive of that liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. And this circumstance may be reckoned among the evils which have already grown out of the measure.

2. It is with no ordinary sensations that we mention another evil effect, which has already been produced by the convention. We speak of it with reluctance, knowing that it may bring upon ourselves the imputation of acting from selfish and interested motives. But it is known to our readers generally, that before anything transpired which could in the least affect our individual interest, we were honestly and openly hostile to such a Convention. Nor would we have it inferred from the following observations, that we fear the influence of the convention when exerted against us, or desire its support, as a body, if it should ever be disposed to grant it. We are either above or below it, and in either case may presume to give our opinion of its proceedings.

The evil to which we allude, is briefly this:—the convention has extended its official patronage to a periodical paper, published at Utica; and in so doing has infringed upon the rights of others. It is devoutly hoped that this statement will not be construed into an act of hostility against the Utica Magazine, or of disrespect for the editor; we justly appreciate all that is valuable in the former, and prize, very highly, the moral and intellectual excellence of the latter. We advert to the circumstance, to show that this convention,—this submissive and unassuming Convention, HAS MEDDLED WITH BUSINESS THAT DOES NOT BELONG TO IT! We leave it for our brethren to determine, whether such proceedings are to be approbated by intelligent universalists—whether we as a body of Christians, are to copy the examples of other denominations, by selecting our favourites and turning out of doors the residue of our faithful servants. For one, we shall manfully oppose every such infringement upon the principles of justice, so long as resistance is of any use: and when the last word is spoken, we will groan a requiem to departed integrity, and no longer strive to uphold liberty, liberality, or justice, under the name of universalism!

The foregoing evils are not imaginary: they have already resulted from the plan of the convention. They are so many facts, staring us in the face, to warn us of the impropriety, the inutility—the danger of adopting a convention of the kind! We hesitate not, therefore, to declare, that until we are convinced by experience, that the evils we have enumerated are blessings of the highest order, (whatever the consequences may be to ourselves,) we shall oppose the convention in its present form. Our friends, therefore, who have desired us to express an opinion upon this subject, may rest assured, that nothing but a demonstration that we are wrong, will lead us to abandon the ground we have taken; and however sincerely we may regret the loss of friends on this account, we would rather be driven to the ends of the earth by the frowns of a contemptuous world, than barter our conscience for the approbation, even of our brethren.

3. Another evil which has grown out of this affair, is the deep-rooted dissatisfaction that has been produced in the minds of some of our most worthy brethren, by the untiring perseverance of the friends of the Convention. Time after time, the proposition has been presented before the different associations in this state, and rejected; yet its friends have persevered in their purposes. At a time when nothing in creation was found to sustain the measure, a new association was created to uphold it. The friends of the convention found themselves in the minority; and yet seemed determined not to submit. Their perseverance has led to the most unhappy consequences. Brethren, who have long defended the faith—whose locks have grown grey in the service—whose cheeks are furrowed with care for our struggling cause, have been wounded in the house of their friends, by the frequent attempts of our brethren to carry their point. This has induced some of them to withdraw from their association; and this act, of itself, is one among the many reasons why the convention should be abandoned. Peace has departed from the borders of our Zion, in consequence of the introduction of this plan; and it can never be restored until the convention shall be abolished.

It may be said that a majority of the ministering brethren are in favour of the convention, and therefore, the minority should comply with their wishes. In reply, we remark, that a majority of the ministers in this state are not friendly to the measure; and if they were, a large majority of the lay brethren are opposed to it, and therefore, if for no other reason, it should be abandoned.

In another number, God willing, an attempt will be made to exhibit a plan, which, we do believe if adopted, will lead to peace, and restore order and harmony in the connexion. Want of room prevents a farther enlargement at this time. We submit the foregoing observation, together with the facts related, to our candid and discriminating readers, with a desire that what is reasonable may be duly regarded.

FROM THE CHRISTIAN TELESCOPE.

SHORT SERMON.

"Say ye to the righteous that it shall be well with him for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Wo unto the wicked! it shall be ill with him for the reward of his hands shall be given him." Isah iii. 10, 11

The lovers of pleasure may meet around the table of luxury, satiate their appetites and drown their reason in their intoxicating bowl, but bitter will be their recollections of these scenes of folly, "these chambers of death."

The youth may revel in the haunts of dissipation, eagerly grasp at the temptation's glittering bait—waste his time—abuse his talents—living a slave to his passions and his lusts, till wasting sickness or untimely death stays him in his mad career, and too late he finds he has walked in the ways of darkness, the gates of which are the "very gates of hell."

The sycophant may tear the rose of beauty from the female bosom, and stab the fatal dagger of flattery into the unsuspecting heart—rejoicing in his accursed deed—feast upon his spoil—yet he may rest assured the bitter cup of "tribulation" is filling up, of which he shall drink, even to its very dregs—the frown of a virtuous publick shall fall upon him, and the all-seeing eye of a holy and just God pierce his polluted soul—"who will by no means clear the guilty," but render unto him, and "every man according to his works."

The worldling may fondly anticipate happiness in the accumulation of riches; but as they increase so will his desires; and should they not suddenly "take to themselves wings and fly away," but like the man in the gospel, "having much laid up for many years, is he resolved to take his ease, eat, drink, and be merry," regardless of the wants of others—insensible to the goodness of Heaven—forgetful of his dependence upon an overruling Providence, and dead to his accountability, sooner or later, his air-built castles will crumble before him—Stung with remorse; without the cheering hopes of another, better and happier world, he is suddenly called from time to the realities of eternity! "Foolish indeed are they in whose thoughts God never dwells"—"who build their house upon the sand"—"who lay up treasures for themselves, but are not rich towards Him." "It is not so with those whose treasure is in heaven," for where their treasure is there will their hearts be also; they who "are rich towards God"—rich in good works, shall find by happy experience, "in keeping of the commandments a great reward, and finally receive the plaudit of their Saviour and their Judge—pass to the "joys of their Lord" and Master; and in the dispensation of the fulness of time, welcome the return of every prodigal to God their Saviour, and to heaven their home. They that "remember their Creator in the days of their youth," rejoice in the bright prospect before them, and while they walk in the sight of their eyes, and conscious of this solemn truth, "that for all things God will bring them into judgement—keeping in view the recompense of reward." they "use the world as not abusing it"—in due time do they find the promise verified, that "godliness is profitable in all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come;" having early sought their Creator, "happily do they find him"—being early acquainted with his mercies they live all their days to his glory—"fear to do evil, learn to do well."

They with whom "love is without dissimulation," who "abhor that which is evil and cleave to that which is good"—drink from the fountain of christianity the "pure waters of life" and salvation, both in the cooling streams of religion; with others of like precious faith they are bound together by the silken bands of love all pure—"glory, honour and immortality" is their reward—Through life their path brightens before them—fearless of death, beneath the banner of their Prince and Saviour, they pass its dark valley; seizing immortal youth, like angels live in love, in harmony and bliss.

"Now therefore hearken unto the voice of wisdom. Blessed is the man that heareth her, watching daily at her gates—waiting at the posts of her doors; for whoso findeth her, findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord, but he that sinneth against her, wrongeth his own soul; all that hate her, love death."

N. W.

SICK AND LIKE TO DIE—Is that much celebrated, and now very aged matron, who, when in her best days, was the idol of Europe, whose vassals were kings, princes, popes and cardinals, together with the multitudes of their subjects throughout their countries and dominions. There have many curious and wonderful things been credibly reported of this singular personage. Her beauty was formerly so attracting that the heart of the beholder was generally devoted the moment her bewitching charms met his eye; and the most sacred obligations, instantly violated in compliance with her resistless fascinations. It has since, however, been ascertained that her beauty was artificial, and that she owed the whole of her charms to a company of curious and cunning artists, who were wholly devoted to the business of preparing her dress, varying her different garments, putting on her attire, and painting her face. For this devotion to her person, she liberally rewarded them with wealth and honor, which she found means to obtain from the immense multitudes who devoted all their earnings to this mistress of their hearts.

These artists were expert in varying the appearance of her eye, which, to one who presumed to withhold his heart, and be independent of her favour, they rendered piercing as lightning and as furious as a demon; while its melting sweetness would light on her favourites and devotees with such ineffable attractions as no power could resist. Her teeth were enormous for size, but she could cover them at pleasure, with the most charming lips, which she never failed to do when communing with her friends. But it is said, and her most faithful lovers do not deny it, that she was subject to fits of such violent anger, that she has bitten off the heads of thousands, who were blind to her beauty.

When this singular creature came to America, she was fairly on the decline, though many hearts drank of her love, and some lost their heads; but her teeth are now gone, and there is no danger of her committing such acts of violence on those, who set their affections on one, who possesses real beauty and worth, and is under no necessity of so much dress and paint.

We have seen this old — since she has been confined to her room; she looks miserably, and yet we cannot pity her in the least. But it is impossible to see her artists stand round her with their shears and brushes, trying to alter her dress, and to daub on paint in order to make the old wrinkled — look young, and even shedding tears at her fast decline, without pitying their folly and blind devotion to SUPERSTITION! — Universalist Mag.

It is a fact that two men from Vermont are now (July 11th) working by the side of one of the wharves in New-London, for buried money, by the advice and recommendation of an old woman in that state, who assured them that she could distinctly see a box of dollars packed edgewise. The locality was pointed out to an inch, and her only way of discovering the treasure was by looking through a stone, which to ordinary opticks was hardly translucent. — Hartford Mirror.

THE SPRING.

Thee, muse of Nature, thee we hail,
Whose fostering showers, and genial gale,
Prepares the cold and lifeless earth,
To push her teeming treasures forth.
Season of Youth, and love, and joy,
May no cold blights our hopes destroy,
No chilling midnight frosts appear
To check the promise of the year.
Author of Spring? we turn to thee,
With suppliant eye and bended kneec;
We bless, we praise thy lavish hand,
That now invigorates the land.
Accept our early thankful lays,
The springing blossoms of our days,
That thou hast promised to restore Undying Spring forevermore.

[Inserted by request of the friends of the deceased.]

Departed this life in Marcellus, on Saturday morning the 5th of February, 1820, SAMUEL HOWE, 3d son of Mr. P. E. and Mrs. B. Howe, in the 19th year of his age, after a painful illness of one week. — Beloved and respected, he died lamented by a large circle of friends and relatives. His disposition was amiable, his character unimpeachable. He died with a firm belief that he should enter into the mansions of eternal rest, and there, at the right hand of Jehovah, chaunt the love and mercy of our adorable Redeemer.

Sermon from Eccl. xii 1. by Rev. I. Whittall.

The following hymn was sung at the grave.

1. Thy fragrant bosom, earth unfold,
And gently lay thy softest mould;
We bring a slumberer full of charms,
And lodge him in thy gloomy arms!
2. Yet think not grave, that we resign,
This treasure as forever thine;
We only ask a transient stay,
'Till heaven unfolds th' eternal May.
3. Then shall this mould'ring frame of flesh,
Spring forth in blooming life afresh,
And death that swallows all shall be Swallow'd himself in victory.
4. Let no rude step disturb the ground,
Where this reposing youth is found,
But cherubs here their vigils keep,
To guard his dust and sooth his sleep.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

LETTER NO. 3.

To Elder JOSEPH BADGER, of Mendon, Monroec, co. N. Y.

SIR: You and the publick will have perceived the difficulty in which your first proposition has involved you, and the folly you manifested in adopting the course you did.—Whether your second will turn out more to your credit, I shall endeavour to put the community in a way to determine. In the second place, you say, “Universalism is contrary to the word of God.”

It is to be observed, that, what has been said, in regard to “the principles of sound reasoning,” is equally applicable here, and need not be repeated. For it will not be questioned, that “the word of God” is consistent with “sound reasoning,” or it is not. There is no middle course to be taken. If it be not, it is of no use to reasonable beings. If it is, which, to me, is as obvious as any other truth, what reason proves, in relation to this subject, is also proved by revelation. And as it is our belief, that “the word of God” contains an account of the “duty, interest and final destiny of all men,” it is to the latter fact, that I shall chiefly draw your, and the publick’s attention.

1. “THE WORD OF GOD” proves the salvation of all men, on the ground, that “God will render to every man according to his works.” “He will by NO MEANS clear the guilty,” Num. 14, 18. He will punish “all the kingdoms of the world, which are upon the face of the earth,” Jer. 25, 15, 26. “Behold, ALL SOULS ARE MINE; as the soul of the father, so also, the soul of the son is mine; the soul that sinneth it shall die,” Cor. 13, 4. “*The wicked shall be turned into hell,* and ALL THE NATIONS that forget God.*” Ps. 9, 17. “The fire shall try every man’s work,” 1st Cor. 3, 12, 15, “He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons,” Col. 3, 25. “Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give EVERY MAN ACCORDING AS HIS WORK SHALL BE,” Rev. 22, 12. All, acquainted with the scriptures, know to what a length I could continue similar quotations, proving the positive and unconditional punishment of every offender for every offence; but the above are sufficient for the present purpose.

Sir, I would have you look at your favourite theory, here, and compare it with “the sound principles of reasoning.” You profess to believe in revelation, I think. Do you admit the unqualified truth of the above texts of “the word of God”? And do you contend, that the sins of mankind subject them to ceaseless anguish or eternal slumber? Which you certainly believe, I know not, nor do I think there can be found three individuals belonging to the societies where you labour, who can tell what you do believe!! But it matters not which of the two. They are both horrid and final; and in either case, the whole race of man would be consigned to unending and unutterable wo, or to eternal unconsciousness!! setting aside such as may not have sinned. I fearlessly, though with humble deference, declare, that there is not a denomination of Christians on earth, who repose honourable and due confidence and faith in the holy scriptures, embracing all the threatenings and promises, the judgments and mercies, except the Universalists! Infidelity, in some of its forms, though, perhaps, in some cases innocently, is found in every system of partial salvation! By attaching infinite consequences to the threatenings, they destroy the promises, which are made for all nations; kindreds and families of the earth; and by a vicarious atonement, they deny the threatenings, at least, to a part of mankind; and charge the immutable Ruler of the universe, with partiality and double-mindedness! There never was, nor can there be, a limited system of salvation, which allows salvation to man, on any other principles, than, at the expense of the strictest and most reasonable demands of justice! Hence it is, that you “strengthen the hands of the wicked by promising them life,” at the charges of another. They are led to admit the horrid dogma of endless misery, and, that, if they are saved, they must be delivered from what their sins have merited. The object becomes magnified to their distorted senses, and they lose sight of the design of the gospel of * Hebrew, sheol, Greek, hades. Literally, “the state of the dead, without any reference to the goodness or badness of the persons, their happiness or misery.”—Dr. Campbell. Figuratively, mental anguish.—Camp. 2nd Sam. 22, 6; Ps. 86, 13, and 116, 3.

Jesus, which is to save us from our sins. Indeed, present salvation is, in a measure, by this doctrine, sunk into nothing, when compared to infinite torture; and "by promising them deliverance" from all deserved punishment, you "strengthen" their hands to continue in sin, and repent at some future day!!

2. "THE WORD OF GOD" proves the salvation of all men, on the ground, that the object of punishment is reformation. We have seen, already, that chastisement is threatened to every offender. And it is further evident, that "whatever the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law; that every mouth may be stopt, and all the world may become guilty before God," Rom. 3, 19. We have also seen that "there is no respect of persons with God," Acts 10, 34; Col. 3, 25. Hence, if he chastise one individual for benevolent purposes, his object is the same in regard to all, and ever will be, while there remains an offender, for he is without variableness or shadow of turning, James, 1, 17. "It is good for me, that I have been afflicted, that I might learn thy statutes. I know, O Lord, that thy judgments are right, and, that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me," Ps. 119, 71, 75. "The Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies; for he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men," Lam. 3, 31, 33. God "is kind to the unthankful and the evil," Luke, 6, 35; Matt. 5, 45. He inflicts chastisement, "of which all are partakers," "for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness," Heb. 12, 5, 11.

Here, sir, in connexion with "the sound principles of reasoning," let it be asked, is the above object of punishment consistent with the character of our merciful Father? Are not his wisdom, his goodness, and his power, combined to effect the salvation of his offspring? And can infinite love, wisdom and power fail to accomplish the object in view? Will God be endlessly chastising his creatures for their good? or will such chastisement end in their annihilation? Answer these questions, sir, when you have leisure, according to "the principles of sound reasoning."

3. "THE WORD OF GOD" proves the salvation of all men, on the ground, that the destinies of all flesh are in the hands of our merciful Creator. He "declared the end from the beginning, saying my counsels shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure," Isa. 46, 10. He sent Jesus to be "the Saviour of the world," and we have the assurance, that "he shall not fail nor be discouraged;" and that "the pleasure of Jehovah shall prosper in his hands," 1st John, 4, 14, Isa. 42, 4, and 53, 10. Christ came to do the will of the Father; and it is said of him, that he shall fulfil all his will, St. John, 6, 38, 39, comp. Acts, 13, 22, 23.

He "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, what doest thou," Dan. 4, 35; Eph. 1, 11. Is it "sound reasoning," sir to contend, that Omnipotence will fail to accomplish his purposes?

4. "THE WORD OF GOD" proves the salvation of all men, by direct and positive testimony. As it was said above, that "the wicked shall be turned into hell, (sheol,) and all the nations that FORGET God;" so, we have the testimony of the same authour, that "all the ends of the world SHALL REMEMBER and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall come and worship before him," Ps. 22, 27. "All nations whom thou hast made, shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name," Ps. 86, 9. "And in this mountain, shall the Lord of Hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined; and he will destroy, in this mountain, the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people will he take away from off all the earth, for the Lord hath spoken it," Isa. 25, 6, 8. "I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear," com. "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him (Jesus) and given him a name which is above every name, that in the name of Jesus, every knee should bow, of things in heaven, of things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father!" Isa. 45, 23, 24, Phil. 6, 9, 11. "That in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one [or rehead] all things in Christ, ("if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature," 2d Cor. 5, 17,) both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him," Eph. 1, 10. "And having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him I say, whether they be things in earth or things in heaven," Col. 1, 20. "God was, in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing unto them (the world) their trespasses," 2d Cor. 5, 19. "Who will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth; for there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," 1st Tim. 2, 4, 6. "And this is life eternal, that they might KNOW thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."—"They shall all be taught of God;" "and they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord, for all shall KNOW me from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins, and their iniquities will I remember no more," St. John, 17, 8, and 6, 45, and Heb. 8, 11, 12. And as the result of the foregoing declarations of holy writ, and a full confirmation of what I have been endeavouring to show, John, in vision, says, "and I beheld, and heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the living creatures,* and the elders, and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands, saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing. And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are [on] the sea, and all that are in them, heard I, saying, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him who sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever," Rev. 5, 11, 13.

By "the word of God," and "the sound principles of reasoning," we are instructed, 1. That our heavenly Father had a benevolent object in view, in creating our species. 2. That "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God," Rom. 3 23. 3. That "he who doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done." See above. 4. That the object of God, in chastising every man, is to reform him. 5. That the designs and "counsels" of Omnipotence, cannot be frustrated. 6. That God loves the world, and his love is as immutable as it is unlimited; hence, 7. ~~That~~ That "all men will be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth," and "rise from glory to glory, even by the spirit of the Lord."

Sir, how many more reasons can you give why you are not a Universalist? If I have not been misinformed, you said you could give fifty!!! We should like to see more of them, if they are any better than those you have given! Suppose you order your reasons inserted in the Advocate! The doctrine of Universalism is rapidly spreading, which, if false, ought to be checked; and should your reasons tend to enlighten the publick in these important matters, you might immortalize your name; and, perhaps, hereafter be canonized!

But, sir, I entertain no doubt, that there can be many substantial reasons given, why you are not an Universalist! and which might be distinguished by "the sound principles of reasoning," and by "the word of God." But these would have as little weight in proving Universalism false, as your arguments had! I regret that the subject has necessarily called forth these reflections; but it may teach you in future, that "those who live in glass houses should be careful how they cast stones."

Your third reason will next come under examination, which I shall give all the attention it deserves.

Yours &c.

W. I. REESE.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MR. EDITOR,

Sir—I wish to be indulged in a few remarks, through the medium of the Press, on the charge of dishonesty so often laid at the door of Universalists. It is frequently said of them, they do not believe the sentiments they attempt to vindicate. I have frequently been charged with dishonesty, in this respect, by those who are as destitute of true politeness, as they are pregnant with bigotry and prejudice. I am frequently accosted thus: You don't believe the doctrine you profess; you do not believe in Universal Salvation; you know you don't; it's so inconsistent, so absurd, so unreasonable, you can't believe it. Another addresses me with more apparent politeness, with a smiling countenance, accompanied with a flattering compliment, and says: Now you don't really believe all men will be saved; it's so inconsistent; you are too good a man to believe such an absurdity, that all wicked men are going to be saved and go to heaven; you can't believe it, &c. &c.—Now, Mr. Editor, I wish to continue this sort of irony by adding a few more ironical remarks. It is said the doctrine of Universal Salvation is too absurd, too unreasonable, too inconsistent, to be believed.

How inconsistent it is to believe that God will deliver all his erring offspring from moral pollution! that he will cleanse them from every foul stain of moral turpitude, from every sinful desire, from every evil propensity, and cause them all to love and worship him in spirit and in truth, is truly incredible! Notwithstanding, it is the desire of every benevolent heart; the devout prayer of every Christian; the real desire of every philanthropick soul. How inconsistent, how incredible, that God, who is "Love," should grant this desire, when the command of God's law is universally, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself." How inconsistent to believe this command will fully be obeyed, when God promised to Abram, Gen. xii. 3, that in his seed, which is Christ, Gal. iii. 16, and 8. "All the families of the earth shall be blessed." How absurd to believe that this promise will be fulfilled. When the Psalmist David says, Psalms lxxxvi. 9. "All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name." How inconsistent it is to believe it, when the Lord declares with an oath, * Kneeland's translation.

Isaiah xlv. 23, 24, "That unto him every knee shall bow; every tongue shall swear, surely shall say in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." How unreasonable to suppose this will be done! how absurd to believe that a Being of infinite wisdom, who comprehends at one view, all intellectual nature, who declares the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure," Isaiah xlv. 10, should, according to his good pleasure, purpose in himself to gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him. Ephe. i. 9, 10. When the living God is declared to be the Saviour of all men, and Timothy is exhorted to command and teach these things, 1 Tim. iv. 10, 11. how absurd to believe he will save all men! When it was said by the angel Luke, ii. 10, "Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people," how inconsistent to believe all people will be benefitted by it. When Christ was declared to be the "Saviour of the world," John iv. 42, how unreasonable to suppose the world will be saved. When Christ, by the grace of God, hath "tasted death for every man," Heb. i. 9. how inconsistent to believe that "He shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied," Isaiah liii. 11. When "it pleased the Father that in him (Christ) should all fulness dwell, and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself," Col. i. 19, 20 how absurd to believe all will be reconciled. When Christ is declared to be "the head of the church," "the head over all things," "the head of every man," Col. i. 18. Eph. i. 22. 1 Cor. xi. 3. how inconsistent to believe that every man is or will be a member of that head! When God hath appointed his Son Jesus "HEIR TO ALL THINGS," Heb. i. 2. how incredible that he will possess his inheritance. When he "gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," 1 Tim. ii. 6 how absurd to believe that the "ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion, with songs of everlasting joy upon their heads," Isaiah xxxv. 10. When the Apostle Peter declares "the restitution of all things," is a doctrine "which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began," Acts iii. 21. how inconsistent it is to believe the "restitution of all things!" When the Apostle John beheld and heard "every creature which is in heaven and on the earth and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, even all that are in them, saying, "Blessing and honour, and glory and power, be unto him that sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever," Rev. v. 13. how inconsistent to believe the "Amen." How absurd and unreasonable to believe that so it will be.

Having presented the reader with a few inconsistencies and absurdities, we will now offer something that appears more consistent and reasonable. It appears reasonable and consistent that a Being of infinite wisdom, who created all worlds and creatures, who foresaw every event that would take place long before man existed on the earth, who is infinite in wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth, would bring into existence millions of intelligent creatures, make them capable of enjoying happiness and of suffering misery, "Govern all his creatures and all their actions," (Westminster Chatechism.) make one part of his creatures infinitely happy in a world without end; consign the rest to a place of torment of indistinguishable anguish, continue that torment and anguish through the endless ages of a literal eternity—this is consistent, this is credible, there is no doubt of the truth of it! Yes, when millions and millions of ages shall have rolled away, their misery shall then be but just commencing, compared with eternity. When as many millions of ages shall have rolled away, as there are grains of sand in the earth, and leaves on the trees, and drops of water in the ocean; will their agony then cease? will they then be liberated? No, it is reasonable and consistent to believe, that they will never, never, never be released!! Their shrieks, their groans and piercing cries are to echo and re-echo through the black regions of hell to all eternity!! It is reasonable to believe, that that Being, who first gave them existence, who says "as I live I have no pleasure in the death or him that dieth," will perpetuate and continue their hopeless, deathless existence through the endless ages of eternity. This is reason! This is consistency! When, for this purpose, the Son of God, was "manifest, to destroy the works of the devil," 1st John, iii. 8, to "destroy death and him that had the power of death, that is the devil," how reasonable to suppose that death, yea, infinite death, will eternally reign!! But I must stop the blasphemy. Notwithstanding the above is written ironically, yet it sounds wicked in the extreme. O thou God of justice, whose wisdom is without partiality and without hypocrisy, let me never ascribe to thee such a character, a character that would disgrace a Nero! a character, which, if ascribed to the foulest fiend in thy vast creation, he would spurn it with contemptuous indignity. Is it not a contradiction in terms, to affirm, that a being, possessing all the attributes of infinite wisdom, will eternally sport with the miseries of his own offspring, the workmanship of his own hands? Let this matter be pressed home upon every candid, discerning mind. Let those who limit the Grace of the Holy One of Israel, who may chance to read this communication, and who may be about to join some society, and subscribe to the doctrine of endless misery, pause for a moment. Stop,—consider; beware what character you ascribe to that Being, whom you call infinitely good.—Beware of ascribing a character to him, so abhorrent to the best feelings he has given you; so derogatory to his every attribute: so repugnant to the prayer of every Christian. The doctrine being so inconsistent, let the enquiry be made—ought there not to be something in scripture, very explicit, to warrant such a belief? But what is there so explicit on this point? There is this explicit language to the contrary, “God is love.” He is “no respecter of persons.” He is “without partiality.”—He “will not contend forever.” He “will not cast off forever,” “for the spirit should fail before him, and the soul which he has made” “Though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies.” “His tender mercies are over all his works;” 1st John. iv, 8, 16; Rom. ii, 11; Col. iii, 25; Acts, x, 34; Job, xxxviii, 24; 1st Pet. i, 17; James, iii, 17; Isaiah, lvii, 16; Lam. iii, 31, 32.

But what is the explicit language of scripture that proves the doctrine of endless punishment? Now we believe in the punishment of the wicked for sin; but then we believe in the punishment of all the wicked for sin, because God is no respecter of persons; “but he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons.” What is there so explicit to prove the punishment endless in duration? A doctrine so heart-withering, so God-dishonoring. A simple adjective—a mere term—a term which, Parkhurst says, “denotes duration or continuance of time, but with great variety.” What a wonderful discovery! what a prop for endless misery! The Greek aion and its adjective, from which all our English terms, rendered—eternal, everlasting, never, forever, forever and ever, is variously employed. It is used in the plural number, Ephesians, ii, 7; Heb. i, 2; Matt. xii, 32. How many eternities are there? The scriptures also speak of the end of the aion; Matt. xiii, 39, 49, and xxiv, 3, and xxviii, 20; of a period before the aions began, 1st Cor. ii, 7; the beginning and end of the aions, Eph. iii, 9. Heb. xi, 26. But does eternity begin or end? Is the doctrine of endless misery built on a mere term; which is thus variously employed? What a mighty foundation to build an eternity of misery upon; when the solemn sanction of the Great Jehovah is, “I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth;” notwithstanding he declares that for his pleasure, all things are and were created. Querie.—If the Almighty has no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, will death eternally reign? Will he suffer that to reign forever, that will be to him an eternal displeasure? Will he not redeem them from death? We have his word for it; “I will redeem them from death.”—Redeem whom from death? Ephraim, that same Ephraim, of whom it was said, “he is joined to his idols, let him alone.” “O death, I will be thy plague. O Hell, (Hades) I will be thy destruction; repentance shall be hid from my eyes,” Hos. xiii, 14. He will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God shall wipe away tears from off all faces. “The last enemy death shall be destroyed.” “And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also be subject unto Him that put all things under him, that God may be ALL IN ALL,” Isaiah, xxv, 8; 1st Cor. xv, 28.

The above is a specimen of the castigating course we might pursue if we could descend to use the weapons of our orthodox opponents. And what is proved by such a course? Simply the truism, that there are bad members in all societies.

Such discussions are odious; yet, if provoked, we can mark more, infinitely more black sheep in the orthodox ranks, than can be found amongst professing Universalists; and that without respect to the numerical force of the two sects.

If the Editors of the Western Recorder, have no better arguments against “the Abrahamic faith” than the fag end of an obituary notice “I beg they will call to mind the homely adage—“he that lives in a glass house, should not throw stones.” S.

MARRIAGE CEREMONY.—To see two rational beings in the glow of youth and hope, which invest life with the halo of happiness, appear together, and openly acknowledging their preference for each other, voluntarily enter into a league of perpetual friendship, and call heaven and earth to witness the sincerity of their solemn vows, to think of the endearing connexion, the important consequences, the final separation, the smile that kindles to ecstasy at their union must at length be quenched in the tears of mourning ! but while life continues, they are to participate in the same joys, to endure the like sorrows, to rejoice and weep in unison. This is the most interesting spectacle that social life exhibits.

EARLY IMPRESSIONS.

There are many who seem not to appreciate the importance of keeping the minds of children free from erroneous impressions; and many who know, by painful experience, how to estimate the evil effects of such impressions, are at a loss how to proceed in removing them. The following facts are stated that the reader may know how important it is to prevent those evils.

It was the misfortune of the writer of this article to be born and reared among those, who, innocently no doubt, gave countenance to those foolish tales, and absurd sayings, which, having no foundation in truth or reason, should never be repeated in the presence of a child. The earliest associations of my mind, were concerning "Old Bloody Bones," "Blue Beard," the tragical death of Faust, hob-goblins, &c. &c. How often, while listening to these tales of the nursery, have my teeth chattered with fear ! The dread produced in my mind, by the expectation of seeing a spectre, or the "Old Nick," can only be imagined by those who have felt similar emotions. My infant mind was also faithfully impressed with "a realizing sense" of the Devil in all his various forms and shapes; and I do really believe, that had he appeared in any other garb than that of an "angel of light," I should have known him, from the description I had heard of his most potent majesty, as well as if he had been one of my playmates. With all his names and titles, I was perfectly familiar. No child ever knew his alphabet more perfectly than I understood the signification of all the names applied to him; and each different title conveyed a particular idea of some characteristic of this notable personage. Never shall I forget the words, "Old Nick," "Old Harry," "Old Cloven Foot," "Old Evil One," &c. Nor can I even describe the horrors produced in my mind when threatened with being carried off alive by "the very Old Scratcher himself !"

Other impressions, though less alarming, are but little less detrimental to the peace and prosperity of the rising generation. Who has not been told, that to see the Moon over the left shoulder, on its first appearance, is indicative of "bad luck ?" Or who is so happy as to have escaped a thousand other fooleries of a similar kind ? The evil consequences of beginning any important work, or starting a journey on Friday, are often spoken of by the ignorant and credulous; "You must not cut your nails on the Sabbath, lest you should be guilty of some crime during the week;" "if you start to go to any place and return, you will meet with some accident;" "if you sing before breakfast, you will cry before you sleep;" &c. &c. &c. are among the sayings of the wise ones of the world ! Such impressions as are likely to be made by the repetition of such idle things, are hard to be eradicated; and no good can possibly result from continuing their use. Although reason and philanthropy will convince the judgment of the falsity of all such foolish sayings; there are many, no doubt, who have cause to lament that they were ever mentioned in their hearing.

It is curious to reflect upon the ideas which have been impressed upon our minds in our younger years. For example: the devil, is at once conceived of, whenever his name is mentioned, as a great black creature, with eyes as large as a full moon, a tail of monstrous length, a large pair of horns upon his frightful head, a cloven foot, and a long pitch-fork in his hand ! Now, however strictly these ideas may conform to popular opinion, I do not believe any person ever saw such a devil; neither can I think there is any such being in creation. Yet, we associate with the word devil or satan all these absurd and irrational ideas, until the light of reason and truth dispels the darkness in which our minds are oftentimes enveloped by an erroneous education.

If clergymen, instead of striving to perpetuate these foolish things, would use every laudable means to do them away, it would, I think, be doing service to mankind. The same remarks may be applied to the popular notions of hell. Children are taught, even in this enlightened age and generation, that hell is a "lake of fire and brimstone," and that if they are not good children, they will go there ! Now, it is known, that every reasonable person rejects this absurdity; and when the terms fire and brimstone are used, to convey the idea of punishment, it is generally done under the conviction that these terms are highly figurative. But the child is incapable of distinguishing between literal and figurative expressions; and hence ought never to be frightened with the dreadful tale. Let ministers, therefore, do their duty, and the evils above hinted at, will soon be removed.

MISCELLANY.

TEMPER.

From Hints for the Improvement of Early Education.

On no part of the character has education more influence, than on the temper; the due regulation of which is an object of so great importance to the enjoyment of the present life, and to a preparation for a better.

An authority such as has been described, firm, but affectionate; decided, yet mild; imposing no unnecessary restraints; but encouraging every innocent freedom and gratification, exercised according to the dictates of judgment and supported by rewards and punishments judiciously dispensed; is the best means of securing good temper in our children and evinces that self-subjection on our part which is essential to its successful cultivation on theirs. This, at once, will put an end to those impulses of temper in ourselves which are the most fruitful sources of irritation to others; for, it is surprising, how quickly our own irritability will be reflected in the little ones around us. Speak to a child in a fretful manner, and we shall generally find that his answer partakes of the same character. We may reprove; we may punish; we may enforce obedience; but all will be done with double the effect if our own temper remain perfectly unruffled; for what benefit can reasonably be expected when we recommend that by our injunctions which we renounce by our example?

The variations and inconsistency to which characters of impulse are also liable, are particularly trying to children. There are few tempers that can resist the effect of being sharply reprov'd at one time, for what, at another is passed over without notice; of being treated one day with excessive indulgence, and the next with fretfulness or severity.

We all have our weak and irritable moments; we may experience many changes of temper and feeling; but let us beware of betraying such variations in our outward conduct, if we value the good temper and respect of our children; for these we have no right to expect on their part, without consistency on ours.

If a fault be glaring, it must be seriously taken up; but in the management of the temper, especially in early childhood much may be effected by a system of prevention. A judicious attendant may avert many an impending, naughty fit, by change of object, gentle amusement and redoubled care to put no temptation in the way, if she observe any of her little ones weary, uncomfortable or irritable. This, for instance, will generally be the case with children when they first awake. They should therefore, then be treated with more than common tenderness; never roused from sleep suddenly or violently; nor exposed to any little trials till they have had time thoroughly to recover themselves. It is scarcely necessary to add how peculiarly this tender consideration is required, not only in illness, but under the various lesser indispositions so frequent in infancy.

Children ought not to be, unnecessarily thwarted in their objects; which, at a very early age, they pursue with eagerness. Let them, if possible, complete their projects without interruption. A child, for example, before he can speak, is trotting after a ball; the nurse snatches him up at the moment, to be washed and dressed and the poor child throws himself into a violent passion. Whereas, had she first entered into his views, kindly assisted him in gaining his object, and then gently taken him up, this trial would have been spared and his temper uninjured.

We should avoid keeping children in suspense, which is often done from a kind motive, though with very ill effect. If a child ask his nurse for a cake and she can give it him let her tell him so at once and assure him that he shall have it; but should she be unable to grant his request, or know it would be improper for him, do not let her hesitate; do not let her say, "I will think of it we shall see," but kindly and decidedly refuse him.

If he sees his mother going out and petition to accompany her, it will be better she should say 'No,' or 'Yes,' at once, for he will receive with ease an immediate, but kind refusal; when, probably, he would cry bitterly at a denial, after his expectations had been raised by suspense.

When a child is to go to bed, we ought not to fret him for the last half hour, by saying every few minutes, "I shall soon send you to bed—Now, my dear, it is time to go—Now, I hope you will go"—but let him be told that, at such a time, he is to go to bed and when that time arrives, no common excuse should prevent it.

We ought also to be guarded against attaching too much importance to trifles; from this mistake, many an useless combat arises in most nurseries. How often have I observed a nurse more disturbed, and a child more alarmed and fretted, at a torn or dirty frock, than at a breach of truth, or a want of generosity!—Here the lesser good is preferred to the greater, and the primary object of education forgotten.*

By such measures as have been recommended, accompanied by a quick sympathy with the peculiar characters, and peculiar infirmities of children, much may be done towards forming among them a habit of good temper. But, such is the irritability both of mental and bodily constitution in childhood that with our best efforts, we must not expect unvarying success.

From some hidden cause, generally to be traced to their bodily state, many children, perhaps all occasionally, are prone to a certain fretfulness, or irritability, which will baffle every attempt to overcome it, and which, therefore, is rather to be borne with than opposed—never to be humoured, but to be received with unmoved serenity and patience. In such cases, there appears to be no other method of proceeding. This, indeed, calls for great patience; but, without great patience, who can perform the duties required towards children?

* It is much to be regretted that dress is thus often made the subject of dispute and irritation. Personal cleanliness is indeed indispensable; and children, whether it tease them or not, must be thoroughly washed. But their clothes should be so contrived as not to interfere with their freedom and enjoyment, or to require any great degree of attention. It is desirable to keep them as neat as the case admits of, but, to this, a nurse must take care that neither her own temper, nor their's is sacrificed.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

ACCIDENT AT TRENTON FALLS.—A melancholy occurrence took place at Trenton Falls on Friday last. A Mr. Snyder and family (from New York) consisting of a number of individuals, and among them an interesting daughter of about 17 years of age, were on a visit to the falls and the young lady, being with Mr. Lang in advance of the rest of the party, in passing a point of a rock fell into the stream and suddenly disappeared. Mr. Lang turned immediately to look for her, but all that could be discovered was her bonnet rapidly sinking in the whirlpool of waters. She did not rise to the top of the water, and any attempts to rescue her must not only have proved unsuccessful, but have exposed any one to certain destruction. Her afflicted friends, were therefore, compelled to look upon the distressing scene in mute despair, and to indulge in unavailing sorrow, without the power to put forth an effort to snatch her from an untimely grave, or without even being permitted to witness the last struggles of expiring nature—to see the "spirit wing its sudden flight to him who gave it." Death is an ordinary occurrence, but at such a time, in such a manner, his summons is truly appalling.—We look with composure upon the death bed of age; and even youth and manhood depart, in the ordinary course of providence, without shocking our sensibilities; but when one so young, so gay, so interesting, is taken from us in the ardour of her expectations, in the bloom and freshness of health, at a moment too when her eye is sparkling with pleasure, and her heart buoyant with cheerful images, and not a thought is fixed on death, it is inexpressibly painful—the hearts of friends are riven with grief, and sadness and melancholy are stamped on every brow. On Sunday morning, the body was found and brought to be interred. Her funeral was attended by the Rev. Mr. Anthon and a large number of our Citizens, who participate in the grief, with which this family has been so suddenly overwhelmed.

Jesse Strang, charged with the murder of John Whipple, has had his trial at Albany, and brought in guilty. Mrs. Whipple, charged as an accessory, has been tried and acquitted.

Fire.—On the 25th ult. the store of Mr. W. Walsworth, of Ovid, was entirely destroyed, with all its contents. The goods were insured to the amount of $2,900

The U. S. ship N. Carolina, Com. Rogers, has arrived at Norfolk, after an absence of two and a half years. Officers and crew all well.

A MISTAKE.—The "Epitaph on Calvinism," which appeared in the 26th No. was through mistake reprinted in No. 30. This unintentional repetition may, however, be turned to advantage; for we read of certain things which were "twice dead, plucked up by the roots." Perhaps this will be the case with Calvinism—which may God grant. ED.

CORRECTION.—In Mr. BADGER's letter to Mr. REESE page 234, for "you have no standing place," read, "you have no starting place." And in two instances on the same page for, "right, and first," read, "right and first."

Mr. Reese's 4th letter, in answer to Mr. Badger's letter in our 30th No. is received, and will appear in our next.

Poetical Department.

Oh! would mankind but make fair Truth their guide,
And force the helm from Prejudice and Pride,
Were once these maxims fix'd, that God's our friend,
Virtue our good, and happiness our end,
How soon must Reason o'er the world prevail,
And Error, Fraud and Superstition fail!
None would hereafter, then, with groundless fear,
Describe th' Almighty cruel and severe;
Predestinating some, without pretence,
To heaven; and some to hell, for no offence;
Inflicting endless pains for transient crimes,
And favouring sects or nations, men or times.
To please him, none would foolishly forbear,
Or food, or rest, or itch in shirts of hair;
Or deem it merit to believe, or teach,
What reason contradicts, or cannot reach;
None would fierce Zeal for Piety mistake,
Or Malice, for whatever tenet's sake;
Or think salvation to one sect confin'd,
And heaven too narrow to contain mankind.
No more would brutal rage disturb our peace,
But envy, hatred, war, and discord cease;
Our own and others' good each hour employ,
And all things smile with universal joy;
Fair virtue then, with pure religion join'd,
Would regulate and bless the human mind,
And man be what his Maker first design'd.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

LETTER NO. 4.

To Elder JOSEPH BADGER, of Mendon, Monroë, co. N. Y.

SIR: Your letter in review of mine, appeared a few days since, but absence prevented my noticing it sooner. You probably thought it would answer a good purpose abroad, but I imagine you could not have been so destitute of discernment as to have believed it would be of any service to you at home, where the matters you have attempted to show are understood in their true light. Your statements are not only at war with themselves, but I am constrained to say they are generally untrue! What could have induced you to take the unguarded course you have, I cannot even imagine; yet I am persuaded, that, if fairness could have characterized your vindication, you would have adopted it.

I have no personal enmity to you, sir—but your ministerial career, in this country, for sometime past, calls for a development. And before I get through with you, the publick shall be in possession of means by which to appreciate your worth. The task is by no means a pleasant one, but society and Christianity demand it. The remark of the worthy editor of the Advocate, to avoid personalities, is just, and to it I wish to conform. But I must take the path where I think duty guides.

1. You say, "my appointment was made by the particular request of the gentleman with whom you board, and he pledged himself that he and you would attend,—and to allay your fever and his teasing, I consented to give an appointment the 27th of May last," &c. From this statement it would appear, that the gentleman with whom I board, knew my mind in regard to the object of "his teasing;" and my "fever," which it was thought your appointment would "allay," seems to have produced a conviction in your mind, that I was anxious to meet you. It appears, too, from what you say, that Dr. K's "teasing" and my "fever" for the controversy lasted till "the 27th of May" was set apart for that purpose. But, sir, how does the above look when compared with what follows: you say "my appointment was made known in APRIL." A gentleman of respectability immediately called on you, (as he informed me,) and invited you to attend, to which you replied, with your usual egotism, "He will not give any reasons which are reasons." And the apology for the retrograde motion you had made," say you, "was, I concluded, you reflected upon your unfortunate campaign to West-Bloomfield," &c. From this statement, it is plain, that, so early as April I was convalescent, though I never heard of the time of your appointment till after April was past!! The whole, however, happens to be a mistake; for I am authorized by the gentleman with whom I board, to say that he has often invited you to call at his house to engage in friendly conversation on the subject of doctrine, but, that he never challenged you to meet me in publick debate! He farther says, that some time after the Bloomfield controversy, you informed him you intended to lecture on Universalism; to which he replied he hoped you would not be behind the curtain about it, but make your appointment at such a time as would admit the attendance of those he wished to be present. And farther, that he did not "pledge himself" that he and I would attend your appointment. I am inclined to believe these statements are correct. For, though Dr. K. knew that I would not refuse to meet you in amicable debate, yet it was not for him to dispose of my time (as I am engaged every Sabbath) without giving me previous notice, and entering into timely arrangements, which was never done. Dr. K.'s certificate of the correctness of the above statements can be had if required.

2. You say your appointment was made known in April, and communicated to me,—that "the retrograde motion" I made, was, you concluded, I reflected upon my unfortunate campaign to West-Bloomfield, a few weeks before, against the pious Mr. Millard, "which ended my career in that pleasant village."

In reply to this I observe, 1. I knew nothing of your appointment in April, nor do I think there was any particular day appointed till some time in May, especially in a publick manner. But about this I may be mistaken. 2. Though I never challenged any man to meet me in publick debate, I never refused to meet any, when invited in a becoming manner. 3. The result of the "campaign to West-Bloomfield," on my part, is published to the world, in the iv. vol. of the Gospel Advocate; of its merits I will say nothing. But during the whole course of that protracted controversy, I can appeal to God and the congregation then present, for the rectitude of my conduct. But let all the abuse be accumulated which I ever received besides, it would not amount to what I received from my opponent that day. I am sorry you mentioned this subject, sir, for I am willing to forgive and forget injuries. 4. Instead of the Bloomfield controversy being "a few weeks before" last April, when you say your "appointment was made known," it was more than five months. 5. You could not have been persuaded, that you spoke truth when you added "which ended your career in that pleasant village." For I gave an appointment on the day of the debate from the desk in presence of Mr. Millard, to be attended the next Wednesday evening, at the academy "in that pleasant village." and lectured from St. John v. 28, 29. On the 15th of October, 1726, at the same place, from Matt xii. 31, 32; and on the 25th, at the same place, from Ps. cxlv. 9, and before the controversy, I had preached there but once!! For the information of the publick, I would state, that I never preached in West-Bloomfield, except occasional lectures, our stated meetings being held four or five miles from that place.

3. You say, "But alas! if birds tell the truth, Mr. B., Mr. H., Mr. W. and Mr. R. visited you, and the result of the counsel was, it would not do to meet me." This is absolutely untrue in every part of it. But it is no more than might have been expected, seeing your authours were birds! No one individual ever visited me on the subject which you mention. But as you had taken a motto from Solomon, the wisdom in whose choice we shall see hereafter, perhaps, you thought you had a legitimate claim to what he says, Eccl. x. 20, "For a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter." It is not a little singular, sir, that you should complain of me, for taking up with what you call "mistaken rumours of the neighbourhood," and "take up," yourself, "with the mistaken rumours of the" birds!

4. You observe, "as you have published my reasons, there is not one of them correct." Your reasons, sir, as I stated them, were obtained from a gentleman of intelligence, who took notes at the time you delivered your discourse; and I have too much confidence in him to believe he would misrepresent you. He is not an Universalist, which, perhaps with you, will render his judgment less exceptionable. Two others, Universalists, gave me your reasons, in substance, as he did; viz.—"1. Unreasonable; 2. Unscriptural; and 3. Productive of no good." The former gentleman made use of the terms "contrary" and "repugnant" to express the same thing. You say "the word sound reason" is not found in your reasons. This, however, is a wise play upon words. For I presume you would be unwilling to allow that your "reasons" were not "sound." Your third reason, "productive of no good," or, as I have inserted it, "productive of no religious revivals," &c. came to me by two different individuals, but I can see no difference in their meaning. For a system professedly religious, which produces no respect for, and practice of religion, is not worthy of patronage, and is unreasonable, and unscriptural. I hope you will insert your reasons in your next letter, should you write again, as you gave them, with arguments to substantiate them. that the publick may be undeceived, if Universalism be not true.

5. You say I may give myself no more trouble to inquire of your neighbours whether you will answer my letters, &c. You might have saved yourself the unpleasantness of being told, sir, that I never took any pains to inquire of your neighbours whether you would answer my letters. It is true, I was willing to hear what you might have to say on the subject, and in conversation with a gentleman in this village, not in your neighbourhood, I think I asked him whether he thought you would reply to which, if I mistake not, he answered he thought you would to which I rejoined I hoped you would. Besides this instance, I know not of another.

You offer to meet me in any manner I please before the publick in defence of your reasons. I have thought proper to accept, and meet you in the manner I have commenced in the Advocate, should it meet the approbation of the editor. I consent to it on no other condition than, that the subject be conducted in a proper manner, worthy the cause of the Redeemer.—And in the commencement, I hope you will not only state your reasons and arguments against Universalism, but also, your sentiments. When you give your reasons, I will try to find the difference between them and those I have inserted on the authority of those who heard you.

Yours, &c.

W. I. REESE.

West Mendon, August 3. 1827.

P. S. The letter of Mr. Abbot, accompanying this communication, will show the publick the fitness of your "motto," and your unfairness in denying your premises. W. R.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MR. EDITOR,

Sir, As the controversy between Messrs. Reese and Badger, has brought my name in question, in a manner not quite congenial to my feelings—and as Mr. Reese is charged with having mis-stated Mr. Badger's reasons why he was not an Universalist, I think it a debt of justice due the publick, Mr. Reese and myself, just to state facts in this matter, and clear myself at least of the charge of misrepresentation.

The day Mr. Badger gave his three reasons why he was not an Universalist, I was his hearer for the first time; and having previously heard much of his genius and talents, I was an attentive observer of his reasoning. The reasons he gave, I thought, and still think, were valid, and such as no one can combat with any good prospect of success. I hope, therefore, that I shall not be charged with having misstated Mr. Badger, for the purpose of giving Mr. Reese the advantage. And as Mr. Reese well knew that I was not a believer in the doctrine of Universal Salvation, he asked me to give him an explanation of Mr. Badger's reasons, which I did, as I took them down in short hand at the time they were delivered from the desk. I cannot now be positive as to the exact words, or their arrangement, by which Mr. Badger expressed himself, as I have lost my notes; I think, however, Mr. Reese has them correct; but of the ideas embraced in his three reasons I am certain, and are as follows:

1. The doctrine of Universal Salvation is unreasonable.

2. It is unscriptural.

3. It is productive of no revivals of religion, or good moral effects.

As these were Mr. Badger's reasons, and, as I think, good ones too, I hope the gentleman will no more cavil about the premises, but come to the subject.

Respectfully yours,

F. ABBOT.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

The following Citation of Julina Stone, will sufficiently explain the ground work of a controversy now existing in the First Congregational Society in Royalton, Niagara county, New York, with the person above named. I purpose at this time to state no farther than that the above person had sufficient reason to absent herself as is there stated. In succeeding numbers, I shall esteem it a privilege to drop some friendly hints, addressed to George Colton, (the principal actor in the following proceedings.) I as have pledged myself to him and to said society, that I would attend to them in future for their unhallowed encroachments upon my peaceful little family. My motto has ever been, "render unto all their dues." I humbly desire that the friends of Religious freedom, and of the free tribute of the mind to God, would consider this case, and give their minds free exercise upon this subject.

NATHAN H. STONE.

Royalton, July 23, 1827.

CITATION OF JULINA STONE.

At a church meeting held at the meeting-house of the First Congregational Society in Royalton, April 9th, 1827,—voted unanimously, that Sister Julina Stone be cited to appear before this church, at a church meeting to be holden on Thursday the 19th of the present month, at the place aforesaid, there to answer for sundry crimes alledged against her. And hereby, you, Julina Stone, are cited to attend said church meeting, at said time and place, to answer the following charges which have been alledged against you, and for which, after a long and painful Gospel labour, you have not yet given satisfaction; viz.

1st Charge or crime. For neglecting almost entirely to meet with our congregation, on Sabbath days, during the term of about three years, though meanwhile you frequently meet with other congregations.

2d. For neglecting to attend our Religious Conferences, Common Lectures, and Prayer Meetings, while you attend similar meetings of other denominations.

3d. For an habitual and almost entire neglect of attendance on our regular periodical church meetings, and preparatory or sacramental Lectures.

4th. For entirely neglecting to commune with your own brethren and sisters in Church Covenant and fellowship at the Lord's Table, and that for about three years, thereby violating, in a publick and flagrant manner, your own promises to this Church, and your own most solemn covenant vows and obligations to the same, and thus violating your Christian profession and openly dishonouring the cause of Christ.

5th. By generally absenting yourself from our assemblies, in the way and manner aforesaid, and also by sometimes refusing to appear before us, at the call of the Church, for treating the Church with neglect and contempt; and likewise, by extolling, frequently assembling and being intimate with, a certain denomination among us, some of whose doctrines are deemed by our Church as heretical and dangerous; for denying and hating, virtually or implicitly, our Confession of Faith and Covenant, which in our opinion embrace doctrines and duties that are agreeable to holy scripture.

GEORGE COLTON,

Pastor and Moderator.

Mrs. JULINA STONE.

Royalton, April 12, 1827.

The above Citation was received at a very late hour, to which Mrs. Stone devoted as much time as was consistent with the concerns of her family, in penning the following answer which was forwarded to the assembly by my own hand; and by Mrs. Stone's request, and by leave of the Moderator, was read by myself. It may not be improper here to remark, that this George Colton, at the commencement of the meeting, used every art of which he was master to prevent my remaining in the house; but the members being aware what would be the result of such a proceeding, did not give him one assenting voice. Our members then were but about twenty-four, counting the Moderator six, (for he did the principal part of the business,) however, before the close of the meeting, I was twice by him requested to speak, which invitation I accepted. Doubtless, if the separating vote had passed, their assembly would have been much lessened by the withdrawal of others beside the person who was the cause of their assembling.

After the charges were read, and the CRIMES alleged, Mr. Moderator produced his "Confession of Faith and Covenant" for proof, (to which Mrs. Stone objected, preferring to be judged by the scriptures of truth, which were not produced,) contending at the same time that this covenant must be the rule.

NATHAN H. STONE.

Royalton, April 19, 1827

GEORGE COLTON:

Sir—Having received a line under your signature, dated Royalton, April 12, 1827, citing me to appear before the First Congregational Society in said town, at their meeting house, on the 19th day of the present month, then and there to answer for sundry crimes alleged against me by said society, and by you said to be proved: This, therefore, is to inform you and said society, that for the term of about two years and eight months, (being the time at which I requested a dismission from your church record, in consequence of some grievances on my part, of which the church would not take the least cognizance,) I have considered myself as exempt from said society, as being in any shape under the watch, care or controul of the same, in a church capacity; and I hereby declare myself to you and said society, exempt as above. This declaration would have appeared at an earlier date, had not the long silence on your part led me to conclude the unhappy affair had ended.

The above declaration, under the circumstances of my particular case, I feel in duty bound to make; in confirmation of which, among many scriptures to the point, I would refer you to Romans, 14th chap. 12th verse to the end of the chapter; Acts, 4th chap. 19th and 20th verses.

For some years past I have been led "to search the scriptures," particularly upon the point of Religious Liberty, and the free tribute of the mind to God. While obedient to man in civil commands, religion yields submission alone to the King of kings. And, as expressed in the language of Peter and John, she summons every rational creature under heaven, to make this reasonable appeal in a cause, which stands alone betwixt the creature and the creator; whether they should obey God rather than man, judge ye.

As it relates to your charges or "CRIMES," which you allege against me, and state as "proved," to the three first, I answer that I live under a free government where it is the unalienable right of every person to enjoy freedom of conscience in matters of religion. And it is a new idea, that I cannot, as well as others, use this privilege without being chargeable with committing publick and flagrant CRIMES!

Your 4th charge relative to my absenting from your church communion, you must be well apprized why these things are so, from certain grievances which I have heretofore related to the church.

As it respects those covenant vows which you mention, that were made with my brethren and sisters in a church capacity; I solemnly declare, that I never did, neither do I at the present time, consider them binding any farther than to shew forth my determination to live the life, and die the death of a christian; to walk with my brethren while we could proceed in christian union, striving together to increase with the light, and grow in grace and the knowledge of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. My covenant with God, I trust, is sure; and humbly I pray, that not one link in that chain may ever be broken.

Your 5th charge, as it respects my treating the church with neglect, in not being obedient to its call when cited by you, in person; you cannot but recollect, that I declined at the time, in consequence of your rejecting Mr. Stone from attending.

As to extolling, assembling, and being intimate with, a "certain denomination among us, some of whose doctrines are deemed by your church as heretical," I answer, that I wish to speak in praise of all those in whom I can discover the image of Christ, of whatever denomination of Christians.

ANNA J. STONE.

George Colton.

REMARKS.

It is not a little strange that the pious and very humble preachers of orthodoxy, should assume the prerogative of dealing out their popish censures and anathemas upon those who happen to be obnoxious to their displeasure! But it is far more strange that an enlightened community should suffer them to commit their abominations, by refraining from an exposure of their conduct to its merited contempt. What! are not our laws (doubtless the best under heaven) sufficient, without the aid of a bigotted priesthood? Are not our courts of judicature qualified to determine the guilt or innocence of our citizens? Or has it come to that, that a petty ecclesiastical tribunal,—a little body of weak, superstitious, and ignorant professing christians,—with a little parson at their head, must drag before them a respectable female and accuse her of a "crime?"

We happen to be somewhat acquainted with the respectable individual who has been censured by the Reverend Mr. Colton, and it is well for him that he has selected, as a subject of abuse, a family eminent for christian forbearance and charity. But what is the crime of which Mrs. Stone stands accused? Hear it. She did not attend their conferences, nor their sacramental lectures, nor their citations, nor their communions!! And perhaps, too, the canting whine of a hypocrite did not feed her soul, and she did not like to hear the Parson! And so, she must be arraigned, and accused, and tried, and condemned—for what? For exercising the freedom guaranteed by our country and given us by the Almighty! More anon. Ed

A PREDICTION FULFILLED.

A year ago last winter, the village of Buffalo was visited by one of those calamitous excitements known by the appellation of a "revival." Men, women and children paraded the streets at all hours of the day and night—yes, and in all kinds of weather, to attend prayer meetings, anxious meetings, and whispering meetings. It was proclaimed time after time from the desk, and in the convocations of the faithful, that God was in Buffalo, directing the "special influences of the spirit" in the work of regeneration; and that many poor, immortal souls, were saved from an endless hell, by means of the "revival." The writer of this article was then a calm observer of the excitement, and raised his feeble arm against it. The consequence, as was expected, was at the time prejudicial. He was denounced as an heretick of the worst kind—a very emissary of the "Evil One." Then we predicted that time would develop the facts stated in the Advocate, and that one year would convince the publick, that the "revival" was neither more nor less than an "animal excitement," got up for the benefit of a particular sect, at the expense of pure and undefiled religion. We have waited until this time to be satisfied of the truth of our prediction; and now we see its fulfilment.

During the excitement, every kind of publick amusement was denounced as at variance with religion; and a smile upon the countenance of one of the subjects of the revival, would have been regarded as a phenomenon. Society in this place was clothed with sackcloth, and the friends of sociability were considered the enemies of God and men. Religion—religion was the order of the day; and from appearances, many concluded that the millenium was at hand! The assembly room was abandoned—the Theatre was discarded, and the social party was shunned as the gate of death! "Have you got religion?"—was the great and leading inquiry; and an answer in the affirmative was considered as a token of "election to eternal glory!" Ah! kind reader,—if you ever witnessed such a time, your mind can conceive of what we would express, but words fail to convey an adequate idea.—How is it now?

For a few days past a Circus has attracted the attention of many of our good citizens; and a crowd of "all kinds"—of "all descriptions," (as the notable Crier would say,) has witnessed their performances! Now, the reader may desire to be informed whether we mean to insinuate that any of the "revival people" have visited those performances:—no; we do not intend to insinuate any such thing; but we mean to assert, plainly, and unequivocally, that many of those who were most active in "getting up" and "keeping up" the aforesaid "animal excitement," have attended the Circus with their families!! O, Jesus of Nazareth, where are thy consistent followers! Are such thy humble disciples? Is thy religion so easily conformed to the lawless desires of mankind? And O, God of Love; by what token are we to distinguish thine Elect and Chosen ones from the reprobated part of thine intellectual creation, within the walls of a Circus?

It may be proper to state, in this place, that the Monday previous to the time when so many of the pious people visited the Circus, was the "Monthly Concert of Prayer" in all the Presbyterian Churches throughout the Union; and that our exemplary brethren of that faith were punctual in observing that season. The inconsistency of their professions and their practice, is too glaring to need comment. Our object in noticing the circumstances above detailed, is, not to injure those persons, but, to hold up before them a mirror, that they may behold their true condition, and to caution our readers against being hereafter duped by their pretensions. True, we gain a victory over them,—but our triumph is accompanied with unspeakable regret that any of our fellow beings should thus dishonour the Christian profession! Our young friends in Buffalo, will notice the facts above stated; and may they learn therefrom the truth which we have repeatedly sounded in their ears. The mighty—yea the mighty Babylon, is fallen—is fallen! The glory of the "revival" hath departed!

Now, how strange it is, that intelligent beings can be so blind to the best interests of society, as to encourage such fanatical proceedings as have taken place, and call them the work of God. Mankind will yet be convinced that religion is one thing, and revivals quite another. The Circus, in itself considered, is a place of resort where nothing good can be learned; but the evil of which we speak is of another character. It consists in the hypocritical cant, and the absurd pretensions of a portion of mankind, who at one time wear the appearance of being over much religious, and at another will run to behold a miserable pantomime.

MISCELLANY.

The following from the Black Rock Gazette of 11th inst. contains a very correct description of the celebrated individual to whom it refers. Although Mr. Dow is truly an eccentric person, yet, with all his oddities, we find much in his character and talents to admire; and were other celebrated "divines," to copy his humility and self-denial, it would, we think, be for the benefit of the world. ED.

Lorenzo Dow, commonly called "Crazy Dow," is again passing along the borders of these parts, and is, in dispensing the Word, rarely found "out of season or sorts." Time was, when Mr. Dow, in the vigour of manhood, preached upon the stumps in the fields or under the spreading foliage of the wood—when he lifted up his voice before thousands—when his bursts of native eloquence, "echoed from hill to hill and made the welkin ring again." His sudden transitions in his discourses from the mildest persuasion to threatening denunciations—from simple relation of facts to the loftiest flights of fancy—were oftentimes ludicrous if not ridiculous. His personalities, in pointing out sects, and even individuals, and lashing them as the wind lashes the placid bosom of the lake, was strikingly unjust and inappropriate. Drawing heavily upon his funds of incident and of anecdote, when his logic came lazily in, he never was at all at a loss for matter. Dispensing with written discourses or notes; disdaining subtle distinctions in ethicks, or arbitrary divisions and subdivisions of sermons—still his discourses were long. His fancy could create with both facility and felicity. He had the power, notwithstanding his eccentricities, of completely engrossing the attention of immense auditories; and no doubt he forcibly impressed, by his odd manner, many a genius queer as himself, with a respect for the things of religion. Always punctual in his appointments he never lacked hearers—devoid of hypocrisy, his opinions were generally respected—destitute of selfish motives, he never solicited, and rarely accepted contributions in money; but, if he did accept the cash, he often put it into the hand of the first sufferer he met. Such was Lorenzo Dow, some 20 years ago.

At this time, Mr. Dow appears to be rising 60 years of age, of pallid features, long hair and beard; there is a melancholy expression of countenance; a dimness in his eye; his discourse, however, kindled it up, to a fine lustre.

There is a studied negligence in his dress: his three principal garments being composed of different stuffs and colours. He preached on Tuesday last, at the Methodist Chapel. His discourse, with a few exceptions, was sound and logical. He used in his oratorical gestures the clenched fist a little too profusely, and applied the palms of his hands to each other, with too much earnestness, to appear entirely graceful. He asked (and answered his own) questions, where inquiries of a less direct form would have been more pleasing. But upon the whole his discourse was a good one.* He reprobated the crying sin of visiting the circus and the theatre, for the purpose of "killing time." He gave the gamblers a gentle touch; but he said he did not suppose that they "played for much." He nicely distinguished the difference between "evil thoughts," and "thoughts of evil!" He stated that in experimental religion, the United States were far before other countries. The religion of other countries being in the principal part, traditional. He gave a hint about "yankee tricks," considering those operations tantamount to cheating; and the manner of balancing the iniquity of it, by the merit gained by giving a threadbare coat to a beggarman, he pointedly condemned.

He further stated that he had preached in an itinerating manner for above 30 years.

* An old mechanick of the joiner's trade, remarked, when Mr. Dow had concluded, that "amongst all that lumber, there was a good deal of good stuff!"

FROM THE OLIVE BRANCH.

HELL!

One fact has recently come to our knowledge, which has in some measure given rise to our present remarks, and is only one of a thousand of a similar kind, perhaps more appalling in their nature, and more fatal in their effects. A young gentleman from the country, was one day last week enticed into a gambling house, or as our European friends have very properly denominated similar places of resort, a HELL,—and there in a short period eased of $300, perhaps not absolutely his own.—This occurrence was attended with distressing circumstances..... which probably may be detailed in a future number. The house of depredation is situated in Ann-st. The freebooters had the cruelty to deny the victim a sum sufficient to defray his expenses home.—Had the young man committed a robbery—or in a fit of despair put a sudden end to his existence—whose heads would have been visited with just and terrible retribution? of the gambling house we will conclude in the language of holy writ, "Go not near it, pass not by it, turn from it and pass away."—N. Y. Spu.

Extract from a Sermon on Psalm ix. 17.

"Give the answer, Is the bell here spoken of in this world or the world to come? It may be said, perhaps, 'It is in the world to come, and the conduct here alluded to is the way to it.' Then look on a little further, and you will find you are mistaken. Prov ix, 13—18. 'A foolish woman is clamorous; she is simple, and knoweth nothing. For she sitteth at the door of her house, on a seat in the high places of the city to call passengers who go right on their ways: Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither; and as for him that wanteth understanding, she saith stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant. But he knoweth not the DEAD are there; and that her guests are IN THE DEPTHS OF HELL!!!' Here we have a striking picture of hell in all its most awful and horrid deformity. We not only have the description of a house which leads to hell; but those who become guests are in the very DEPTHS of hell already. Let it no longer be said, then that Universalists preach that there is no hell. You have only to look around you, and you will find it nigh home; if not at your very doors, at least within the limits of your beloved city. And what is more, this is no visionary, no imaginary hell; but is what may be known by any one to be an awful reality."

Messrs. Editors—The foregoing circumstances applied so strongly to the above extract from the Rev. A. Kneeland's sermon, lately published, that I could not refrain from offering it to the Olive Branch for re-publication.

INFLUENCE OF RELIGION.

If we do not greatly misunderstand both the letter and the spirit of the christian religion, its design is to make men better; and wherever it does exert its own salutary influence on the hearts and lives of its professors, we shall find them to be more honest, more faithful, more benevolent and more charitable members of society. We do want to see these fruits follow every profession of religion—if they do not, we cannot, in our souls, believe that those who are destitute of them—we care not to what church they belong or how loud they are in their pretensions—are entitled to the appellation, religious. There is, if we mistake not, something that passes in the world under the venerable name of religion, which, though it induces its possessors to put on the external appearance of sanctity—to attend religious meetings, perhaps every day or night in the week—to contend earnestly for the creed of the church to which they may happen to belong, and to be zealous in support of the sectarian cause in which they may be engaged—instead of making them better, in the true and genuine sense of the word, renders them intolerant, morose, unkind, if not abusive to such as, in conscience, cannot subscribe to every iota of their faith. "We speak that which we do know, and testify of that which we have seen;" that which we know from personal experience, and see daily before our eyes. Bigotted and persecuting dispositions too generally, we fear—if we may "know men by their fruits"—fill a large space in the hearts and actions of those who make the loudest professions of knowing most of the doctrines of the gospel, and of enjoying the greatest measure of the spirit of Christ. Now we hold, that those who profess to be the best christians, we have a right to expect will consequently be the best men; and the best men will always readily be discovered by society—without the trouble of their undertaking to tell others that they are so—as the most useful citizens the most accommodating and amiable neighbours, and as the best and most active friends to the poor and unfortunate. If you wish to discover the evidence of a person's religion, look to his life; see what that testifies concerning him, and make up your opinion accordingly.

BENEVOLENCE.

Happy is the man who is free from envy, who wishes and rejoices in the prosperity of his neighbour, being contented with his own condition, and delighted at the good fortune of those around him, his sympathetic heart beats in unison with the sufferer, and from his little store bestows a generous mite to the children of poverty. Enjoyment attends him through the various walks of life, and misfortune rests lightly on his head; the morsel which he eats is sweet and nourishing; the water he drinks is cool and refreshing, and the straw which supports his weary limbs soothes him into soft forgetfulness. When he visits his neighbour in trouble, such benignity appears in his countenance, that the eye of sorrow wears a smile, and the distressed breast ceases to heave a sigh. Like a minister of peace he is received among them, and his very words prove the oil of consolation. Surely he, above the rest of his fellow mortals, partakes of heaven here below, and a bliss which none but the good and virtuous, can ever claim.

[Rel. Ing.]

A young clergyman, whose garb did not designate who he was, and still very anxious to be known, requested the company to guess at his occupation. They happened to be all on the wrong side. Vexed at their stupidity, he exclaimed, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. I thought Sir, says a wag, that you resembled an Owl.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

LATEST FROM BATAVIA.—Capt. Swift of ship Jasper, arrived at Boston from Batavia, 25th April, informs that the war still continued at Java. There were about 3000 European troops on the island, and about as many native troops in the Dutch service. More troops were daily expected from Holland. The Dutch man of war Atalanta, passed Anjier, for Batavia 23d April. A battle had been fought in the interior on April 15; and the Dutch troops under Baren Vexela, had destroyed fifty villages. Coffee at Batavia, scarce, 22c.

HARRISBURG CONVENTION.—A few days will probably put us in possession of the official report of the proceedings of the Harrisburg Convention. The U. S. Gazette contains the memorial to congress, as adopted by the convention, and signed by the delegates respectively. It is a brief, terse document, soliciting, in respectful and proper terms, the early and effectual interposition of congress. The rates of duties, which it suggests to the consideration of congress, are such, we should think, as the interests of the country, and a reasonable protection of our domestic industry, require. We are particularly pleased that the wool-growing interest has been well looked to in the suggested duty upon that article.

We learn from several of the delegates with whom we have held conversations since their return, that the politics of the day were excluded, in every shape, from the deliberations of this body. Those who intended, at an earlier period, to make the convention subservient to presidential views, and were particularly clamorous upon the subject (after a life-time of hostility to it) because they believed that such views would be promoted by it, have doubtless been disappointed. The result has shown, that such men were generally excluded from the delegations, and that the respectable gentlemen who assembled on this occasion, pursued, with singleness, the legitimate objects of such a convocation. It is obvious enough, that the manufacturers and agriculturalists have discovered that sudden professions in their behalf, after years of unvarying opposition, cannot be relied upon longer than the particular design which prompts them is operative. They have chosen, therefore to take their own affairs into their own hands; or to prevent them from being endangered by political or extraneous associations; and the result is auspicious to their interests.—Albany Argus.

Theological Seminary at Andover.—Mr. Phillips has lately bequeathed to the Theological Seminary at Andover, and to Phillips' Academy connected with it, 25,000 dollars.—We learn from the Christian Intelligencer, that the interest on the capital owned by this Theological Seminary previous to the above donation, amounted to nearly 20,000 dollars per annum.

The New-England churches and the Presbyterians having lately united together in the business of preparing young men for the ministry; they will soon be able to furnish a good supply of Lyman Beecher's "competently educated teachers," to the inhabitants of this country. Whether they will be able to supplant or supersede all other religious teachers, and produce one "homogeneous influence," throughout our land, time must determine.

The King of Sardinia has issued an ordinance, by virtue of which his Catholick Piedmontese subjects who die without having received the sacrament, shall not be buried except in the night, and in unconsecrated ground. By the same ordinance, the burial of every Piedmontese Protestant shall take place without any publick ceremony, and no more than twelve individuals of the same religion shall attend it. U. S. Gazette.

SUMMER.

Arise! with early dawn arise,
And welcome Summer to your door,
The cheerful Earth, the smiling skies,
Promise abundance to your store.

Look at the fruitful fields, that wave
Their various products in the breeze,
And bless the parent hand that gave,
All these to our necessities.

Or climb the hill, or walk the vale,
Or seek the forests' thickest shade,
And every vigorous sense regale,
Before the Summer beauties fade.

The sultry hours shall soon be past,
And sober Autumn flit away,
And dreary Winter's bitter blast,
Strips Nature of her green array.

Yet Man must labour to procure
His daily bread, and humbly wait
For providence, all wise, t' ensure
A blessing on his low estate.

A heart with grateful feelings blest,
And humble hope, and calm content,
To these with thankfulness possess
Heaven has peculiar blessings sent.

But hope to higher bliss aspires,
And higher bliss shall sure attain;
And live, and join th' immortal choirs,
Where everlasting summers reign.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATION.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MR. EDITOR,

You and your readers will agree with me, I apprehend, that there is nothing more commendable in the Christian profession, than to "be ready always, to give an answer to every one, who asks for the reason of the hope we have, with meekness and reverence," and to state clearly and explicitly our Christian belief. But it is a truth, much to be deplored, that professors of almost every denomination are deficient in this very important qualification, which may be attributed to different causes. 1. With many, overheated zeal, or reprehensible enthusiasm being considered the summit of Christian perfection, they attach themselves to a party without knowing or ever inquiring to know, the sentiments of their sect.—2. Many unite with popular churches, apparently to satisfy the demands of selfishness, "having men's persons in admiration because of advantage," who neither know nor care to know the faith of their party. And I may add, 3, what is equally certain, that many creeds are involved in such intricacy, and others not fairly stated in any form, that it is next to impossible for those who desire a knowledge of what they profess, to obtain it.

Until quite lately, it would have been deemed the rankest of herodoxy in the Calvinistick churches, to have allowed that Jesus, "by the grace of God tasted death for every man."—Yet this sentiment is now pretty generally taught by those whose creeds are strictly otherwise. If their tenets be changed from what they were, it would be an expression of Christian candour to alter their creed accordingly. For it must be perceived by all, that, members uniting with those churches, either give their assent to the creed as it stands, are deceived by hearing only the less offensive parts, or an unauthorised accommodation is made to their particular views. The latter is sometimes practised—I have known an instance. Those whose faith harmonizes with the decree of "eternal reprobation," must naturally be confounded to hear their clergy preach, that "Salvation is freely offered to all." But this, perhaps, in a majority of instances, is done. Others, more mild in their sentiments, though members of the same church, feel an equal astonishment, mingled with grief, to hear the horrid doctrine named. And a mutual wish to maintain a kind of infallibility, and save a cause doomed to perpetual fluctuations and final ruin, renders them unable "to give an answer" to any one "who asks a REASON" for their hope or belief.

Among the Armenian churches we find the same disagreement. At one time we hear them say that salvation is purely of grace, and at another, that it is partly (if not wholly) of works! Once it was their belief "that God, from all eternity, DETERMINED to bestow salvation on those whom he FORESAW would persevere unto the end," &c.—See Buck's Theo. Dict. art. Arminians. But as this differs nothing from Calvinism, we hear but little of it preached in the present day. At one time we are told that we are free agents, and, that God has left us at perfect liberty, to do, or not to do; and at another, we hear of the most imperative commands and restrictions being laid upon us, accompanied with the most awful threatnings to the disobedient!!

Dr. A. Clarke, on Acts, iii. 21, after describing the nature of the "restitution" there spoken of, says, "and when such a work becomes universal, as the scriptures seem to intimate that it will, then will all things be restored in the FULLEST SENSE of the term." But he contradicts this in more than fifty places. Indeed he contradicts it in his remarks upon the next verse!! After a careful examination of the several theories of the day, I am convinced that contradiction and obscurity are oftener to be met with than consistency. Can this arise from a defect in the gospel system? We should all be unwilling to say so. It is to be hoped, that Christians will give the subject a serious consideration whether they are not, perhaps unintentionally, strengthening the arm of infidelity and unnerving the cause of Jesus!

But the object I chiefly had in view in writing this article, I have not yet noticed. I desire not to appear captious, but I am willing to be thought solicitous to know the reason and fitness of things; and these are what we should all be willing to give and receive. We have now amongst us an order of professors denominating themselves Christians, whose sentiments I have carefully inquired to know, by all the means I could command; and, although from time to time I have thought myself in possession of them, ignis-fatuus-like, they elude detection and mock investigation.

Not many weeks since, in conversation with a preacher of the above order, I learned, if I understood him correctly, that every principle in man is mortal before regeneration, but when converted, the principle of immortality enters into him, which is to survive the dissolution of the body, and distinguish, or rather constitute, his identity, in the world of spirits! From which they doubtless infer, from their views of the resurrection, that all who are not in this life, regenerated, will lie in total unconsciousness till some unknown period to come, when the wicked will be raised in their "own likeness," (therefore, never possess immortality, because they are never to be regenerated, for if they were they would be happy,) and the righteous, "in the likeness of him who created them." This same man told me in the same conversation, that, though some of their preachers had believed in the annihilation of the wicked, now, there was quite a uniformity of sentiment among them—that they believed in endless misery, and the chief, if not the only difference, between them and the Methodists, was, in regard to the trinity!! But will the Methodists bear with this compliment? There is too much good sense among some of them to contend for endless punishment where there is no principle adequate to its duration. Let it be kept in mind, that the wicked are never to experience regeneration, without which, they must forever remain mortal,—hence, that which is defined subjection to death, is to exist to eternity!! But as suffering, in any case whatever, implies, and is inevitably attended with waste, decay or diminution, it is impossible, that any thing should suffer eternally, but must come to an end!

A short time after the above conversation, I heard one of the same order preach at the funeral of a child, from 2d Sam. xii. 22, 23. He said many good things I confess; and what I would here notice, is not at all repugnant to my belief, but with that which is said to be his own. He encouraged the parents to believe, that the spirit of their little son was in blissful consciousness employed in the praise of its Maker. This was all well. But can it be said, with any semblance of propriety, that little children are regenerated, or have any faith in the gospel of our salvation? If not, according to the above theory, they can have no conscious existence hereafter, (because destitute of a surviving principle,) till the resurrection of their bodies!! This sentiment must be heart-rending to parents; but the worst is not told. Is there any more proof, that little children, at some future day, will be possessed of immortality, than that the wicked will? There certainly is not! On this hypothesis, then, there is no evidence for parents to believe that their children, dying in infancy, will ever experience a resurrection, except it be to a state of wretchedness!!! But here is a balm, ☞ "Their angels do always behold the face of their Father who is in heaven!"—Matt. xviii. 10.

Though it may, in truth, be said, that the sentiments of no denomination professing the Christian name, are perfect in every particular, yet I think we should be entirely willing to let them be known, in order, that every mistake, if possible, may be corrected with becoming meekness and forbearance. It is desired, therefore, that all Christians who may read these remarks, would be so candid as to let their sentiments be fairly made known, that the publick may be undeceived, and Christianity be unburthened of a load under which, with few exceptions, it has groaned for centuries. R.

ADVOCATE AND INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

The following discourse was hastily prepared, and delivered by the Editor to the Society at Buffalo, on the first Sabbath of Aug. inst. on his taking leave of his brethren at that place. It is published by the request of many who heard it, and not because its merits entitle it to the approbation with which it was received, or the generous partiality which induced the request. Should its appearance in the Advocate serve in any measure to keep alive those friendly emotions which have heretofore existed, it will amply repay the author for the sacrifice he makes in submitting it to the publick.

A SERMON.

2. Cor. xiii. 11. "Finally, brethren, farewell."

The time has at length arrived when in the course of providence I am called upon to bid adieu to you, my brethren and friends, and for a season, at least, to relinquish the enjoyments of your society. The task, I confess, is painful indeed; and what renders it peculiarly so, is the consideration, that the tribute of your regret at the separation but augments my unhappiness.

Of what avail are all our resolutions to be indifferent to the endearments of society? Where is the propriety of endeavouring to stifle the emotions of friendship? Without these ennobling principles of our nature, creation would be a blank, and existence a burthen. Yet, when providence decrees, we must submit; and he, who yields with composure, obtains almost a victory over himself.

About four years and six months have elapsed, since I first came to this place. At that time, there appeared but little in the moral condition of the people, to afford encouragement to an inexperienced and unpractised preacher of a reasonable, but (in the estimation of many) an heretical doctrine. At the first sound of salvation from the walls of Zion, Bigotry frowned, Intolerance groaned, and Superstition was afraid.—The hue and cry was raised, and our peace-giving doctrine was denounced, as an erroneous, an absurd, a licentious, a damnable delusion. The edict went forth, and hundreds, in consequence of their fears, have never, from that day to this, entered within our walls or dared to investigate our sentiments. Alas! they have often desired to know something about it—they have sometimes expressed such desires; but they could not, with safety to their eternal interests, examine the matter, and so they have conscientiously abstained from their inquiries and let us alone.

But, the dread produced by those denunciations, was not, of itself, sufficient to prevent all from investigating the subject. Other means were, therefore, resorted to, by our opponents, with similar success. The horrors of another world were put in requisition, and it was surprising to witness the effect. Many concluded that our doctrine might, but it might not be true, and therefore it would be best, all things considered, to be on the safe side of the question by believing in eternal torments, so that peradventure, God would like them the better for it.

But all this did not answer the purpose of our clerical opponents. The cry of unpopularity was raised against us, and like Amasa of old, our cause was smitten that it died!

I leave it for the curious to determine what proportion of our opponents have taken pains to become acquainted with the grounds on which we predicate our arguments in support of the sentiment we profess; nevertheless, I venture to say, could the truth be known, not one in ten amongst the most violent of our enemies, can explain the distinguishing tenets of our order. So true it is, that mankind are sometimes induced to believe what they cannot comprehend, and oppose that which they will not investigate.

But, amidst the persecutions of our opponents, we have steadily increased in strength. From the commencement, there have been a few faithful and devoted friends to the doctrine of impartial grace; and numbers have been added from time to time, until now, considering the infancy of our little Zion, we are numerically, and mentally, entitled to "a name to live."

The effect which the promulgation of our sentiments has had upon this community, is not by any means confined to our professors. Society at large has felt the influence of our labours. By comparing what was, with what is, we are enabled to form an opinion of the astonishing change which has taken place. Four years ago, our sentiments and characters were reviled from the desks of our opponents, in an open and fearless manner; but now, the opposition is carried on in a cautious, silent, and prudent way; which, while it defies detection, and escapes exposure, promises better things than have ever resulted from open hostility.

Among those who have been prevented from partaking of the benefits of our doctrine, are many who conscientiously reject it from the full conviction that it is incorrect. I doubt not there are many—very many—who suppose it anti-scriptural and unreasonable.—

Such are, with few exceptions, ornaments to the Christian profession, and are therefore entitled to our respect. They would embrace our opinions, and cherish an affectionate regard for our persons, if they could consistently with the light received and the view they have taken of the important subject; but as it is, they cannot.

There are others in the ranks of our opponents, who probably oppose and discountenance our cause, not because they have found in the doctrine any thing obnoxious to their displeasure, but because they have been told that it embraces those principles which are honestly opposed by others. Such condemn us because others do, and reject our sentiments because others have done the same. Those persons are more to be pitied for their imbecility than dispised for any malignity of heart. If others, to whom they look for examples, were disposed to be our friends, such would soon become attached to our cause.

Others who have kept aloof from us have been influenced by various motives. Some through fear of becoming unpopular; some through a disposition to regard religion of any kind with indifference; and others from motives of open hostility to the equalizing principles of the gospel. Charity, however, inclines us to believe, that most of our enemies have acted up to the dictates of their consciences, and have opposed the doctrine of unlimited benevolence from motives of kindness; and out of a Christian regard for the best interests of their fellow beings.

With such views of the subject, I cannot refrain from expressing on this occasion the friendship I feel for those with whom I have become acquainted in this place.

There is nothing, either in the religion we profess, nor in the heart of your speaker, to prevent me, on this occasion, from tendering forgiveness to the bitterest of our enemies. If we have been reviled, we will not revile again; if we have been persecuted, we will leave a parting blessing for our persecutors; if we have been despitely used, we will pray for our enemies.

In closing my ministerial duties among you, I do most solemnly assure you, that I cherish no hostile feelings towards any person on earth. However much I may deplore the moral condition of society—however sincerely I may regret the inattention manifested by some, to the momentous concerns of religion—however seriously I may have suffered in my feelings, in consequence of the persecutions I have experienced; yet God witness when I say it, enmity towards a fellow creature dwells not in my heart.

I hope to be exonerated from the charge of egotism in adverting to some circumstances which more particularly relate to myself. A sense of duty requires it at my hands.

Few men are capable of judging of the motives which have actuated your speaker through life: Not because those motives have been inscrutable or past finding out, but because I have failed in making them known. I reckon it among the prominent faults of my nature, that I am too regardless of what the world may think of my conduct, and too independent in my feelings, to stoop for victory. But, standing as I now do, upon the brink of perhaps an eternal separation, I ask it as the last testimony of your respect, to have you abstain from judging of my motives, until you shall behold the evils averted against which I have repeatedly cautioned you, and witness, either the emancipation of human intellect from the thralldom of superstition, or behold your fellow creatures in abject mental bondage. Then, when the green sods of the valley shall repose over my ashes; when oblivion shall have obliterated a recollection of the foibles and imperfections of our nature; then, if perchance an honest deed, arising from the dictates of an honest heart, can be remembered by a friend, let it be rudely delineated upon the stone that marks the spot—I ask no more.

Having thus briefly hinted at the circumstances which have attended us during the time we have known each other, I shall beg leave now to notice some things which are thought to concern your future welfare here on earth, and your peace at the trying hour of death.

The evils to which you are exposed, are neither few nor small. I feel it to be a duty, therefore, with much "plainness of speech" to point them out, and with becoming deference to the feelings of those concerned, to hint at the means of avoiding the consequences. In doing this, I shall be led to recommend some things for your serious consideration which pertain to your prosperity.

Permit me, then, to observe, that one evil which may result from your condition, and which is to be carefully guarded against, is that indifference which too extensively prevails in religious societies in this place. No tongue can describe the apprehensions felt, I trust, by many of your friends, on this account. It was the complaint of the angel of one of the ancient churches, that they were neither "cold nor hot." And a state of lukewarmness in any body of professing Christians, is more to be dreaded than almost any other evil. It leaves a society exposed to all the seductions of vice, and brings into disrepute the cause they espouse.

I have sometimes thought, that our success has been greatly impeded by a want of engagedness among our brethren; and although I have attributed such indifference to the want of ability on the part of your speaker, it has nevertheless occurred to my mind, that a more punctual attendance on the publick and private duties devolving upon us as believers in a glorious doctrine, might have produced a happy effect upon the mind of your servant. But, all things considered, we have much to thank God for, and it would be quite improper for us to criminate one another, while it remains so extremely doubtful who is most in the fault. The most I can desire is, that any apparent or real inattention on our part, may serve to warn us of future danger, and admonish us all of the propriety—yea the necessity, of a constant attention to every duty.

Again:—You will be liable to err from the path of duty, in consequence of listening to the persuasions of unprincipled religionists.—It has become the policy of the religious world to descend to almost any thing to gain proselytes to their discordant systems. Knowing that reason and truth are at variance with their creeds, they will attempt to allure you from the path of integrity and uprightness, by setting up their systems as worthy of all respect, and pretending that an outward acknowledgment of their authority will be the first step to popular favour. But in addition to what I have heretofore said on this subject, I would now, at a time when I cannot be justly suspected of acting from interested motives—I would now, declare it to be the full conviction of my mind, that even those who in such a manner would add strength to their cause, would not hesitate to dethrone integrity from the heart of man, and violate the most sacred obligations of Heaven!—And I hesitate not to aver, that rather than know that one of you, my brethren and friends, were induced to deny your faith in word or deed, from interested motives, I would prefer the painful task of attending your funeral obsequies! No; may Almighty God protect you from the deceptive allurements of such as "lie in wait to deceive;" and may heaven forbid that the unwelcome intelligence should ever reach my ears, that any of you have fallen in love with a "popular religion."

My reasons for feeling thus solicitous, and for being thus particular in avowing my apprehensions, are briefly expressed in what follows:

In all my experience in the world, I have never known an instance, where purity of heart and an inordinate love of popular applause were to be found in any one person at the same time. Hence, to know that a believer in the Christian religion is induced to deny his faith, with a view to gain some particular object, is, with me, an assurance that he has become an enemy to God—an enemy to man—an enemy to himself.

I would appeal to the experience of those to whom I speak, in confirmation of what I have said. I would ask;—where is an instance within the recollection of my hearers, in which it is known that a person, convinced in his own mind of the universal benevolence of God, has departed from the faith out of interested motives, without a previous or subsequent corruption of heart?

By this I do not mean, that it is impossible for a person to alter his mind and change his opinion upon matters of doctrine without necessarily becoming worse; but I mean that such is the nature of things, that he who will outwardly approbate that which he inwardly condemns is unworthy of our confidence or respect.

How shall these evils be avoided? I answer; by making sincerity of heart your standard virtue. Ask yourselves frequently, whether your words and actions are capable of standing the test of an all-knowing God. Follow the convictions of your understandings; and although you may suffer for a season, you will ultimately obtain a crown of rejoicing. And let it ever be remembered, that those who would allure you from the path of uprightness, would be the first to despise your want of sincerity and faithfulness; and that even those who would make you hypocrites, would become, in process of time, your task-masters.

Having hinted at the evils to which you are more or less exposed by your peculiar situation, I cannot refrain from giving you such advice as I think will be serviceable to you all. Silver and gold I have not, but such as I have I freely give you.

It is presumed, that the success and prosperity of your Society, will depend much on your future choice of a faithful, and independent Pastor.

Such is the present state of society here, and such the circumstances of our ministering brethren, that it may be somewhat difficult for you to obtain such ministerial aid as will be suited to your condition. But, I beg of you all to remember, that God hath chosen the weak things of this world to confound the mighty;—and should the scarcity of preachers prevent you from obtaining, at first, the man of your choice, it is hoped that others who are at least faithful in the cause will be found to aid you with their labours, and their prayers.

When you have obtained your ministering servant; let me entreat you to encourage his heart by a prompt attention to every duty imposed by our divine Lord and Master. Few can form an adequate conception of the anxieties, and troubles, and perplexities, which fall to the lot of the faithful minister of the New Covenant. Oftentimes, while his brethren and the people of his charge are happy in the plenteous blessings of indulgent Heaven, he consumes his substance, and his life, over the midnight lamp, seeking for the bread of salvation with which to feed the children of God.

The minister of the gospel has a right to expect the countenance and support of his people. But when he meets with cool indifference. instead of zeal,—with neglect, instead of affection, his heart, if it be endowed with an ordinary share of sensibility, fails within him, and his soul is discouraged. Be entreated then, to sustain your future minister, if God shall send you one, with your prayers, with your kindness, and, if necessary, with such portion of your substance as he may absolutely need, and you can consistently spare. Remember, that he will have to endure the frowns of a misgiving world, and suffer all manner of contumely and reproach; and that the co-operation of his friends, will be a needful and indispensable encouragement.—Be not too ready to believe the malignant aspersions of the world when they revile him; but let this truth be impressed upon your minds, that he will be hated, by the devotees of error, in exact proportion to his usefulness.

MISCELLANY.

From the Christian Intelligencer.

Bennington, Vt. May 1, 1827.

DEAR SIR:

I fear that one of Dr. Beecher's Great Fires has just passed over our town, and that it will leave behind it a scene of "moral desolation." I have never subscribed to the doctrine of universal salvation, but the religion of Jesus Christ, pure and undefiled, under whatever name it may be presented to us, is a religion from which we have every thing to hope and nothing to fear. It is however liable to be abused; and when I say that all the sentiments contained in the following Creed, have been either directly or indirectly advocated in conferences and published from our pulpit, and that repeatedly, I think you will agree with me, that any thing rather than the religion of Jesus is preached among us.

With a view to contribute my mite towards staying the march of bigotry and intolerance, and to throw a little shield around morality, I send you the following CREED for publication in your paper. Being written expressly for this place, it perhaps contains some peculiarities of expression, which may not be exactly understood by the generality of readers, though I think it will not be wholly uninteresting to any. K.

MR. EDITOR,—Having made some important improvements upon the New Testament doctrine of Jesus Christ, I wish you, for the benefit of mankind, to publish

MY CREED.

1. I believe that one, and one, and one added together, make one; and that nothing subtracted from three leaves one.

2. I believe that the heart of man is totally depraved, so much so, that it is impossible for him to do a good action, and that his best motive is disinterested malice towards God and man.

3. I believe that the greater part of mankind are elected and appointed by the decrees of God to eternal damnation, and consequently that salvation is freely offered to, and may be obtained by, all.

4. I believe that our religious and moral duties consist principally in the observance of the Sabbath, and in attending our meetings, in refraining from profane swearing, and from all amusements, and that it is well for a man to avoid lying, cheating and slandering his neighbours—but that these last are non-essentials.

5. I believe that the conversion of every sinner is a special miracle wrought by God upon the heart, and that this accounts for the fact, that those who are very wicked before conversion, generally remain so afterwards.

6. I believe that the purer the morality of one who has not been the subject of miraculous regeneration, the greater is the aggregate of his guilt; and the more virtuous his conduct is, the more certain is the evidence that he is sealed to eternal damnation.

7. I believe that charity towards those who differ from us in belief, is no part of christian duty—but that it is the duty of the world to be charitable towards us.

8. I believe that the people of God ought not to encourage in business, or be instrumental in appointing to office, any person who does not belong to our church, however just and upright his conduct may be. This would have the happy effect to bring morality into disrepute, and moreover manifest our love to our enemies, as we should thereby make them all good christians, or at least hypocrites!

9. I believe in the infallibility of our faith, and that every one who doubts it “has never read his Bible, is fighting against God, is a liar, and an infidel.”

10. I believe that hereafter we shall take ample vengeance upon unbelievers; and for this purpose, I believe the all-wise and merciful Creator has so constructed the immortal world, that the hallelujahs of the righteous will be heard in the lowest regions of hell, and mingling with the groans of the damned, will reverberate upon the ears of the saints, giving sweetness and intensity to their bliss; while at the same time it will increase beyond measure the justly deserved horror and despair of the wretched tenants of the dark abyss.

Lastly, I believe that our doctrine is a doctrine of charity, of love, of reason, of common sense, and that it proclaims “peace on earth and good will towards men.”

THE INFALLIBLE ELIXIR.

Esculapius, being one day as (curiosity led him a rambling) in danger of being benighted, made the best of his way to a house he saw at some distance, where he was hospitably received by the master of it. Cremes, for that was the master's name, though but a young man, was infirm and sickly. Of several dishes served up to supper, Cremes observed that his guest ate of but one, and that the most simple, nor could all his entreaties prevail on him to do otherwise. He was notwithstanding, highly delighted with Esculapius' conversation, in which he observed a cheerfulness and knowledge superior to any thing he had hitherto met with. The next morning Esculapius took his leave, but not until he had engaged his good-natured host to pay him a visit at a small villa, a few miles from thence, where he informed him of his dwelling. Cremes came accordingly, and was most kindly received; but how great was his amazement, when supper was served up, to see naught but milk, honey, and a few roots dressed in the plainest but neatest manner to which hunger, cheerfulness, and good sense, were the only sauces. Esculapius seemed to eat with pleasure, while Cremes scarce tasted of them; on which a repast was ordered more suitable to our guest's taste. Immediately there succeeded a banquet, composed of the most artful dishes that luxury could invent, with great plenty and variety of the richest and most intoxicating wines. Those too were accompanied by damsels of bewitching beauty. It was now Cremes gave loose to his appetite, and every thing he tasted raised ecstasies beyond what he had ever known.—During the repast, the damsels sung and danced to entertain them; their charms enchanted the enraptured guest, already flushed with what he had drank; his senses were lost in extatic confusion. Every thing around him seemed Elysium, and he was on the point of indulging the most boundless freedom, when, on a sudden, their beauty, which was but a vizard, fell off, and discovered forms the most hideous and forbidding imaginable. Lust, revenge, folly, murder, misery, poverty and despair, now appeared in the most odious shapes, and the place instantly became a most dire scene of wretchedness and confusion.—How often did Cremes wish himself far distant from such diabolical company! and he now dreaded the fatal consequence which threatened him. His blood ran chill at his heart; his knees smote each other with fear; and joy and rapture were converted to amazement and horror! When Esculapius perceived it had made sufficient impression on his guest, he thus addressed him; “Know Cremes, it is Esculapius who has thus entertained you, and what you have here beheld is a true image of the deceitfulness and misery inseparable from luxury and intemperance. Would you be happy, be temperate. Temperance is the parent of health, virtue, wisdom, and plenty, and every thing that can make you happy in this or the world to come. It is indeed the true luxury of life; for without it, life cannot be enjoyed.” This said, he disappeared, and left Cremes (instead of an elegant apartment) in an open plain, full of ideas quite different from those he had brought with him. On his return home from the most luxurious, he became one of the most temperate men, by which wise method he soon regained his health. Frugality produced riches, and from an infirm and crazy constitution and almost ruined estate by virtue of this infallible elixir, he became one of the happiest men breathing, and lived to a healthy old age revered as an oracle of wisdom throughout all Greece.

LONG LIFE.

He who knows not what it is to labour, knows not what it is to enjoy. The felicity of human life depends on the regular prosecution of some laudable purpose or object, which keeps awake and enlivens all our powers. Our happiness consists in the pursuit, much more than the attainment, of any temporal good. Rest is agreeable; but it is only from preceding labours that rest acquires its true relish. When the mind is suffered to remain in continued inaction all its powers decay. It soon languishes and sickens; and the pleasures which it proposed to obtain from rest, become tedious and insipid. To this, let that miserable set of men bear witness, who after spending a great part of their life in active industry, have retired to what they fancied was to be a pleasing enjoyment of themselves, in wealthy inactivity and profound repose, where they expected to find an Elysium, they have found nothing but a dreary and comfortless waste. Their days have dragged on with uniform languor; with the melancholy remembrance, often returning of the cheerful hours they passed, when they were engaged in the honest business and labours of the world.

To enjoy life, and see many days, is the universal wish; and as the wish is prompted by nature, it cannot be in itself unlawful. At the same time, several circumstances concur to temper the eagerness of this wish; and to show us that it should always be formed under due submission to the wise judgment of Heaven. Who among us can tell whether, in wishing for the continuance of many years on earth we may only be wishing for a prolongation of distress and misery? You might live, my friends, till you had undergone lingering rounds of severe pain, from which death would have proved a seasonable deliverance. You might live till your breasts were pierced with many a wound from public calamities or private sorrow. You might live till you beheld the death of all whom you had loved; till you survived all those who love you; till you were left as desolate strangers on earth, in the midst of a new race, who neither knew you nor cared for you, but who wished you off the stage. Of a nature so ambiguous are all the prospects which life sets before us, that in every wish we form relating to them much reason we have to be satisfied that our times are in the hands of God rather than our own.

WOMAN.

Woman is a very nice and a very complicated machine. Her springs are infinitely delicate; and differ from those of a man pretty nearly as the work of a repeating watch does from that of a town-clock. Look at her body; how delicately formed! Examine her senses: how exquisite and nice!—Observe her understanding how subtle and acute!—But look into her heart; there is the watch-word, composed of parts so minute in themselves, and so wonderfully combined, that they must be seen by a microscopic eye to be clearly comprehended.

The perception of a woman is as quick as lightning. Her penetration is intuition; I had almost said instinct. By a glance of her eye she shall draw a deep and just conclusion. Ask her how she formed it; she cannot answer the question.

As the perception of a woman is surprisingly quick; so their souls and imaginations are uncommonly susceptible. Few of them have culture enough to write; but when they do, how lively are their pictures! how animated their descriptions! But if few women write, they all talk; and every man may judge of them in this point, from every circle he goes into. Spirit in conversation depends entirely upon fancy; and women all over the world talk better than men. Have they a character to portray, or a figure to describe? they give but three traits of one or the other, and the character is known, or the figure placed before our eyes. Why? From the susceptibility of their imaginations their fancies receive lively impressions from those principal traits, and they paint those impressions with the same vivacity with which they received them.

Get a woman of fancy warm in conversation, she shall produce a hundred charming images, among which there shall not be one indelicate or coarse. Warm a man on the same subject; he shall possibly find stronger allusions, but they shall neither be so brilliant nor so chaste. [Sherlock.]

WHO'S AFRAID.—A sailor coming across Blockheath one evening, was stopped by a footpad who demanded his money, when a scuffle ensued, the tar took the robber, and bore away with his prize to a justice of the peace at Woolwich. When the magistrate came to examine into the assault, he told the sailor that he must take his oath that the robber had put him in bodily fear, otherwise he could not commit him. The sailor looking steadfastly at the justice, answered, "He! put me in bodily fear! no, nor any that ever lived; therefore, if that is the case, you may let him go, for I'll not swear to such a lie."

A great lord and a gentleman walking together, there came a boy by leading a calf with both his hands. Says the lord to the gentleman, "you shall see me make this boy let go his calf." With that he came towards him, thinking that the boy would pull off his hat, but the boy took no notice of him. The lord seeing that, "sirrah," says he, "do you not know me?" "Yes," replied the boy; "if your lordship will hold my calf, I will pull off my hat."

Dr. Warton—Dr. Baligny, a preacher of great celebrity, on account of the excellence of his Sermon, after having delivered an exceeding good discourse at Winchester Cathedral, the text of which was "all wisdom is sorrow;" received the following extempore, but elegant compliment from Dr. Warton, then at Winchester School.

If what you advance, dear Doctor, be true,
That wisdom is sorrow, how wretched are you.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Gen. Brown arrived at Sackett's Harbour on the 19th ult. in improved health and fine spirits, and was received with military honours and great cordiality by his old friends and acquaintances.

The New-Haven, Conn. papers say that the farmers in that vicinity have to rejoice at one of the most abundant harvests they have known for many years.

We understand, says the Richmond Enquirer, from a source in which we place reliance, that despatches are to go out immediately from New-York, in the Erie, commanding Commodore Porter to leave Key West.

Shocking.—A young girl has lately been tried in England, for having, in a fit of religious insanity, hanged her brother, a child 7 years old, in hope of sending him to heaven! So much comes from a belief in an endless hell.

A Snug Fortune.—A German journal says, that the late king of Saxony has left the princess Augusta, his only unmarried daughter, a fortune of 13 millions of dollars, (3 millions sterling,) from his own private fortune.

[What a very industrious man the king must have been to have earned by honest labour so large a fortune for one of his daughters!! But hundreds of thousands of times have the honest and deserving went supperless to bed, that this fortune might be accumulated; and yet the late king of Saxony was among the best of the big leeches which Providence permits to fatten upon the sweat and blood of mankind.]—Niles.

The Hon. Wm. B. Rochester, secretary to the Panama Mission, arrived at Rochester, on the 26th ult. by way of the Mississippi, Ohio and Lake Erie.

Salt.—The Syracuse Gazette states that the number of barrels of salt inspected at the works in that vicinity during the month of July, varies but little from 129,000 bushels.—The price has been from 6s. 6d. to 6s. 9d. The daily quantity of salt now made in the town of Salina, is about 7,000 bushels—1,800 bushels of which is coarse and the remainder fine.

The Canadian Spectator mentions that one seventh part of the soil of Upper Canada belongs to the Episcopal clergy, who, however, at present minister to only one twentieth part of the population.

Mr. Crawford has, it appears, contrary to a former statement, accepted the office of Judge of the Superior Court of Georgia, and is now officiating Judge on the Northern Circuit.

In the State of Massachusetts, there are 196 incorporated manufacturing companies, principally woolen and cotton, employing a capital of near $30,000,000.

NOTICES.

The Chenango Association of Universalists, will meet at Brooklyn, Pa., on the last Wednesday of the present month.

The Hudson River Association will meet in New York, on the second Wednesday and Thursday (18th and 14th) of September next.

The General Convention of the New England States and others, will meet at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., on the 3d Wednesday and Thursday (19th and 20th) of September next.

"HONOUR THY FATHER AND MOTHER."

Behold that helpless infant there,
Dependent on a parent's care,
For health, for comfort, and for food;
Unconscious yet of ill, or good.

How many wants are manifest
Before those wants can be express'd:
How many anxious fears they give,
Before a parent's hopes can live.

Long must their watchful cares extend,
And days and years in love attend,
In sickness and in health provide,
And every infant action guide.

Who can such tenderness repay?
Or who their fondest hopes betray?
Can thankless children dare to call
On God, the Parent of us all?

Oh, when their human strength decays,
Honour your parents' latter days;
So shall your happiness increase,
They to the grave descend in peace.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATION.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

LETTER NO. 5.

To Elder JOSEPH BADGER, of Mendon, Monroe, co. N. Y.

SIR:—Your third reason why you are not an Universalist, I shall now take into consideration, hoping that we shall be able to come to the right of it, notwithstanding you have denied your premises. You may think I treated you with neglect by not calling on you for a copy of your reasons, as you mention in your letter. But I am sensible, that every candid person acquainted with you, and who attended your lecture on the 27th May, will exonerate me from the charge; and however much to your own confusion it be said, the publick may be assured, that I stated your reasons, at least, correct in substance, in my first letter. This I was satisfied of then, and no less so after you denied them. Should you be induced finally to own your offspring, seeing you have once denied them, how do you expect you will appear before the publick in their defence!! You cannot, with honour, retrace your steps in this case, which you must do, and defend your reasons, or let us know where the mistake lies.

Your third objection stands thus: "Universalism is productive of no revivals of religion, or good moral effects;" or in other words, "it is productive of no good," or "has no tendency to make men better." It is here to be observed, that, in the present day, religion is esteemed valuable, in proportion as it can be made the means of operating upon the animal passions, and produce what are popularly termed "revivals;" and all partialists can boast their share of this kind of religion. And because Universalists do not descend to the base tricks resorted to by Limitarians, of angry gods, burning hells, and devouring devils, to frighten people into the profession of something that passes for religion, it is said the sentiment "has no tendency to make men better." I have ever been persuaded, that, in every denomination of professing Christians, there are respectable and intelligent members to be found. But you never see them countenance the contemptible measures used by designing men, to get up those animal excitements. Look on the deplorable state of the first Presbyterian Church in Troy, N. Y. The "Finney and Beeman revival" in that place has torn asunder the church, and the more intelligent and worthy part of the members have published the disgraceful transactions to the world.

I shall say but little in this number about "revivals," but shall assume the last clause as containing the sum of your objection, viz. that Universalism is productive of "no good moral effects," or "has no tendency to make men better." In my remarks, I shall make use of the terms which are most convenient but shall endeavour to preserve the sense of your objection. I will observe in passing, however, that the remarks in your discourse involving the Gospel Advocate, by which you necessarily included the editor, were too uncandid to be passed in silence. In abominating that work, you said the paper spoke against "reformations"—making use of this word instead of the word "revivals." This can be proved by respectable witnesses. Whereas, the editor of the Advocate nor any of his correspondents ever said any thing against reformation or a true revival of religion. But on the contrary, have endeavoured to promote it. You knew, sir, if you had seen the Advocate and perused it attentively, that it is your popular "revivals" which have no concern with the religion of Jesus, which are spoken against, and those only.—But to have told the truth would not have answered your purpose! This is a specimen of your whole performance!

In noticing your objection, we do not hold ourselves accountable for the conduct of nominal Universalists, and we believe there are many such—but shall only inquire into the natural tendency of the doctrine properly understood. In our expression of belief, given in my first letter, it will be perceived, that we hold to rewards and punishments; and, that they are alike designed to effect the good of man. We believe that God is "the same just, kind, merciful and propitious Being, from eternity to eternity, without the least "variableness or shadow of turning." That he created only to bless, and to make happy in the enjoyment of himself in a greater or less degree, according to the capacity of his creatures.—That he never stood in need of any to suffer, in order to appease his wrath, or to open a way whereby it could be consistent for him to be gracious; as he never was ungracious, neither was it ever inconsistent for him to be merciful.

'That the gift of his son Jesus Christ, embracing his life, miracles, ministry, death, resurrection and ascension into glory, was a commendation of divine love, (Rom. v. 8.) We believe, that God loves sinners, even while they are such, and because "his mercies fail not," he will save them from their sins. That Christ was the "express image of his person," and he prayed for his bitterest enemies in the agonies of death! And as it is the best interest of man, and enjoined in the holy scriptures, it is our duty, to conform to the divine image—to "love our enemies, bless those who curse us, do good to those who hate us, and pray for those who spitefully use and persecute us; that we may (characteristically) be the children of our Father who is in heaven; for he makes the sun rise on the evil and on the good, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust," Matt. v. 44, 45.

I would not insinuate but that other denominations possess these virtues, and that their doctrines teach them in some degree; but Universal love embraces the whole of all that is morally and spiritually excellent, while other systems, from their very nature, are limited in the possession and exercise of the divine principles of charity. You will bear in mind, that the question is, what is the natural tendency of Universalism properly understood?—Universalism is the universal love or good will, of God, of Christ, of angels and men. But perhaps, the better way to come at the comparative merits of the several prominent systems of the day, according to their natural tendency, will be briefly to notice what they are.

1. The doctrine of "election and reprobation" teaches that God loves a small portion of the human family, and has rendered their salvation forever secure and hates, and ever will hate, all the rest; and as an expression of his hatred, before they had an existence, (as he made choice of the elect "before the foundation of the world,") ordained them to wrath. &c "to the praise of his vindictive justice." It is easy to perceive how far this doctrine is calculated to beget love, if we were confined to its narrow limits. It requires no evidence to prove the evil tendency it would have on society, were this theory reduced to practice! How many worthy and pious individuals have been persecuted and murdered—how many have committed suicide—and how many, otherwise peaceful families, have been distressed, and rent asunder, by the influence of this doctrine. What calamity it has produced in all parts of the world, where it has had the rule! This is the very nature of the doctrine now, and all these evils would follow its desolating hand if its advocates had the power!—For we have no belief that the Ethiopian can change his skin, or the leopard his spots.—

This doctrine only regards a few of mankind as brethren, and spurns all the rest from the tender mercies of God both here and hereafter! It opens a door for the most lawless outrage, and the vilest licentiousness. It holds out favours to the Church, and indignation and wrath for the world for whom Christ died! and while they even doubt their own election, which they hold to be a mark of Christian meekness, and others, though professing the same doctrine, seem filled with cold indifference; the residue, where this system has its natural tendency, viewing themselves forever reprobated, and hated by the Almighty, become hardened in sin, and hate God in their turn! It is impossible that it should be otherwise. For if "we love Him because He first loved us," which is according to scripture, and the reason and fitness of things, for the same reason mankind will hate God when they have heard and believe, that He first hated them! And not only so, but they will necessarily hate all the professedly exclusive favourites of heaven, who must hate again in their turn because their God hates, and they, to be consistent, must be like him!

2. Arminianism, or the doctrine of doubtful salvation, which places the ability in the creature, to choose or refuse his eternal interest, to a superficial observer, may present a fairer aspect than the other, but its preferable nature vanishes before the pen of investigation like the mists of the morning. Proper views of God, the only proper object of religious worship and adoration, constitute the groundwork of true religion. For their natural tendency is, to inspire us with proper views of man, and of our relative duties to each other. But here, we have a God either ignorant or indifferent, or both. If he be ignorant, we cannot confide in him, and if indifferent, we ought not. But if this should be denied, seeing, that "his understanding is infinite," what does it differ from Calvinism? In the one case God decreed to save a part and damn the rest, and in the other, he infallibly knew before he made them, that all would not be saved! I have long despaired of seeing any real difference pointed out between these two theories, and if you can solve this problem let it be done.

This doctrine ever has been, and still is, a fruitful source of popular revivals, and the subjects of them, I regret to say, oftener exercise spiritual pride and censure, than meekness and forbearance. They are induced to look upon themselves as a superior order of beings, and turn the eye of contempt, and point the finger of scorn, at members of other denominations, and fulminate wrath and fury upon the impenitent or the unawakened. A future judgment to take place at some unknown period in eternity, in all the sublimity of horror, is described, the natural tendency of which is to beget selfishness and cruelty in the one class, and slavish fear and trembling distrust in the other. The righteous, if they would suffer themselves to think, must suppose they will be prepared to look, with relentless and unyielding firmness, on their suffering husbands, wives, fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, children, and other companions in life! weltering in a world of unutterable woe! But they must remain "unmoved at the sight," or they would be miserable even in heaven! The thought must be truly painful to every believer of this doctrine, and while I write, my pity rises in behalf of those who mourn under this load, and whose faces must gather the blackness of gloom at the prospect of their heaven! But what view of God is the natural tendency of this doctrine calculated to give? This scarcely requires an answer, for then it will be his eternal pleasure to have suffering run parallel with his own existence, inflicted upon his offspring whom he once loved and for whom Jesus died! Evils both local and general have originated in this doctrine. Families have been disturbed—hard heartedness has reigned—communities have been agitated, and many lives have been lost by suicide, while others are driven to madness and despair, and are lingering out a miserable existence! a torment to themselves, a burden to their friends, a disgrace to religion, objects of pity! And here I appeal to a sensible publick whether these statements are exaggerated. These evils have followed, and been consequent upon, the belief of this doctrine. But am happy to say, it has not always had its natural tendency on society, for human nature, bad as it is supposed to be, rises superior to the natural tendency of the two preceding doctrines. Proof of the evil tendency of the doctrine may be seen in every instance where mankind are truly actuated by its principles.

3. The doctrine of Universal Grace and good will embraces every thing that is good and glorious; and whenever mankind are engaged in the laudable work of promoting either the publick welfare or private happiness it is in unison with this doctrine. For where pure and unmixed benevolence prevails, it is an offspring of its own kind, and therefore inconsistent with the doctrines of terror and wrath. These are forgotten and laid aside, in the exercise of that Charity which "never fails." Embracing, then, every set of Christians, so far as they are actuated in their worship by "the goodness of God which leads to repentance," and not the dread of his wrath—by "the love of Christ," and not the fear of hell; this is the natural tendency of the doctrine of Universal and unchanging grace. Every rational, worthy and exalted view of Deity, belongs to Universalism, and not to the modern systems of cruelty. Every theory of partial salvation argues a partial God, a partial Christ, a partial gospel! and every attempt to remove this just imputation is a mere botch, and has made the matter worse. Universalism properly understood, carries with it its own evidence of the impartiality of God, of Christ and his gospel; and besides inspiring us with true love, unshaken confidence, and humble reverence towards the Deity, and just and exalted notions of Jesus the Captain of our salvation, and enabling us to harmonize the sacred scriptures, embracing all the threatenings and promises, the judgments and mercies, the natural tendency of Universalism, is—

1. It makes better husbands and wives.
2. It makes better or more benovolent parents.
3. It makes better or more obedient children.
4. It makes better neighbours.
5. It makes better citizens, rulers and magistrates; and,
6. It, of course, makes better Christians.

Here, sir, I would have you carefully and candidly, observe, that we do not arrogate to ourselves the exclusive exercise of these virtues, but willingly and cheerfully admit, that they are possessed by others in a commendable degree. Yet, as I before observed, they are not the natural fruits of their doctrines, but of Universalism under another name. And bear in mind farther, that it is the natural tendency of Universalism properly understood, that I am to show, aside from what may appear most conspicuous in the lives of some who merely make a profession, and mistake the name for the thing signified,

1. The natural tendency of Universalism is to make better husbands and wives. They look upon themselves as mutual helps—objects of the same grace and paternal love; and as God equally regards them both, and provides for their peace and salvation, they never lift the unhallowed hand nor raise the boisterous tongue of abuse, to blast the comforts which their Maker bountifully gives; and as the will of God is their happiness, they will not wickedly attempt to step between, and render bitter the very sweets of life, but conform to the divine will in promoting each others welfare. They will bear with the mistakes and foibles of each, knowing, that, to err is human—to forgive divine; and though there be a difference of sentiment respecting the affairs of life, it does not mar their peace. But, squaring their minds by the equal will of their Father, they do not suffer trifles to swell into a destroyer of their mutual forbearance; and I have long observed, with painful sensations, that, where the husband or wife was zealously attached to some partial system of faith, the subject of religion, which is calculated to give the most comfort, would rouse the angry passion, if the opposite party happened to be an Universalist. I have known instances of both, and could name them if it were proper. But this unhappy difference is never caused by Universalism, but always originates in the opposite tenet, which is its natural tendency, while the other party forbears, and is frequently entirely silent for the sake of peace. I have known too, where parties thus opposed have been reconciled, in the sentiment of unbounded benevolence, and peace and harmony have been restored, in family and neighbourhood. But had they been reconciled on the score of some partial creed, some of their neighbours would have become marks for their religious vengeance. I have known likewise, where husband and wife have lived together for years, both believing the doctrine of Universalism, though not known to each other, the one having never heard it preached, and the other, not in many years; and when in their mature years they heard the doctrine for the first time, their eyes were wet with tears of gratitude, and their hearts leaped for joy!

2. To make better, or more benevolent parents. It extends from parent to child, and regards the whole family circle with equal affection. Children and servants are treated with kindness. They are praised and rewarded for their good conduct, and chastised for their disobedience, with a view to their good. They never correct with anger, for this is likely to beget the same passion in the child, but with judgement, explaining both their reason and object. They look upon God as the impartial Father of all, and adjust their government and discipline accordingly. But to regard the Almighty as treating a part of his children unkindly, either here or hereafter, and, at the same time, treat their own impartially, they would act without a model, and aside from the natural tendency of their doctrine.

3. To make better, or more obedient children. This is a natural consequence of the foregoing, and no unprejudiced mind will pretend to doubt it. Children, seeing their parents kind to each other, and impartially tender to them, by this means, receive in their tender minds the first principles of kindness. Brothers and sisters will treat each other alike, because they have received the example from their parents, whom they love. And this affection will "grow with their growth and strengthen with their strength." They have confidence in their parents, that they will do them no harm, and a filial fear joined with ardent respect, secures their obedience, to their superiours, and good will among themselves. Hence,

4. To make better neighbours. Let a generation of the above description, trained to benevolence of soul, and peace of mind, people the earth, and those unhappy contentions, which have produced neighbourhood broils and intestine wars, deprived the widow of her living, and sent the orphan begging at the door of the inhospitable, would be only known in history as a warning to avoid them. The descendents of such a race, guided by the natural tendency of universal good will, would be the protectors, and not the destroyers of each other; and the unhallowed encroachments, upon the lives, liberties and reputation of our fellow-beings would have an end. All these evils have been caused by a misnamed religion! but where love to God and good will to men, had no concern.

5. To make better citizens, rulers and magistrates. Better citizens, because in striving to promote the general good, they would aim to maintain inviolate, the general distribution, and spread of civil and religious liberty. They would have no cause to favour but the cause of benevolence. Better rulers, because they would consider themselves as ruling for the good of the whole, and not for that of a particular party. The rulers and the ruled would put mutual confidence in each other. An opposite state of things would produce mutual jealousies. And a selfish partialist is as likely to supplant his brother as any one else, because he is not taught to look upon all mankind as brethren, and his brother may be considered a cast-away, or a reprobate. Better magistrates, because they would dispense equal justice to all. But tied to a party, it is the nature of the case to be partial. This is the natural tendency of every system of religious partiality. But I do not say they are all actuated by their principles.

6. To make better Christians. But here it is proper to ask, what constitutes a Christian? Not a mere name to be sure. But your party have assumed to be called "Christian" whether they possess the virtues which the name implies or not. I freely grant, that, some of them, with whom I am acquainted, I believe to be worthy of the name, and the worthy should only have it. But they all have the name. Hence you have your good Christians, and your bad Christians, which is a paradox, a contradiction, and the title is an unwarrantable assumption. To be a Christian is to be like Christ; "who, when he was reviled, reviled not again;" but "went about doing good" impartially. Christians never quarrel, for then, they cease to be Christians. I would not arraign your party as exclusively addicted to quarrelling, sir, for perhaps all denominations in some degree partake of the same odium. But notwithstanding this you are still Christians!!!! I notice this subject, sir, without any ill will to any being on earth, but feel, that it is a demand of justice.

A belief in the doctrine of universal benevolence has a natural tendency to make the believer universally benevolent, and to look upon the whole intelligent race as one family, the children of one kind Father. It forbids to mar the peace, or destroy the happiness, of one individual, as it cannot be done without wounding a brother or sister! And this disposition is inspired by a love of duty, of God, and of human kind, which is the only kind of service which can meet a peaceful reward. For where a fear of torment is the prompter, the offering is not free, and it is plain, the subject would choose to do otherwise, if he were not restrained by dread of punishment! But this is far from being true service to that God who is Love. It is no better than the worship paid to Moloch. But it is the natural tendency of the doctrine of endless hell-torments!

I challenge the whole world to produce an instance, where the belief of, and a conformity to, the doctrine of universal benevolence, ever produced persecution, murder, suicide, fraud, slander, insanity, profanity, or any other evil!! But the opposite doctrine stands engraved in letters of blood!!

I appeal to the history of Christ and his followers, and the doctrine they taught, as the most prominent instance in this case. Their doctrine is that of universal benevolence. To their testimony I have appealed, in my former letters. And to their lives and conduct I appeal for the tendency of the doctrine, in addition to the arguments given above. And you must prove, sir, not merely assert, that they did teach a different doctrine, and harmonize that sentiment with reason and benevolence, before your "three reasons" will be of any service to you, or your cause. Yours, &c.

ADVOCATE AND INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

A SERMON.

2. Cor. xiii. 11. "Finally, brethren, farewell."
(Concluded.)

Among the social and relative duties which may be affectionately recommended, as all important to your prosperity, permit me to mention the following:

1. It is highly necessary that you should not neglect the assembling of yourselves together on proper occasions for social and religious worship. A neglect of this duty will be likely to discourage your ministering servants, and bring into disrepute the cause you delight to honour. Trifling hindrances and excuses should be overcome and abolished. A little resolution will remove every obstacle, and habit will render the duty easy and delightful.

I would not only recommend the duty of attending punctually upon the publick worship of God, as the best means of promoting virtue and happiness; but I would take the liberty of advising to an attendance upon the labours of such preachers as advocate the impartial benevolence of Deity. This advice of course will only be received by those who profess a belief in such doctrine; and I intend it only for such. Mere curiosity should never induce a professor to leave his place of worship for another. The person whose sense of duty sets so lightly upon him that he can find enjoyment in forsaking his friends for the society of others, is not to be trusted as a faithful brother; for we may be assured, that if the obligations of Religion are not binding upon him, no other obligations will have a salutary bearing upon his conscience.

There are persons now present, who, during the time I have been with you, have never been unnecessarily absent from our meetings—their value is above all price. I have heard them reproached for their steadfastness, and reviled for their integrity; but they have been faithful unto the end, and are now respected—yea their names are respectfully pronounced, even by the enemies of our doctrine, on account of their consistency. Let this be a lesson to others, and an encouragement to the wavering.

2. I would entreat you, brethren, to keep the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace.

The discords and contentions which are discoverable in other denominations, may serve as a solemn admonition to you, to avoid the like evils. Where the popularity of a doctrine becomes the test of its divinity, we may not expect much good to result from embracing it. Hence those evils which I have mentioned, are but the natural consequences which may be expected to arise from an inconsiderate attachment to those systems which are only perpetuated by their popularity.

The doctrine of a free salvation from sin, is at present protected, by the unpopularity of the sentiment, from the evils just mentioned; and I hope, and verily believe, that its equalizing tendency, and the humility inculcated by it, will ever constitute an effectual barrier against them. But, the least departure from the simplicity of truth will be likely to engender pride, and produce discord among you.

I have witnessed, with unspeakable satisfaction an uncommon degree of friendship and union of sentiment, and harmony of feeling, among the believers in our doctrine throughout this section of God's heritage; nor is the condition of this congregation an exception to the general rule; yet whenever a love of this world obtains an ascendancy over our affections, whenever we begin to experience a thirst for the honours and favours of the popular sects,—or whenever it becomes our object to please the opponents of our sentiment, by a partial acquiescence to their views, for the sake of peace, then we shall feel the stings of disunion, and experience the evils of discord and contention. Better would it be, therefore, for you, my brethren, to be despised by all the world, and hated of all men, on account of your views, than to follow the footsteps, or imitate the examples of those who have departed from the simplicity of the gospel.

4. Another duty which will devolve upon you is that of studying to know the truth.

I have endeavoured, during my stay with you, to exhibit the great realities of the gospel according to the best of my abilities; but you need not be told of my inexperience, and want of talent to unfold the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. I have only boasted of the sincerity of my attachment, and the faithfulness of my heart; my powers of body and mind have not enabled me to do all that I could desire. There remains, therefore, an important work for you to perform.—Taking reason and revelation for your guide, you will find it a delightful employment to investigate the momentous subject of religion, and seek for truth as for hidden treasure. I entreat you, never to take the opinions of men for proof;—examine, and judge for yourselves; and be careful never to let your imaginations run away with your powers of discrimination.

The scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain the only proper mode of faith; they will be the man of your counsel, and, I hope, the guide of your conduct. In this blessed book, you will find enough to satisfy every rational inquiry—enough to comfort you under all your trials—and enough and to spare of the Grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men.

5. It is still more important that you should set good examples before your fellow beings. A correct “walk and conversation” will do more for the promotion of your happiness and the advancement of your cause than all the professions in the world.

Your neighbours will look upon you with a jealous eye; and what would be excused in another, will be magnified, if you are justly chargeable with it, and attributed to the demoralizing tendency of your faith.

Your children, will also look up to you who are parents, for instruction, and examples in righteousness. They will often hear you speak of the truth and efficacy of the doctrine you profess; and unless your conduct corresponds with your faith, they will distrust, either the sincerity of your professions, or the purity of your religion.

Your sentiments are founded upon the immutable benevolence of the eternal God; therefore you are bound to be benevolent:—You profess to believe in eternal Mercy;—be ye therefore merciful:—You have faith in the unchanging Justice of Heaven; be ye therefore just:—You profess to believe that God is love; let your souls be filled with that divine and peace-giving principle. In a word; live up to the requirements of the doctrine you profess, and the world may affect to despise, but it cannot hate you.

Another duty which devolves upon you, is, to give good advice to the rising generation. Much depends upon the performance of this duty. It will be necessary for you to caution the young against the seductions of vice, and guard them, by your affectionate entreaties against being led astray by their warm and lively imaginations. And amongst other things, permit me to say, they should be protected from those fears which are unfounded and unnecessary. Little, if any good can be expected to result from suffering the youthful mind to be filled with those dreadful apprehensions which are thought by many to be essential to salvation. Act up, then, to the dictates of your parental feelings, and all will be well; do your duty and you will be happy.

In the language of our context, I would, in view of the important duties at which I have hinted, exhort you all to “be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you.”

But how can I express my thankfulness for your kindness to me? Ah—has it come to this! Am I called upon to part—perhaps forever—with those whose worth I prize, and to whom I have so long been attached by a reciprocity of kindly feeling, by common joys, and common sufferings! Yes—providence hath decreed, and mortals must submit!

Accept, then, brethren and sisters, and friends, the only tribute of a heart devoted to your dearest interests, in my power to make—accept my gratitude.

It will not be said that I flatter you, when I say, that I came to you in weakness, and was kindly received, that you have been my friends both in prosperity, and adversity; that you have sustained me by your charity; that you have comforted me with your kind attentions; that you have made me happy by a willing reception of the truth I have endeavoured to proclaim for your edification.

By your kind indulgence, I have been sustained, at times when a forbidding frown appeared upon the face of all creation: My foibles and imperfections, have been generously attributed to a want of experience, rather than to evil intentions: And, by your charity, a multitude of faults have been covered, as with the mantle of Elijah.

When unrelenting enemies have assailed my motives, or my conduct, you have stood forth in my defence; and thus averted the threatened ruin of my prospects—shielded my devoted head from destruction, and thereby prevented the enemies of truth from gaining even a temporary triumph. In times of trial I have realized the sincerity of your friendship, and when heart and flesh were about to fail I have enjoyed your protection.

Believe me, then, when I tell you, that so long as my heart is capable of feeling a generous emotion, so long I shall remember you, and your kindness, your charity, and your friendship.

As one among the favours, which in addition to those already received at your hands, I take the liberty to request, that when you retrospectively survey the scenes we have witnessed, the trials we have endured in one common cause, and the joys we have experienced, you will not be too hasty in condemning the motives by which I have been actuated.

If I have, by my plainness of speech, injured the feelings of any person, whether friend or foe, I sincerely, and solemnly before God, desire forgiveness. If anything like acrimony has appeared in my publick communications, I trust it will be imputed, by a generous people, more to the aggravating circumstances which may have operated upon my mind, than to the want of charity towards all my fellow creatures.

In looking back upon our past lives, we often find much to regret and deplore, but it will be more a mark of wisdom in us to endeavour to mend our faults, than to spend our strength in reproaching ourselves or others. While, therefore, I behold in retrospect my own errors, and am willing to confess them, I look to God for assistance to avoid their recurrence.

Brethren: you are many of you, believers in the best, the most salutary, and the most consistent doctrine, which has ever been proclaimed on earth. In confirmation of its truth, you have the oath, the purposes, the promises of a God who cannot lie:—In addition to this, all the holy prophets have testified it—men have believed it—Christ preached it—and angels chanted it on the birth-morn of Immanuel. It breathes peace, and kindness, and charity, and benevolence, and love! It furnishes a delightful theme for contemplation, and gives a zest to every rational pleasure: It carries its consolations to the bed of sickness: Its comforts are imparted to the inhabitants of the hovel: Its genial influences are felt by the poor and the needy: It is a stay and a staff to the aged: It is the guide of youth: it adds vigour to health, and imparts strength to the weak: And last, though not least, its unspeakable joys are experienced by the dying! Yea, it is my full conviction, that in heaven, it will constitute the eternal theme of all beatified intelligences! When death, sin, and hell shall be annihilated by the all-subduing fiat of Omnipotence, then, too, Universal Love, Mercy and Goodness will be celebrated in deathless songs of joy and gratitude.

This doctrine, I have laboured to sustain, and some of you are doubtless satisfied of its truth. The evidences of its authenticity which have been adduced from time to time, have appalled its enemies! All creation has afforded us incontrovertible authority in its support; and now, where are “the servants of the living God” who are disposed openly to call it in question?

What remains, is for you to do. It is for you to honour your professions, with conduct suited to the excellence of the doctrine in which you believe. It is for you to exemplify the efficacy of your faith, in works of kindness, mercy and love. An important task, therefore, devolves upon you—a task which nothing but the grace of God can enable you to perform. From the obligations of the gospel no consideration can exonerate you, and nothing can extenuate or avert the chastisement your derilections may merit.

I would entreat you, then, by the sure mercies of God—by the life and examples of a spotless Redeemer—by the blood which was shed on Calvary’s Mount for sinners like ourselves—by the sacred names of the martyred Apostles of Jesus—by the testimony they have borne to a dying world of the mercy and love of Jehovah; to be circumspect in all your actions, faithful in all your professions, steadfast and immovable in all holy conversation, always abounding in righteousness, godliness, meekness and faith.

O, may your joy be full—may your graces abound,—may your examples be such that a gainsaying world may be constrained to acknowledge that even my feeble labours among you, have not been in vain in the Lord.

I leave you, brethren and sisters, with a most ardent prayer that the richest blessings of indulgent Heaven may rest upon you. So long as my cold heart can dictate a petition to the throne of Mercy, your case will be remembered. You, and your children, and your children’s children, will ever be near to me; and if your brother is ever allowed to occupy a place in your memories, let him be considered—your friend. Amen.

Finally, Fathers and Mothers, Husbands and Wives, Brothers and Sisters, and you, my youthful friends and little children—finally FAREWELL.

FROM THE UNIVERSALIST MAGAZINE.

FALSE TEACHERS.

☞ The design of the following communication is to point out to the reader the distinctive traits in the character of false teachers.

In the apostolic age, Christians were warned against the appearance of such teachers. Peter said to his brethren, “But there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you,” 2 Peter ii. 1. Jude writes as follows: “For there are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation; ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.”

It should be particularly observed that the false teachers here spoken of were men who lived in the age of the apostles. Peter spoke of them as having then already crept in unawares. Paul and Timothy says, “Now the spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils,” 1. Tim. iv. 1. It has been inferred from this passage, that the false teachers foretold by the apostles, were not to make their appearance until near the end of the world; and hence it is supposed by those who think that these same false teachers are now on the earth, that the end of the world is at hand. Such, when they are informed of the spread of what they call erroneous sentiments, will console themselves by saying, Ah! well, the reign of these teachers is short; the end of the world we know must be near, and God will soon avenge himself for his elect. However, with all the regard we have for these pious ones, we cannot but think they are in error, concerning both the teachers and the end of the world.—The latter times of which Paul spake in the passage last quoted, were the latter days of the ancient dispensation, in which Christ and his apostles lived. Paul commences his epistle to the Hebrews thus: "God, who at sundry times and in diverse manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days, spoken unto us by his Son." The expression 'these last days' shows that the apostle was speaking of then present time, and that he called that time the last days. In 1 John ii. 18, we read, "Little children, it is the last time: and as ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now there are many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time." In the latter times some were to depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils; and circumstances had already begun to verify the predictions on this subject. John, as we have seen, speaks of antichrists who had then already come, by which he knew that the last time had arrived. These antichrists were teachers who were against Christ; and this was what made them antichrists. The reader by comparing Jude 16 and 17 with 18 and 19, will perceive that in Jude's day there were false teachers in the church, and that he pointed them out as the mockers who were to appear in the last time.

It appears, then, to be settled, that the false teachers of whom the apostles particularly spoke were men who existed in the primitive age of the church, and not any class now on earth. There is no doubt however, but that there are false teachers now in the church, although they were not the particular subjects of prophecy; and the way we are to ascertain who are now false teachers, is to see whose characters most nearly resemble those of the false teachers in the apostolick age. I say, the way in which we are to ascertain who are now false teachers, is to see whose characters most nearly resemble those of the false teachers in the apostolick age. I will then proceed to delineate the characters of false teachers in the apostolick age. And here I remark, that it is the distinctive traits of their characters which I shall notice; and not a failing which they manifested now and then. I shall notice such habits as formed prominent features of their conduct, as such as were particularly noticed and described by the apostles, those eminent guardians of the church. 1. Those false teachers did their work privily. Peter says, they "privily shall bring in damnable heresies." Jude describes the private manner in which they accomplished their purposes when he says, "For there are certain men crept in unawares." Paul says of such teachers, "For of this sort are they which creep into houses," 2 Tim. iii. 6. He who spake as never man spake, describes this artful, disguised manner of operation by saying, that these false prophets came to the people in sheep's clothing, while inwardly they were ravening wolves. Mat.

viii. 15. One prominent trait, then, in the character of the false teachers of old was, they were sly, private, artful, not open and sincere. Now which class of teachers in the present day bears the nearest resemblance to those of old in this particular? Which disguise themselves in the character of the peculiar ministers of Christ? Which profess to have no other object in preaching than to save souls from the eternal wrath of God? This is all disguise; it is creeping in unawares. Such are not the peculiar ministers of Christ. They can show no credentials, they never have shown any, to prove that Jesus called them to the work of the ministry in a peculiar manner. All the evidence we have had or ever shall have is their own testimony. Which class of teachers instil their sentiments privately? Which circulate tracts and chatechisms in a private manner? dropping them upon the steps, or placing them in the latch of the door? Are there not many like ways in which a certain class of teachers are continually infusing their sentiments into the minds of the community? The true teachers of the apostolick age, "renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth commending themselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God," 2 Cor. iv. 2.

The English Judges have laid down two important rules in cases of Breach of Promise and Seduction. One is, that the parents of daughters shall not recover damages if they have neglected to inform the parents of young men of their proposals or intentions, while they were encouraging their addresses. The second is, that parents cannot substantiate a claim to compensation, if they have been so careless as to leave their daughters sitting up with their suitors for hours after themselves and the rest of the family have retired.

Farewell thou gay and lovely
Thou innocent and fair—
Hope spreads her sky above thee,
Thy path is free from care.

Thine eyes but smile in gladness,
In joy, which gilds the way;
How can'st thou know of sadness
So early in life's day?

Farewell!—but may I meet thee
Again, as thou art now;
And may no sorrows greet thee,
To stain thy jowly brow.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MR. EDITOR,

SIR,—As there has been a Bible-class recently formed in this village, for the purpose of illustrating and explaining the Scriptures; why would it not be well, as there are not far from three thousand Nos. issued from the press weekly, and probably four or five thousand readers, to give publicity to some of the explanations in the Advocate?

The conductors of these meetings, I think, can have no objections to this course, as it will be the means of giving instruction to so great a multitude. We shall endeavour to give the import or substance of some of their explanations, according to our best recollection.

It will be understood that the principal conductor of these meetings, or this "Bible class" (so called) is a clergyman of the Presbyterian order. The meeting is opened and closed by prayer; a chapter is introduced for explanation, commencing at the beginning: each person present, who feels disposed, recites or reads a verse, and gives his or her own explanation. The minister insists that the greatest freedom be observed—that each one give their own explanation according to their own judgment and interpretation of the passage. 'Tis true there are many who attend these meetings, who seem to have no judgment or opinion of their own. They can say Yes, and No, as they have heard others; and when the minister contradicts or differs, they can blush, and appear amazingly mortified; and that is about all.

But we will notice the exposition of the minister, after the reading, and explanation of a verse in St. John's Gospel, 8th chap. 51st verse by a lad about ten or twelve years of age. The boy reads "Verily, verily I say unto you, if a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." Very well, says the minister. What are we to understand by this death?—he shall never see death—He shall not be cast into hell, the boy replies. Very well, says the minister, and why is this the meaning of the death? Is it not because the Saviour could mean no other death? He could not mean natural or temporal death, because they all die this death, whether they keep Christ's saying or not.—Again—He could not mean spiritual death, for all are spiritually dead. The Saviour could not mean that, if any man kept his saying, he should not know what spiritual death was. We all know what spiritual death is,—all mankind die this death; it must, therefore, refer to future punishment." He further continues by reciting the Greek text on the last clause, and giving his own rendering—"He shall not see death forever." He now draws his conclusion from his own rendering, that the death spoken of by the Saviour, unequivocally implied eternal death in a future state. Now here was the why, the wherefore, the argument and the conclusion. This conclusion from this reasoning, undoubtedly appeared to many unavoidable; and a hard text for a Universalist. Some whispering at this time, occasionally turning the eye towards one who was present,—“Ay, that's a hard rub for him; I wonder how he gets along with that?” We are ready to acknowledge and aver, that fair and logical arguments, deduced from just and legitimate premises, is what intelligent Universalists highly approve of; and if such arguments bear against the doctrine they profess, it is to them a matter of great concern. But bare assertions without proof, or even reasons, drawn from false premises, are, in our estimation, harmless things.

We will endeavour to show the fallacy of the minister's reasoning and final decision on the passage under consideration. Suppose then we admit that all mankind are, or have been spiritually dead; does this convey the idea that the transgressor cannot die a spiritual death again, before the dissolution of the body? Could not the saying of the Saviour imply the second death, and that, too, previous to the natural death of the body? Are not some represented in scripture as "twice dead" in this state of being? It will be recollected that the Saviour did not say, as the minister represented, that if a man kept his saying, he should not know what spiritual death was. The Saviour makes no statement respecting a knowledge of death. He says—"If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death;" i. e. he shall not see death, as long or while he continues to keep my saying. The death spoken of, undoubtedly referred to the same death so frequently spoken of throughout the scriptures, in consequence of transgression and alienation from the living God, the life and Saviour of the world; call this death by what name you please. If a person refuses to keep the saying of Christ, he refuses the sayings of wisdom. Solomon says, "Whoso findeth me, i. e. Wisdom, findeth life; but he that sinneth against me, i. e. Wisdom, wrongeth his own soul; all they that hate me, i. e. Wisdom, love death." "To be carnally minded is death." He who refuses to obey the voice of wisdom, loves death rather than life. "The wages of sin is death," saith the apostle, and the "soul that sinneth, it shall die," saith the prophet.

By the death spoken of in these passages, is undoubtedly implied the same that is, in the saying of Christ, "he shall never see death." If eternal death is implied, then the whole human family is involved in eternal death, without the possibility of an escape, or truth must be violated, "for all have sinned," there is no other alternative. To introduce a condition after a penalty is incurred for the purpose of preventing the execution of that penalty, is as absurd, as vain, as foolish, as silly, as it now would be to introduce one to Jesse Strang, for the purpose of preventing or avoiding the execution of that penalty which he has incurred.

We will now examine the text according to the minister's own rendering, "he shall not see death forever;" and see then if we shall be under the necessity of receiving his decision as a dernier and unavoidable conclusion. The reader will bear in mind, that the Saviour had just said, verse 35th, "And the servant abideth not in the house forever, but the son abideth ever." Did the Saviour here mean to imply that the servant abideth not in the house to all eternity, but that the son abideth in the house to all eternity? If not, then the conclusion does not follow irresistibly, that the death spoken of by the Saviour immediately after, in the 51st verse implies a death endless in duration. See also Ex. xxi. 6.—Deut. xv. 17; where the same words for ever are employed in a limited sense. The Saviour then could say, "If a man keep my saying, he shall not see death for ever," without even referring to a future state. Neither would this necessarily exclude the idea of a glorious and endless immortality, when this mortal shall have put on immortality. I forbear to remark further for want of room. In my next communication, I purpose to introduce the explanation and remarks of the minister, brethren and sisters, at their next meeting, on 1st Cor. xv. 22, "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MR. EDITOR,

The following is a copy of a letter handed to the Masonick Lodge in the village of Elbridge, in consequence of the unmasonic conduct of the Managers of the celebration of St. John's, 1827. If you consider it worthy a place in your useful columns you are at liberty to give it publicity accompanied with your remarks.

Worshipful Master, Wardens, and Brethren:

Having a very exalted opinion of the principles of Masonry, and being a member of the fraternity, I have ever felt deeply interested in its progress, believing it is calculated to cultivate the social affections, and render man a blessing to his fellow man. But whenever I discover its members pursuing a course, individually or in their official capacity, which is calculated to wound the feelings of a brother without cause, duty compels me to seek redress.

I entered your Lodge on the day of celebration in the village of Elbridge, and when the Marshal read the Order of the day and the clergy were called, I considered all the preachers of the gospel who were present, embraced in the proclamation. I accordingly took my station as on former occasions, thinking all was well. But, as I had not been introduced to the Orator of the day, and from discovering a coldness, as well as shyness, in the Master, brother WHEELER, I concluded I had not understood the word "Clergy," as I ought; or otherwise the worshipful, with the others composing the committee of arrangement, considered my opinion respecting God's universal benevolence so dangerous, that my presence would disgrace the clergy,* and on inquiry, I received an answer from brother Wheeler, that he had been consulted on the subject, and thought it best for me to take a station somewhere else. But as no place had been allotted me, I felt a delicacy, and durst not thrust a brother out of his rank, or become an humble suppliant, that I might obtain liberty as an out-cast, to disgrace the ranks of my brethren whom I considered on a LEVEL, even with Clerical dignity! Thus situated, I concluded my wisest step would be to leave the procession, and not give offence to any. I was soon asked why I did not appear in my station? Mortified at such an interrogation, and too proud to acknowledge that I was not worthy to be associated with the clergy; I therefore waived the subject, and evaded a direct answer until I could address you on the subject; which liberty I now take.

Brethren: To use the language of the Orator of the day, I am not faulting the principles of Masonry in this appeal to your body; neither would I implicate the whole Lodge; for I am too well acquainted with many of its members, and they are among my warmest friends. But I do most justly and dispassionately, enter my protest against the management on that day. I reprobate that narrow, contracted spirit, that is opposed to every tender sympathy of human nature; and, while it makes those petty disturbances in our own order, it is calculated at this juncture, when publick feelings are much agitated, to render us, as Masons, despicable in the eyes of the world. And if brethren are determined to swerve from the principles they profess, so far as my character as a preacher, and a Mason, is impeached, and I am insulted, it shall not be done with impunity; and while I thus vindicate my own character, if I have trespassed against a brother, I feel disposed to ask forgiveness. If you consider this subject worthy your notice in the Lodge; and think perfect justice has been done me, then I cannot expect any acknowledgement of wrong from the brethren concerned in the transaction. If you consider the communication unworthy your notice, I shall take the liberty to publish it to the world.

ISAAC WHITNALL, R. A.

P. S. As I have received no communication from the Lodge to which this was addressed, I would inform those concerned, that if they consider I have done any injustice to them, or the principles of Masonry, in my communication, they can have the privilege of communicating their complaint to the world, thro' the same medium in which this appears, by addressing their communication to the Editor of the Gospel Advocate, and Impartial Investigator, Auburn. I. W.

REMARKS ON THE FOREGOING.

However much we may deprecate the evil conduct of those who had the management of the above affair; and however sincerely we may sympathize with our worthy brother whose feelings have been outraged in so flagrant a manner; it is nevertheless with some reluctance that we give the above article a place in our columns. This reluctance, however, does not arise from any disposition on our part to screen the offenders from the contempt they so justly merit; but from the consideration that there are already charges enough laid at the door of masonry, without adding to the number an evil deed so flagrant in its nature, and so ruinous in its effects upon the institution.

While our country, from Georgia to Maine, resonates with the details of a transaction, unparalleled in the annals of crime—while the charge of blood and deliberate murder is urged against the institution of masonry, as a reason why it should be discountenanced and despised, we should think the fraternity might at least abstain from that partiality, and that cruelty, which they profess to abhor. But, strange as it may and will appear, the spirit of desolation and ruin seems to have taken up its residence within the sanctum sanctorum of the order. It is not enough that the laws of our country have been violated in a strange and mysterious manner—the institution must be branded with a violation of the only principle which can sustain it!

While masonry recognizes no sectarian principles—while it professes the virtue of heavenly equality; the petty dogmas of a sect, whose founder was a murderer, entitle “the orator of the day” to the partial favour of the “committee of arrangements,” and subject a faithful brother, to the most unfeeling abuse, because, forsooth, he is an universalist! Is this masonry? Is this equality? Have “kings and potentates” set us such examples? And are masons bound to imitate them? If so,—if this be masonry, may a righteous God and an enlightened community consign it to everlasting oblivion.

But the above is not all. It was not enough that the officers of the day, and their orator, should thus abuse an unoffending brother; but they must, when he complains of the outrage, remain silent, and thus add abuse to the insult already committed. In behalf of the respected brother thus wantonly insulted, we ask restitution—we demand it. And if, as we suspect, the whole originated with the bigotted “orator of the day”—we claim his exposure. And while we offer the use of our columns to the parties concerned, we promise them, that justice shall be done to all. The publick shall be the tribunal before whom this case shall be determined, and to the publick we most solemnly appeal.

EDITOR.

OUTRAGEOUS IMPOSITION.

The truth of the following statements is attested by a gentleman of the first respectability, whose name is left with the editor of this paper, and will be surrendered if necessary. The fact appears to be this;—the priests and their satellites are bent on their own destruction; and the real friends of christianity have reason to fear that the limitarians will destroy all confidence in religion of any kind. TWELVE HUNDRED families in the county of Wayne, are represented, by these money-loving priests and their simple adherents as being destitute of a Bible!! What an infamous falsehood! We should think these Bible-Society-folks would do well to read a certain book, which says somewhere—“Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.”

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

“O, beautiful Truth, must thy fair form be sullied by Error’s breath?”

It has been publicly proclaimed by the runners and advocates for the bible societies in this part of the country, that in the county of Wayne, there were no less than 1200 families destitute of a bible. Your correspondent, in common with his fellow-citizens of Wayne county, feels somewhat indignant, that a report so destitute of truth, and so degrading to the character of the people of this county, should be put into circulation to slander us; and the writer, since said statement has been made, has taken some pains to ascertain whether there really are 1200 families in this county, who are in the wretched situation above alluded to. As yet, I have not been able to hear of a single family of white people, who are able to read, that are without a copy of the holy scriptures. Nor do I believe there are 25 families in the county who are without that good book. To those who have related such things of us, I would, (if they are not included in the 1200 destitute families and have no bible,) refer them, when they have any leisure time, to Proverbs, xii. chapter 22d verse, (together with many other passages which speak against slander and falsehood,) "Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord, but they that deal truly are his delight."

The above is enough to convince any rational, unprejudiced mind, that not the least reliance can be placed in the truth of what these "Bible Society, Missionary Society, Tract Society, and rag-bag Society" people are preaching to the world. The truth is, they have great trouble about the welfare of people's souls, but care but little about their bodies. The MONEY is what they are after; and there is nothing too exalted to be trampled on—nothing too sacred to be violated, if they can only built up their own order and thereby enrich a lazy priesthood.

A HATER OF LIES.

Palmyra, Aug. 23d, 1827.

Since receiving the above, we have noticed the following in the Palmyra Sentinel.

TO THE PUBLICK.

WHEREAS, certain individuals are perambulating this community, asking donations in money, for the purpose of purchasing Bibles to be distributed among families that are destitute of a copy, and not able to procure one: And whereas it is stated as an inducement to donations for this purpose, that there are twelve hundred families in "this very county," who are destitute of a bible—believing that it is the duty of every man, who is, in sincerity and truth, (according to the gospel meaning of the term,) "a christian" to use his utmost endeavors to refute calumny, to dispel error, and disseminate the important and salutary truths of religion, to the utmost of his ability—I hereby publicly pledge myself to furnish, on application, at my own cost, and free of any subscription or donation funds, every head of a family, in the town of Palmyra, destitute, and not able to procure it, with a copy of the Bible, well printed and substantially bound.

TRUMAN HEMINWAY.

Palmyra, August 9, 1827.

P. S. It is now near a month, since Mr. Heminway thus publicly offered to supply the destitute in Palmyra with bibles at his own expense; and we are credibly informed that he has not yet had a call for one!! O Tempora! O Mores!

The following notes from Mr. Badger, it is supposed, are designed to advertise the reader of his intention to reply to the letters of br. W. I. Reese, which have heretofore appeared in our columns. We are glad to hear of his determination to do so; and hope that much good will result from the controversy. There are some things, however, in the following notices, which seem to indicate a little acrimony; we allude to the "fists" (If as our devil would call them.)—We hope some other weapons will be used by our respected correspondent; for our readers are fond of argument. And, by the by, the antagonist of Mr. Badger has too much "pluck," if we may borrow the word, to be refuted with such displays of manual strength. We hope all parleying will cease, and the parties come to issue as soon as leisure will admit.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MR. BADGER'S NOTE TO MR. REESE.

SIR:—I have just reached my residence from Niagara county, where the "New York Western Christian Conference" held its annual session, and am now preparing for the "United States annual Conference," which is to commence next week at West-Bloomfield in which I am deeply interested.

Your letters ☐ SHALL be attended to in JUSTICE and MERCY as soon as leisure will admit.

Respectfully yours,
J. BADGER.

MR. W. I. REESE.

West-Mendon, Sept. 1, 1827.

MR. BADGER'S NOTE TO MR. ABBOT.

SIR:—I thank you for the respectful manner in which you have spoken of me in your letter to the editor of the Advocate; you have done me much honour. I assure you, sir, I have no disposition to cavil about the premises, for no man in the world would be more happy than myself to meet an opponent before the same congregation, on the subject—but this I shall never have the pleasure of; unless I can find a person of greater POWERS and PLUCK than my good neighbour R—possesses: But as the business has, and continues to shape, it is my duty before I lay my foundation, FIRST TO REMOVE THE ☐ RUBBISH.

Respectfully yours, J. BADGER.

MR. F. ABBOT.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

VIRTUE is a qualification none but the pure in heart can possess. The foundation must be permanent or the fabric will easily be shaken. The mind must be engaged in her service and in love with her amiableness; or the mask will eventually fall from the wearer, unveiling those disagreeable qualities, still more exaggerated, as the artificial bloom of beauty will leave the countenance more wan and ghastly.

Her real votaries are not so often found in the gay circle where vanity reigns and pleasure succeeds pleasure; where the refinements of taste are exercised only in the external accomplishments, the passions unrestrained, and the mind uncultivated; but in the middle stations of life, unexposed to the many temptations of the affluent, the mind does not become satiated with the fruitless anticipation of new pleasures; but left free to contemplate noble objects, and to search into deep subjects.

It is in retirement that virtue, as a celestial plant, desires to grow, 'tis there her budding beauties unfold, and delicious fruit is tasted. Nourished by the skilful hand of nature she becomes a stately plant; not storms or tempest, can move one so deeply rooted. It is there she receives lessons the multitude cannot teach; in understanding the movings of her own mind, she learns "to possess her soul in patience."

When called to appear in the social circle, in the capacity of wife, friend, or mother, she is cheerful, yet unassuming; her countenance expressive of that degree of serenity and pleasure, that queens might envy, arising from a consciousness of having done all things as conscience dictated. She imparts a pleasing sympathy on all around. Her attractive influences cannot be repelled by the licentious; they by her engaging manners are constrained to acknowledge her worth. When conversing with the bigotted or contentious, she will gently waive the point, referring to that period when all will see alike, "when the watchmen shall see eye to eye." Wisdom by her is justified, prudence exercised, discretion matured, and beauty perfected. She "will shrink as the sensitive plant" from the bustle and parade of the vain glorious. Prompted only by motives of sincerity and candour she would contribute to the welfare of mankind, ever willing to give her advice to the unreflecting, or lend the assisting hand to friendship in danger, or humanity in distress. How faithful is she, in admonishing her female charge, ever reminding them of the danger of falling—or forsaking her pleasant paths—falling no more to rise—a "withered, a blighted" object of compassion. Are these thy excellencies O Virtue!—may you ever find faithful followers who prostrate themselves before thee thy real worshippers.

"EARNESTLY CONTEND FOR THE FAITH."

CHENANGO ASSOCIATION.

This association of believers in the Abrahamick faith convened at the Universalist meeting house in Brooklyn, Pa. on the 29th ultimo. The meeting was large and highly respectable. Eleven ministers were present on the joyful occasion; and peace, and love, and harmony prevailed. The minutes and circular letter will appear in our columns in due time.

The intelligence received from the societies belonging to the association was calculated to excite the gratitude of the friends of Zion, and give birth to the most gladsome hopes of future prosperity. Soon after the council was organized, a letter from the society at Brooklyn was read, which gave a cheering welcome to the visiting brethren, and evinced a very friendly desire on the part of the brethren of that place to render the occasion an happy one. After stating the necessary particulars relative to the prosperity of the cause in that place, the letter informed us of a circumstance which cast a gloom over the council, and doubtless elicited a prayer from every heart that Heaven might avert the impending calamity. The fact to which we allude is expressed in the following extract.—"The cup of human felicity is frequently mixed with alloy, and while recounting to you the blessings that have been showered upon us here, we cannot forbear to mention to you, that an all-wise Providence has seen fit to deeply afflict us amidst our prosperity. Our beloved brother, Cha's G. Marsh, who has been labouring with us in the ministry with a zeal and devotedness worthy of his Master's cause, is now almost confined by lingering disease and bodily infirmities. The severe indisposition under which he now labours we fear will prevent his attendance on the Council and at the meetings;—the pleasure of which his ardent soul has long anticipated with the fondest delight." The letter continues—

"The sickness of Br. Marsh is a calamity severely felt by our society, and by the surrounding sections of our country;—and every benevolent heart truly and sincerely petitions the Almighty Disposer of events, to restore him to health and usefulness if consistent with his divine will." It may not be amiss to remark, that Br. M. has been eminently useful in his labours both in preaching and as the editor of the "Candid Examiner" which has been discontinued in consequence of his ill health. Contrary to the expectations of his friends, however, he was able to attend the afternoon services of Wednesday, and took part in the deliberations of the Council. Brs. James Smith and Amos Bailey were the delegates from that society.

The second Universalist society of Oxford, through their delegate, Br. T. Mackam, petitioned for and received the fellowship of the association. This society has flourished under the preaching of Br. Shannon, and we pray God it may continue to be watered with the dew of divine grace.

The society at Mt. Pleasant, Wayne co. Pa. was represented in council by their delegates, Brs. T. Wheeler, and J. Stearns, through whom, they also requested the fellowship of the association, and received the same. This society has been favoured with a few discourses from Br. Crandall, (now no more) occasional discourses by Br. Marsh, and recently have been privileged with the eminently useful labours of Br. Ferris. They desire help from our ministering brethren, and would rejoice to hear the dispensation of the good word of God.

"The first Restitutionist Church and Society of the town of McDonough," received the fellowship of the association. The condition of the cause in that region is said to be flattering. Truly, the wilderness blossoms like the rose. This society was represented by their delegates, Brs. Goddard and G. W. Stockwell. Br. Shannon has also laboured with them in word and doctrine.

The society in Smithville, Pa. was represented by their delegate, Br. Silas Genson. Truth progresses in that region with a firm and steady step, and error recedes before its all conquering march.

We cannot give a better account of the cause in Sesh-equin and that vicinity, than is expressed in the letter of the society at that place. We extract the following: "We all remain steadfast in that hope which is as an anchor to the soul, and although we have had but occasional opportunities of hearing the word, for the year past, yet there has been no diminution of faith or numbers; and we are zealously engaged in erecting a building for public worship, and confidently hope to bring about its completion in the course of another year."—Thus we witness the spread of truth, and cannot be too thankful that our brethren are alive to the interests of Zion. Brs. Ebenezer Shaw, and Jabez Fish were the delegates from that society.

Brs. Solomon Waite and Stephen Ballou (brother to the venerable Hosea Ballou) represented the society at Preston and McDonough. The cause triumphs in that region. The same remark applies to the society at Walton, N. Y. which was represented by Brs. S. Ellis and S. Ellis 3rd; and also to the society at Pitcher, N. Y.

The society at Harford, was represented by Brs. F. Peck, and J. K. Adams. It is small in numbers, but, we trust, growing in grace and spiritual strength.

We have thus given a brief sketch of the condition of our cause within the limits of the association, thinking it would be agreeable to our readers. Circumstances beyond our controul prevented us from staying to partake of the spiritual bounties of the Lord's House on the second day of the meeting. The society at Brooklyn, where the association convened, have erected and completely finished a neat and convenient house for public worship, in which the multitude assembled to listen to the good tidings of great joy. There we beheld the hoary heads of our fathers in Israel—there we saw the middle aged and the young, with cheerful countenances, and hearts apparently filled with love divine;—and there, too, we saw the messengers of peace, with the rich and consoling words of life and salvation dropping from their lips.

We left the happy place on the morning of Wednesday, to "wend our way" over the hills and the vallies. And if the unhappy wife of Lot had as strong temptation to look back, as we had to return to the place of pillar of salt! Like clouds, and like doves to their windows, the intelligent inhabitants of that vicinity were seen repairing with joyful haste to partake of the delightful exercises of the occasion, and the heart must be cold indeed that could witness their zeal without feeling a strong inclination to be with them, both in body and spirit. May propitious heaven ordain that good may grow out of this season of rejoicing, and that every soul concerned may be abundantly blessed in the consequences resulting from such convocations.

FROM THE UNIVERSALIST MAGAZINE.

FALSE TEACHERS.

2. Another thing which distinguished false teachers in apostolick days was, they brought into the church damnable heresies, or heresies of destruction, as the original expression is more properly rendered. See 2 Peter ii. 1.—What heresies can be more destructive than the doctrines which are preached by those men who profess to be the peculiar servants of God? They have destroyed the peace, the union, the sympathy, and the lives of mankind. The peace of mankind has been destroyed by these heresies. How many have been driven to despair by the expectation of being sent to an eternal hell, or by the fear that some dear connexion has already gone there. The union of mankind has been destroyed by the same means. Families have been broken up, husbands and wives, parents and children have been separated, by means of these heresies. Sympathy has been destroyed, and the sources of human compassion have been dried up. Those who were once united by every tie of nature, have been by these heresies, so far changed to what they call godlike feeling, as to anticipate with composure, if not with joy, the eternal misery of one another. How completely in such hearts is sympathy annihilated! The same doctrines have destroyed the lives of many. We will not go back to inquire how many martyrs have been dragged to the stake by men moved by the influence of such doctrines, we will look at the present effect. We have known mothers to murder their children, and men, women, and children to commit suicide, in consequence of believing these doctrines. Despair, produced by fear of the eternal wrath of God, has been the fruitful cause of such effects. Now doctrines which destroy the peace, union, sympathies and lives of mankind, may justly be called heresies of destruction. They bring on those who believe them, "swift destruction."

3. False teachers of old denied "the Lord that bought them." See 2 Peter ii. 1. Jude, verse 4. Wicked and false as they were, the Lord Jesus had bought them; but they denied him. Not that they actually and openly disowned; for they were not honest enough to do that; but they denied his attributes and glory. There are teachers now who deny "the Lord that bought them." Although we are informed explicitly in the word of God that he gave himself a ransom for all, they deny that he bought all mankind. In denying that he "will have all men to be saved," they deny either his power or goodness. If they say he can save all men, but will not, they deny his goodness; and if they say he would, but cannot, they deny his power. This is, in one sense, "denying the Lord that bought them."

4. The false teachers of old spoke "great swelling words of vanity," 2 Peter ii. 18. Jude, verse 16. Their object undoubtedly was to appear like learned and great men. What they lost on the score of honesty, they were determined to add to that of learning. There are such teachers now. Vain in themselves, they are desirous of exciting the wonder of men at their qualifications. Hence we hear them use language unintelligible to the common people. To preach a true discourse is a secondary object compared to preaching a learned and elegant one. Jesus came into the world "to bear witness unto the truth." Paul says, "my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and of power." "In the church," he says again, "I had rather speak five words with my understanding, than by my voice I might teach others, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue." Here then is an essential difference between true and false teachers,—the object of the one is to communicate truth, of the other to obtain the praise of men with "great swelling words of vanity."

5. False teachers utter "hard speeches" against the Lord. Jude says, verses 14, 15, "Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgement upon all; and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds, which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." What class of men now utter hard speeches against the Lord? Ans. False teachers. Some men deny that God is "our Father;" they deny that he loves us; they deny that he has taken as much care of our future everlasting welfare, as of our temporal happiness; and they assert that he has ordained that a part of his creatures shall be in indelible misery forever, merely for his own honour and glory. Is not this uttering hard speeches against the Lord? Suppose the clergy should say with respect to our beloved Washington, that he was not the Father of the American people; that he did not love them; that he neglected their greatest and most important interests, and that, merely to gratify his own caprice, he had thrust a part of the people from his favour and regard, would not every honest man say they had defamed? Would not such speeches be considered hard? I can conceive of nothing which, if true, would cast more dishonour upon the character of God, than the creed of Calvin, and its kindred doctrines. Reader, when you hear a minister utter hard speeches against the Lord, recollect, you therein have one mark of a false teacher.

6. False teachers make merchandise of men. See 1 Peter ii. 3. This is the sure mark of a false teacher; and the object of the trade is his own emolument. The market is now principally removed to heathen lands, where the trade is briskly carried on.—The prices are generally set upon souls by the clergy, who regulate them, not as we do the prices of other articles by their value, but by the wants and exigencies of the trader. I have known immortal souls to sell for a dollar a piece, which is less than we generally buy sheep and calves. The reason that this subject is introduced, kind reader, is to show you that one part of the business of a false teacher is to "make merchandise" of men.

7. False teachers of old made use of "feigned words." Peter says, "and through covetousness shall they with feigned words made merchandise of you," 2 Peter ii. 3. They did not make merchandise of men with truth.—The words and stories they made use of for that purpose were false; and they knew they were false, for they themselves invented them. How quickly this brings to mind, not only the legends and pious frauds of the Romish Church, but the pious frauds also of the present age. How many such have been published in tracts and circulated among the rising generation. Stories concerning the renunciation of Universalism by a person in the agonies of death, concerning the death of one styled an infidel, and concerning a dying parent's advice, have been published in tracts, when we have had good reason to believe they were forged. These stories, feigned words, appear without names, places, or dates, one very strong circumstance against them. The authors of such accounts have been called upon to give the persons, and the times and places where the events transpired; but, in general, by a determined silence, they have shown that it is safer to invent the accounts alone, than to invent dates, names, &c. to accompany them. In some few instances however, where there was the most apparent detection, the falsehood has been acknowledged. The Baptists in North Carolina, after having made a full experiment of all this deception, have come out and exposed it fully to the publick. A false teacher uses feigned words.

8. Another prominent feature in the character of the false teachers is this—they "speak evil of things they understand not." See 2 Peter ii. 12. Jude, verse 10. We have good reason to suppose this was a habit with them, as both Peter and Jude mention it. If such a habit was a mask of a false teacher in the days of the apostles, it is so now. And who are those who now speak evil of the things they understand not? Do those people who are continually speaking against the doctrine of Universal Grace and Salvation, understand it? Have they heard it preached? Have they read the writings of those who have defended it? Have they conversed on the subject with those who believe it? To all these questions we must return a negative answer. Or if in one or two instances they have done these things, was it not rather for the sake of finding fault, than for gaining information what the sentiment was? To what cause are the publick faults to be assigned? Not to the natural inclination of the human mind, for that seeks knowledge; but to the exertions of false teachers to keep the people in darkness. We must attribute it to the clergy that people have obtained the habit of speaking evil of things they do not understand; and such of the clergy as have sanctioned and prompted the practice, have given the world, to say the least, one proof that they are false teachers.

He who takes my purse—steals—!!!
But suppose he don't take it?

We regret (but are constrained) to say, that the pitiable story of the robbery of a Mr. Avery of Vermont, is probably a sheer fabrication. That he had about $3000 when in Hartford, there is no doubt—but instead of surrendering it in Stafford woods, it is pretty evident from all that appears, that when he started for Vermont on Monday succeeding the robbery he took it with him.

He never manifested any anxiety about his money after he declared himself to have been robbed, and it was with much reluctance that he consented to go with his friends in pursuit, and when he did go, it was on condition that he was to come immediately back in order to go home; and after starting for home at 11 o'clock on Monday, he rode to Pittsfield, a distance of 65 miles, before he stopped for the night. The string with which his hands were tied has been examined, and it is ascertained that he could have secured himself to the tree, and afterwards fastened his hands without the least difficulty, and as we before intimated, there is every reason to believe that the man was his own robber.

Such offences are unfortunate for the community, as well as destructive to the man by whom they come. Honest men will by and by refuse to be the bearers of valuable packages, for fear in case of loss or robbery of being suspected.

If Mr Avery be what we suspect him, we hope the Vermont Yankees will know it, and deal with him according to his deserts.

MARRIED.

At Scipio, on Wednesday last, by the editor of this paper, Mr. SOLOMON C. DUNNING of this village, to Miss ELECTA HIBBARD of the former place.

THE VOLCANO.

Behold yon misty mountain high,
Round which the gathering tempests fly,
And everlasting snows abide:
Tho' tempests thunder round its head,
Around its base the harvests spread,
And cattle feed, and rivers glide.

All is eclipsed! a sudden night,
Blots from my eyes the goodly sight;
Ah, what portends this uproar wild?
Volumes of suffocating smoke,
Have from the tumbling summit broke,
And all the lovely scene defiled.

Aghast all living creatures stand!
While earth-born thunders shake the land;
And flames of flashing fire ascend:
Tremendous bellowings loud and dread,
Burst from the tottering mountain's head,
And broken burning rocks descend.

Oh, what new horrors wait the plain,
Rivers of fire pour down amain;
The natives fly in wild amaze:
The crackling forests fire, and fall,
Utter destruction threatens all,
Rivers dry up, and cities blaze!

Great God of Nature and of Man,
What Being can thy wisdom scan,
Who imitate or comprehend?
All Matter governed by thy laws
The first, the wonder-working cause,
To thee our hopes and prayers ascend.

A mountain now, and now a world
May from its pristine form be hurled,
And systems roll and disappear;
Time and the Universe to thee,
Are but vain shadows as they flee,
Thine is the everlasting year.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATION.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

Agreeable to promise in my last communication, I now proceed to give the readers of the Advocate, the orthodox explanation, at the Bible Class Meeting, of 1st Cor. xv. 22—"For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." After the introduction and reading of the verse by the minister, he asks, "what are we to understand by this passage: 'As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive?' Does the term all, in this verse, signify all men, or a part?" The question is first put to the females, again and again without a reply. It is then introduced to the males: "does the term all signify all, or a part?" The question is repeated without an answer. At last a young man replies, "It means all." "Very well," says the minister. "that's correct; it signifies all men: what are we to understand by all men's dying in Adam, and being made alive in Christ?" "It means that as Christ rose from the dead; so all men must rise." "Very well," says the minister; "then the death signifies natural, temporal death, does it not?" "Yes sir."—"And a literal resurrection of all men from the dead?" "Yes sir." "We learn this from the preceding verses, do we not?" The minister then reads a few verses: "But if there be no resurrection from the dead, then is not Christ risen, &c." The general conclusion then is, that as all men die a natural death, so all men will be literally raised from the dead. The minister then says, "this is all we are to learn from the passage. It does not intimate the salvation of all men." The minister inquires further—"and when are all to be made alive?" "At the resurrection says one;"—"At the Day of Judgment," says a LAWYER.

An Universalist who was present, was asked by the minister, if he would give his explanation of the verse. But he, not wishing to enter into a controversy, declined, observing only that he thought it was connected with the rest of the chapter. The verse was then dismissed. What had now been said, was supposed to be a clear elucidation of the Apostle's reasoning recorded in this chapter. There were, however, a few remarks made by the minister, on the 25th verse, which I had almost forgotten to notice, which is the glory and theme of orthodoxy, i. e. according to their interpretation of the verse:—"For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet." The minister here remarked (in substance) that the Apostle in this verse alluded to the eastern or ancient mode of placing the feet upon the neck, which denoted the greatest possible shame—the lowest degradation to those upon whose necks the feet of their superiors were put or stamped upon. That Christ at the resurrection or day of judgment, would, in the same manner, put all his enemies, i. e. devils and wicked men, under his feet, which would reduce them to the greatest possible shame, the finally impenitent—those who should be found on the left hand, that should come forth to shame and everlasting contempt. The question was then asked, if by putting things under the feet of Christ denoted the greatest possible shame to men? Then are not all men included, and reduced to the greatest possible shame? For the Apostle makes no exception but that of the Father. The minister replies: "This would not follow. The Apostle says, he (Christ) must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet. 'Tis his enemies who are put to the greatest possible shame. Does it necessarily follow that Christians will be put to this shame, because Christ's enemies are? By no means." This was the substance of the minister's reply. Now the reader will notice that the minister has added the word his to make his doctrine go smooth. He must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet. According to the minister's faith, Christ must have his enemies after all are subdued unto him, and made alive in him; and these enemies must be men, though the next verse says, the last enemy is death, and that shall be destroyed. O could the Apostle have been present on this occasion, the authour of this chapter; how would he have reproved the authours of this misinterpretation of his language! Would he not have thus interrogated them?—"Did I not include all men as the subjects of the resurrection? and did I not maintain that it would be a glorious one? Did I contemplate any particular set of men? if so, where is the language? Where does the limitation begin? Did I not describe the characters of all men previous to the resurrection, by adverting to Adam the first federal head and representative of the whole human family? and did I make any distinction in the human family in that character? Did I not maintain that it was sown in corruption, in dishonour, in weakness, a natural body? that it was of the earth, earthly and corruptible? Did I not also describe the character of all men in, or after the resurrection, by adverting to Christ the second federal head and representative of the whole human family? and did I make any distinction in the human family in that character? Did I not maintain that it was raised in incorruption, in glory, in power, a spiritual body? that it was of heaven, heavenly? that as we had borne the image of the earthly, we should also bear the image of the heavenly? that our first body which was of the earth earthly or flesh and blood, could not inherit the kingdom of God? that corruption doth not inherit incorruption? Did I not contradict your interpretation, that the death, in consequence of the lapse of Adam, was temporal merely, by asserting that we should not all sleep? and have ye not read of Enoch, and others who were translated, and did not see temporal or natural death? Did I not tell you that the sting of death was sin? that the strength of sin was the law? Did not I refer thee to the prophecy of Isaiah? that the saying there written, "Death is swallowed up, in victory," would now be brought to pass? have ye ever there noticed its adjuncts, "and he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations. HE WILL SWALLOW UP DEATH IN VICTORY; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it?" And did not I also assert that when all things shall be subdued unto him, (Christ), that then the Son would deliver up his kingdom to God, be subject to him, and God be all in all? How is it then that ye have so construed my letter as to make an eternal separation in the human family? Ye have not only handled my word deceitfully, but ye have dishonoured God our Father, by ascribing to him an attribute of infinite partiality. Have ye not my epistles to the different churches? Do ye not know that I have uniformly maintained the doctrine of the restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy Prophets since the world began? Have ye not read my letter to the Church of Rome, 5th chapter, where I have there also adverted to the two representatives of the human family, Adam and Christ, to prove the universality of the condemnation and salvation? and do you not know that in my letter to the Church of Ephesus, I stated that it was the purpose of God to gather together in one (or rehead) all things in Christ? and in my letter to the Church of Colosse, did I not state that for this purpose peace was made through the blood of the cross to reconcile all things unto God? See also my letter to the Church at Philippi, chapter ii. 10; also 1st Timothy 2d from 1st to 6th chapter, iv. 10; Heb. 2d, ix, 14, 15." But I must close. I purpose however, to notice in another communication a little more orthodox ingenuity in the explanation of scripture.

CONSEQUENCES OF REVIVALS.

"To some of the consequences of a revival conducted under such auspices as I have described, I beg leave to call your attention.— It will become more and more exceptionable. Urged by circumstances, men will do things, which, if in the beginning had been predicted, they would have said, 'Are thy servants dogs, that they should do these things?' By degrees, however, all landmarks will be set at naught; and what would have produced horror will be done fearlessly. There is nothing to which the minds of good men, when once passed the bounds of sound discretion and launched into the ocean of feeling and experiment, may not come to. But the evil which may flow from those who commence these aberrations, is but a drop of the bucket in the ocean of disorder and misrule, to which they may open the door. There is nothing so terrible and unmanageable as the fire and whirlwind of human passion, when once ignited by misguided zeal, and sanctioned by conscience; and the idea of being reviled and persecuted for doing God service. Like the cave of Eolus, or the gate of Pandemonium, a single arm may suffice to let out the storm; but when once the atmosphere is put in motion, no human power can stop it until it has exhausted its fury in works of moral desolation. They who did the deed may repent of it early, and stretch out impotent hands to stay the evil, and weep over the desolation without being able to repair it.

"The peculiarities of the system I have recognized, cannot go through the churches without opposition. Splendid by its early power, many have yielded to it who disapproved, for fear they might quench the Spirit. And many have been silent because they feared they might speak against the work of God.— But when the work shall have given out its distinct character, and put off the features of love and gentleness, &c. and put on those of wrath and strife; when other reformers shall hasten on to new discoveries, and surpass their predecessors as much as these surpassed others, and denounce them, as they denounced those who would not go with them; when stripling imitators of pious men, having nothing in common with them but their imprudence, without their age and moral power, shall go out to outrage humanity and caricature revivals of religion; then will these irregularities be met, and the collision will be keen and dreadful. For in every church there is wood, hay and stubble, which will be sure to take fire on the wrong side. All your periodical Christians, who sleep from one revival to another, will be sure to blaze out now; while judicious ministers, and the more judicious part of the church will be destined to stand like the bush in the midst of the flames. While these periodical Christians will make up by present zeal for their past stupidity, and chide as cold hearted formalists, those whose even, luminous course shed reproof on their past coldness and stupidity; the converts too will catch the same spirit, and go forth to chatechise aged Christians. And then shall come to pass that which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet as the destruction of human society and the consummation of divine wrath upon man: "When children shall be princes in the church, babes shall rule over her, and the child shall behave proudly against the ancient, and the base against the honourable."

"Another evil to be feared is, that it will unavoidably array a large portion of the unrenewed part of the community against revivals and religion, and produce infidels, scoffers, unitarians, and universalists on every side; increasing the resistance seven fold to evangelical doctrine, withdrawing in proportion the voluntary support of the gospel, and consigning the precious cause of Christ, which ought and might govern public opinion, to the hands of a feeble, despised, and dispirited few, who watch the holy fire upon the deserted altar of God. All forms of error will grow rank from the aliment of such violence done to the laws of humanity and to the laws of God. The extravagances of the pious in the time of Cromwell, threw back the cause of vital piety in England for two centuries, to a state of imbecility and scorn: and have furnished topicks to grace the pages of infidel historians, poets, and orators, through every succeeding generation."

AN OBSERVER IN THE WEST.

REMARKS ON THE FOREGOING.

The above "remarkable extract" we find in "the Gospel Messenger" of the first instant; and conclude it accords with the views of the respected editor of that paper. We are quite happy to learn that enlightened "divines"—and living ones too, are beginning to see the folly—not to say worse—of what are called "revivals." In general we agree with the authour of the "remarkable extract," and cheerfully give it an insertion; but there is one sentiment advanced, which appears to be incorrect. We allude to the following sentence:

"Another evil to be feared is, that it will unavoidably array a large portion of the unconverted part of community against revivals and religion, and produce infidels, scoffers, unitarians, and universalists on every side; increasing the resistance seven fold to evangelical doctrine, withdrawing in proportion the voluntary support of the gospel, and consigning the precious cause of Christ, which ought and might govern public opinion, to the hands of a feeble, despised, and dispirited few," &c.

We desire the reader to notice the following facts: First;—that the writer of the article we are examining, ranks unitarians and universalists, without discrimination or any exception, with "infidels and scoffers." Secondly;—that both are considered among the unconverted, or "unrenewed part of the community;" and Thirdly;—that the fanatical excitements of the day are calculated to increase the number of such unrenewed persons, and excite seven fold the resistance to "evangelical doctrine."

Now, for one, we care not a fig for what "the church" thinks about unitarians and universalists,—we have long since been led to deny her infallibility and distrust the purity of her ancestry; but we feel somewhat inclined to compare her pretensions with facts. Our neighbours of "the church" have pretended to much liberality and even friendship towards the universalists; and we venture to say that instances of the kind have been known in which universalists, unrenewed as they are represented to be, have been solicited to unite with "the church"—and have been received, while they (the church) knew the fact that those received were firm believers in the full and universal salvation of all men: Shall we charge them then, with receiving into their communion "unrenewed" universalists?—Again:—By what authority are we indiscriminately pronounced unrenewed? By turning to another page of the "Gospel Messenger," we find it maintained that the sanctifying ordinance of baptism is the procuring cause of regeneration.—The fact to which we allude is thus expressed: "She [the church] considers regeneration, as that change of spiritual state or condition, which takes place in baptism; but Renovation as a change of heart and life by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit." Now the writer of these remarks, has received the ordinance of Baptism from the hands of "the church," and his good old god mother is yet living to attest the fact. If, therefore, Regeneration takes place in baptism, why may we not claim the privilege of having been regenerated to all intents and purposes?

Secondly;—By what authority are we ranked with infidels and scoffers? Infidels are those who reject the divine testimony and deny the Son of God.—Are our opponents prepared to show that we are guilty of either? Do not universalists believe the Bible, and honour the Son of God in a very peculiar manner, by maintaining that he will save from sin and misery all created intelligences? Why then are we denominated scoffers, or identified with infidels? Or what right have our charitable brethren, the Episcopalians, to consider us all unconverted and unregenerated?

Thirdly;—It is said by the authour of the "remarkable extract," that the "revivals," as they are conducted, are calculated to produce "infidels, scoffers, unitarians, and universalists on every side;" and we desire to know whether "this distinguished living divine of the Presbyterian church," is of the opinion that the number of the "elect" will be increased or diminished by any such means. Say, ye sticklers for the infallibility of orthodoxy, are we to conclude that ye have relinquished your darling tenet of "election and reprobation," and that salvation now rests upon contingencies? Do ye yet maintain the "final perseverance of the Saints?"—and will your "peripdical Christians" finally attain to "everlasting glory?" We are afraid of being excited by your inconsistency to resist seven fold stronger than heretofore what you call "evangelical doctrine!" We fear your contradictory declarations will bring to the gates of destruction the religion of Jesus, and cause Christianity to be reviled indeed!

But we beg leave to correct a mistake under which our "living divine" seems to labour. It is not the fanatical proceedings of your Finneys, and your Bee-mans, and your Nettletons alone, that makes universalists and unitarians increase;—it is, on the contrary, the blasphemous pretensions of the managers of the farce—the more subtle, and cautious measures of your doctors, gentlemen, that have produced an opposition which has endangered your craft, and will result in its prostration.

RELIGIOUS RULERS OF CHURCH AND STATE.

The following extracts are from a Discourse, entitled, "The duty of Christian Freemen to elect Christian Rulers;" delivered on the 4th of July, 1827, in the Seventh Presbyterian Church, in Philadelphia: by Ezra Stiles Ely, D. D.

"Let it be distinctly stated and fearlessly maintained in the first place, that every member of this christian nation, from the highest to the lowest, ought to serve the Lord with fear, and yield his sincere homage to the Son of God. Every ruler should be an avowed, and a sincere friend of Christianity. He should know and believe the doctrines of our holy religion, and act in conformity with its precepts. This he ought to do; because as a man he is required to serve the Lord; and as a publick ruler he is called upon by divine authority 'to kiss the Son.'

"Our rulers, like any other members of the community, who are under law to God as rational beings, and under law to Christ, since they have the light of divine revelation, ought to search the scriptures, assent to the truth, profess faith in Christ, keep the Sabbath holy to God, pray in private, and in the domestick circle, attend on the publick ministry of the word, be baptized, and celebrate the Lord's Supper. None of our rulers have the consent of their Maker that they should be Pagans, Socinians; Mussulmen, Deists, the opponents of Christianity; and a religious people should never think of giving them permission, as publick officers, to be and do, what they might not lawfully be and do, as private individuals. If a man may not be a gambler and drink to intoxication in the western wilds, he may not at the seat of government; if he may not with the approbation of his fellow citizens, in a little village of the north, deny 'the true God and eternal life,' he may not countenance, abet, and support those who deny the Deity of our Lord Jesus Christ at Washington. In other words, our Presidents, Secretaries of the Government, Senators, and other Representatives in Congress, Governors of States, Judges, State Legislators, Justices of the Peace, and city Magistrates, are just as much bound as any other persons in the United States, to be orthodox in their faith, and virtuous and religious in their whole deportment. They may no more lawfully be bad husbands, wicked parents, men of heretical opinions, or men of dissolute lives, than the obscure individual who would be sent to Bridewell for his blasphemy and debauchery.

"God, my hearers, requires a Christian faith, a Christian profession, and a Christian practice of all our publick men; and we as Christian citizens ought by the publication of our opinions, to require the same.

"Secondly—Since it is the duty of all our rulers to serve the Lord and kiss the Son of God, it must be most manifestly the duty of all our Christian fellow-citizens to honour the Lord Jesus Christ and promote Christianity by electing and supporting as publick officers the friends of our blessed Saviour. If all the truly religious men of our nation would be punctual and persevering in their endeavours to have good men chosen to fill all our national and state offices of honour, power and trust, their weight would soon be felt by politicians; and those who care little for the religion of the Bible, would for their own interest, consult the reasonable wishes of the great mass of Christians throughout our land.

"I propose, fellow-citizens, a new sort of union, or, if you please, a Christian party in politics, which I am exceedingly desirous all good men in our country should join; not by subscribing a constitution and the formation of a new society, but by adopting, avowing, and determining to act upon, truly religious principles in all civil matters. I am aware that the true Christians of our country are divided into many different denominations; who have, alas! too many points of jealousy and collision; still a union to a very great extent, and for the most valuable purposes is not impracticable.

"All who profess to be Christians of any denomination ought to agree that they will support no man as a candidate for any office, who is not professedly friendly to Christianity, and a believer in Divine Revelation. If three or four of the most numerous denominations of Christians in the United States, the Presbyterians, the Baptists, the Methodists and Congregationalists for instance, should act upon this principle, our country would never be dishonoured with an avowed Infidel in her national cabinet or capitol. The Presbyterians alone could bring half a million of electors into the field, in opposition to any known advocate of Deism, Socinianism, or any species of avowed hostility to the truth of Christianity. If to the denominations above named we add the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in our country, the electors of these five classes of true Christians, united in the sole requisition of apparent friendship to Christianity in every candidate for office whom they will support, could govern every public election in our country, without infringing in the least upon the charter of our civil liberties. To these might be added, in this State and in Ohio, the numerous German Christians, and in New York and New Jersey, the members of the Reformed Dutch Church, who are all zealous for the fundamental truths of Christianity. What should prevent us from co-operating in such a union as this? Let a man be of good moral character, and let him profess to believe in, and advocate the Christian religion, and we can all support him.

"Let us awake, then, fellow Christians to our sacred duty to our Divine Master; and let us have no rulers, with our consent and co-operation, who are not known to be avowedly Christians.

"It will be objected that my plan of a truly Christian party in politics will make hypocrites. We are not answerable for their hypocrisy if it does. There is no natural tendency in the scheme to make men deceivers—and if real enemies of the Christian religion conceal their enmity, that concealment is for the public good. We wish all iniquity, if not exterminated, may, as if ashamed, hide its head. It will be well for our country when all men who expect office are under the necessity of appearing honest, sober, pure, benevolent and religious. It is most of all desirable that public officers should be good men, friends of God, followers of Jesus Christ, and lovers of their country—but it is a matter of thankfulness if they are constrained to seem such persons; for in this way, vice and the propagation of vice by evil example is prevented. It will be objected, moreover, that my scheme of voting on political elections according to certain fixed religious principles, will create jealousies among the different denominations of Christians. But why should it? Our rulers which we have elected are of some, or of no religious sect. If they are of no religious denomination, they belong to the party of Infidels.

[Singular reasoning.] If they are of any of the denominations of true Christians, it is better, in the judgment of all true Christians; that they should be of that one company than in the fellowship of Infidels. Let a civil ruler, then, be a Christian of some sort, we will all say, rather than not a Christian of any denomination. If we fix this as a principle of our political morality, we shall all be gratified in turn, and in part, by having Christian rulers of our own description.

"I am free to avow, that other things being equal, I would prefer for my chief magistrate, and judge, and ruler, a sound Presbyterian; and every candid religionist will make the same declaration concerning his own persuasion; but I would prefer a religious and moral man, of any one of the truly Christian sects, to any man destitute of religious principle and morality.

"Suffer, my Christian fellow-citizens, a word of exhortation. Let us all be Christian politicians; and govern ourselves by supreme love to our blessed Master, whether we unite in prayers or in the election of our civil rulers. Let us be as conscientiously religious at the polls as in the pulpit, or house of worship.—This course of conduct will promote good government and true religion in our country at the same time. Our public rulers then will prove a terror to them who do evil, and a praise to them who do well. Let us never support by our votes any immoral man, or any known contemner of any of the fundamental doctrines of Christ, for any office; and least of all for the Presidency of these United States. Let us elect men who dare to acknowledge the Lord Jesus Christ for their Lord in their public documents. Which of our Presidents has ever done this? It would pick no Infidel's pocket, and break no Jew's neck, if our President should be so singular as to let it be known that he is a Christian by his Messages, and an advocate for the Deity of Christ by his personal preference of a Christian temple to a Socinian conventicle. It would be no violation of our national constitution, if our members of Congress should quit reading of newspapers and writing letters on the Lord's day, at least during public worship, in the Hall of Representatives.

"We are a Christian nation; we have a right to demand that all our rulers in their conduct shall conform to Christian morality; and if they do not, it is the duty and privilege of Christian freemen to make a new and a better election."

REMARKS BY THE ED. REFORMER.

Such are the sayings of Ezra Stiles Ely, a Presbyterian "Doctor of Divinity" of the city of Philadelphia. How long before he and his partizans will be able to bring their "religious rulers" into power in this country it is difficult to say. When this is the case, we may bid a farewell to our religious liberties and the right to enjoy our own faith, and worship God according to the dictates of our consciences.—Methodists, Baptists, and others, who might, in the first instance, unite in promoting the schemes of Presbyterian doctors of divinity, would soon find themselves placed in the back ground in governmental affairs, (as in the Tract and Sunday School business) and ultimately they would have to surrender their rights or be devoured by their more powerful and influential rival. We have nothing to object against having the best and most truly pious men for rulers; but such as Presbyterian doctors of divinity would esteem the best and most pious, we should fear and dread much more than his "Holiness" the Pope. Such religious rulers once had the rule in New-England, and they ruled indeed with a rod of iron, imprisoning, whipping, cropping, and hanging those who dissented from them in religious matters.

ADVOCATE AND INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

PLAN OF GOVERNMENT,

Respectfully submitted for the consideration of the Universalists of the State of New York.

Having intimated, a few weeks since, an intention, when time should admit, of submitting, for the consideration of our readers, our views of the subject of the government of our order; and having conferred with several of the brethren, in whose opinions we have great confidence; and moreover, having been solicited to give a free expression of our views on this subject; the following observations are respectfully, and with deference submitted.

As a preparatory step, it may be proper to notice the EVILS which have been so long, and so justly, a subject of complaint amongst us; and which it is the desire of every well wisher to our cause, to remove. They may be classed as follows:

1. The admission of unworthy members into our societies. 2. Suffering them to remain in full fellowship after it is known that their moral characters are bad. 3. The destitution of a correct gospel discipline in societies. 4. The admission of negligent and irregularly organized societies into the associations, and suffering them to remain in fellowship. 5. Granting letters of fellowship to ministers without due regard to their moral and intellectual qualifications. 6. The want of a connecting link, whereby all the different associations in the State can be known to each other and co-operate in promoting the general advancement of truth and piety in the world.

A plan of government, in order to be adapted to our condition, as a numerous and rapidly increasing denomination, must be calculated to remove any of the above evils that now exist amongst us, and prevent the intrusion of others. The following outline, if judiciously filled up, we think would effect that desirable object.

Remark 1. As the societies constitute the source from whence all authority must emanate, it is of the utmost importance that they should be composed of intelligent and worthy brethren; for unless the fountain is pure, the streams issuing from it will be corrupt.—The statute of the state prescribes the mode by which any religious society can be legally organized and so become a body corporate; but it is left to the discretion of those who feel anxious to form religious compacts of this kind, to select their associates. Persons so inclined, have an undoubted right to admit as members, whom they please; but ought not to be recognized by the association as in fellowship, unless they can make it appear that their members are such as would be ornaments to the Christian profession. The admission of unworthy members can only be prevented by caution on the part of those who feel an interest in forming a society; and whenever it shall be understood that no society will be admitted into fellowship, unless duly composed of virtuous members, the first of the above mentioned evils will be removed. Therefore, as the leading principle in a plan of government: Let all societies be organized according to law, and let no persons be admitted as members unless they are duly qualified.

Remark 2. It is no less an evil to suffer bad members to remain in a society, than to admit them in the first instance. Hence it should be adopted as an invariable rule, by the associations, not to retain a society in fellowship when it is known that it neglects to withdraw the hand of fellowship from disorderly members. Nor should so important a matter by any means be neglected. Each society should be required to render annually to its association, an account of its moral condition; and in case of a neglect to comply with so reasonable a requisition, it should be suspended for the first offence, and for continued neglect expelled from the fellowship of the order. Such a measure, if adopted and enforced, would soon remove the second evil above mentioned. Let it be therefore understood that the second item in the plan of government proposed, is the following; viz: That if, on a careful examination, it should appear that any society is neglectful of its duty in the above respect, it should be suspended for the first, and expelled for the second offence, from the association.

Remark 3. A laxity of discipline in societies, being a manifest evil, we would suggest the propriety of having the Committee of Discipline appointed by the association authorized, not only to watch over the ministering brethren, but also to inquire into the condition of societies in fellowship, and receive complaints from persons aggrieved, which complaints should be presented to the association at its next meeting, accompanied with a report of the opinion of said committee relative to the guilt or innocence of the subjects of such complaints. By adopting some measure of this kind, the third and fourth evils above specified would be effectually prevented.

Remark 4. That granting fellowship to ministers not duly qualified, is an evil of the first magnitude, will not be denied: Hence, some method of avoiding it has been regarded as a disideratum. It has frequently been observed, by our more experienced brethren, that granting letters of fellowship hastily, and without first ascertaining that candidates are properly qualified, both in a literary and moral sense of the term, is to be seriously deprecated; and we fully concur in that opinion. Hence, some method should be devised, whereby it can be ascertained whether candidates are, or are not, worthy of fellowship; and in order that such facts may be known, those to whom the subject is submitted must be duly qualified to judge of the merits of any question relating to the case of the petitioning candidate. If it should be urged that the ministering brethren are best qualified to decide on all such cases, we do not know that any serious objections could be raised to having all the ministering brethren composing the Council or belonging to it, a Committee, to which such applications should be made, and by which such cases should be determined. But this subject may be safely submitted to the whole Council, as also all cases of impeachment; and it is presumed, that should any emergency require it, the lay delegates belonging to the Council will cheerfully entrust any such case in the hands of their ministering brethren for the time being. Hence, in our opinion, the Associations should be composed of all ministering brethren within the territorial boundary prescribed by common consent, in good standing, and at least two lay delegates from each society in fellowship.

Remark 5. It will be seen, that the above plan, if adopted, would render each association independent of any other, and a part of the plan would be, to have all power, so far as relates to the government of societies and discipline of ministers, vested in the hands of those composing such associations. This would of course give to them the right to appoint their committees of discipline, their standing clerks, &c. &c.; and an association might delegate the power to try an offending brother, and if necessary, to suspend or expel him, to the committee of discipline; or it might give discretionary authority to such committee, to act during the interim between the annual meetings of the association; in all cases, the parties should have the right to appeal from the decision of the committee to the association.

Remark 6. There would still be wanting a bond of union between the respective associations. If it has become necessary to have delegates appointed by the respective associations, to meet in general Council, it appears to us, after mature deliberation, that such delegates should be selected by the respective associations, without restriction. It would be impolitick, and anti-republican, to limit the associations to the choice of any particular order of men; and it would be as prudent to leave it entirely with them, to select their delegates, with liberty to appoint as their representatives either ministers or laymen.

The foregoing suggestions, are submitted to our readers, not with the expectation of their being adopted without investigation, but with the humble hope that they may lead to such inquiries as will result in the restoration of that perfect harmony which has hitherto existed amongst us, and the perpetuation of that good order and peace which only can promote our prosperity.

FALSE TEACHERS.

9. False teachers of old turned the grace of God into lasciviousness. Jude says they were, "ungodly men, turning the grace of God into lasciviousness." Not that they actually altered the nature of God's grace, but that they made it a pretext for lascivious conduct. This is the only way in which they could turn the grace of God into lasciviousness. Is not the grace of God turned into lasciviousness now in the same manner? There are some who say, if they believed God will bestow grace on all men, they would not care what they should do. They would lie, cheat, steal, &c. &c. This is turning the grace of God into lasciviousness. It is reversing the doctrine of the apostle, and saying, Where grace abounds sin shall much more abound. If such people were dead indeed unto sin, they might reason with the apostle. "What shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid. How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" Rom. vi. 1, 2. The grace of God, which bringeth salvation to all men, hath not a licentious tendency, but teacheth us "that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world." Yet bad men may pervert the best of things to the worst of purposes; and I cannot but regard it as a sign that a man is in the way of sin, when he says, that if he believed God will have mercy on all men, he would do evil. Many people doubtless use this expression without thinking of the idea it conveys, and we may therefore, pray, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." The blame of turning the grace of God into lasciviousness, must be laid first and mostly to the charge of the leaders of the people who cause them to err.

10th and lastly. In the apostolick age, false teachers led captive silly women. Paul informs Timothy, "For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women," 2 Tim. iii. 6. To the Corinthians the same authour says, "But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ," 2 Cor. xi. 3. The serpent did not beguile Adam, but Eve. Adam was beguiled, not by the serpent, but by his companion. False teachers in the apostolick age, used the same subtilty. They first deceived the female part of the community, and then, with their assistance, overcame men. I do not wish to disparage the character of females by any means; they have afforded illustrious examples of learning and talent. I believe I shall have their approbation when I shall say, their minds and feelings are more tender, more easily affected than those of men. They are as capable as men of judging of a subject, when they give sufficient attention to it; but it is not generally the case that they endeavour so much as the other sex, to make themselves acquainted with Biblical learning. I speak of what I suppose is generally true; but to this I freely allow there are many exceptions. Place them in the same circumstances, and they will be no more liable to deception than others. The false teacher knows all this, and takes advantage of it. He does not, by creeping in, lead captive ALL women, but "silly women" only, and he leads captive also silly men. Adam was as silly as was Eve, in his transgression. Now let the reader judge. Which class of religious teachers in the present age, bears the closest resemblance, in this particular, to the false teachers who lived and deceived the people in the days of the apostles? Which class is using its utmost exertions to proselyte the female part of the community? I speak on matter of fact. Clergymen, and their sycophants, are leaving no means untried, to enlist women, old and young, into their service. It is not because they set a peculiar value to them as members of their sect and churches, nor is it through any respect to them. This they ought to know. It is a matter of necessity with the clergy. Men repulse them, and have a natural abhorrence to their sentiments. Having given themselves full liberty to think, and reason, and read, their minds by no ordinary and proper means, can be brought into submission to the efforts of the clergy, nor are they easily frightened with terrific descriptions of the future state. It is a matter of necessity then, I say, for the clergy to make their attack on the female part of a family, expecting to proselyte them, and hoping by their importunity and influence, to gain the rest. This expectation and hope form a powerful motive. By this the clergy are induced to take measures which they know are directly against the wishes of the head of the family. They will persuade women to attend lectures in the night, and to join their churches when they know the husband, or father is greatly opposed to it. Women are taught that their husbands, and children that their fathers, have no religion, and are enemies to God; and this is done for the unholy purpose of destroying the influence which the father has over his family. I know several instances in which families have been nearly ruined by these means. The wife neglects her domestick concerns.—Almost every evening in the week she hurries away to lectures after her dear minister, and leaves her hard working husband to prepare and eat his supper alone. The children are left for him to put to rest, or to lie sleeping in different parts of the house until she returns. The female part of the community are by such means learned to gad from house to house; they are learned also to be idle, to tattle; to be disrespectful and scold to their fathers and husbands. All this is to be attributed to the false teachers of this age. They encourage it to promote their purpose of proselytism, if I may use the word. There is a striking similarity between the effects produced by the labours of those false teachers with whom the apostles had to contend. If we pay just attention to what the apostles have said on this subject, the truth of these remarks will very clearly be seen. Paul says of the young women, "and withal they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also, and busy bodies, speaking which they ought not," 1 Tim. v. 13. The advice which Paul gives his son Timothy in view of the duties of a true minister of God, shews the evils which arose from the labours of false teachers. "But speak thou the things which become sound doctrine. That the aged men be sober, grave, temperate, sound in faith, in charity, in patience. The aged women likewise, that they be in behaviour as becometh holiness, not false accusers, not given to much wine, teachers of good things; that they may teach the young women to be sober, to love their husbands, to love their children, to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands, that the word of God be not blasphemed." Such advice shews the evils against which the apostles had to contend.

And now, kind reader, if by the help of scripture, I have been enabled to trace out the leading features in the character of false teachers, I have done you, I trust, some service.—Be on your guard against them. If you have a family instruct them on this subject, that they may not be deceived. And may God grant you always ability to perceive, and resolution to avoid all wrong. RICHARDS.

MINUTES AND CIRCULAR LETTER OF THE CHENANGO ASSOCIATION.

MINUTES.

The brethren composing the CHENANGO ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS, convened in annual session agreeable to adjournment, at Brooklyn, Susquehanna county, Pa. August 29, A. D. 1827, and united, in addressing the Throne of Divine Grace, with br. J. Potter.

The Council was then organized by appointing brother J. Potter MODERATOR, and brs. S. Adams and S. Finch CLERKS; and proceeded to read and hear the letters from the several Societies and Churches in fellowship with the Association, and found them expressive of prosperity and joy throughout its borders.

The following brethren composed the Council:—

MINISTERS.

Job Potter, Cooperstown, N. Y.; Salmon Adams, Smithville, N. Y.; L. S. Everett, Auburn, N. Y.; N. Doolittle, Berkshire, N. Y.; E. Ferris, Guilford, N. Y.; Saml. A. Skeel, Greene, N. Y.; J. B. Shannon, McDonough, N. Y.; J. S. Flagler, Scipio, N. Y.; Saml. Finch, Pitcher, N. Y.; B. C. Hickox, Pottsdam, N. Y.; C. R. Marsh, Brooklyn, Pa.

LAYMEN.

Solomon Wait, and Stephen Ballen, Preston:—Ebenezer Shaw, and Jabez Fish, Sheshequin:—Amos Hall, and Abel Chandler, Pitcher:—Silas Genson, Smithville:—Jas. Smith, and Amos Baily, Brooklyn:—Saml. Eells, and S. Fells, 3d, Walton:—Freeman Wheeler, and John Stearns, Mount Pleasant:—Stephen Godard, and G. W. Stockwell, McDonough:—Freeman Peck, and J. K. Adams, Harford. The Second Society in Oxford was represented by br. Shannon.

No letters were received from the first Society in Oxford, the church in Lisle, nor the church in Columbus.

Received requests for the fellowship of the Association, from the Society in Mount Pleasant—the Church and Society in McDonough—and the second Society in Oxford. Voted, that their several requests be granted.

Appointed brs. J. Potter, S. Adams, and S. A. Skeel, a Committee to receive and attend to requests for letters of fellowship and ordination. The Council then adjourned to attend divine service at the Meeting House.

ORDER OF SERVICE IN THE FORENOON.

Introductory prayer by br. S. Finch:—Sermon by br. J. S. Flagler; text, 1. Cor. xiii. 8. Concluding prayer by br. S. A. Skeel.

ORDER OF SERVICE IN THE AFTERNOON.

Introductory prayer by br. J. Potter:—Sermon by br. L. S. Everett; text, Acts. ii. 39. Concluding prayer by br. S. Adams.

After the publick exercises were concluded, the Council repaired to the Council-room, and proceeded to business.

Received a request from br. E. Ferris, to be again admitted into the fellowship of the Association.* Voted, that his request be granted.

Voted, that brs. S. Adams, S. A. Skeel, and C. R. Marsh, remain a Committee of Discipline for the ensuing year.

Appointed the following brethren committees to visit the respective associations:—viz. brs. S. Adams, and E. Ferris, for the Central Association, to meet at Fly Creek, Otsego county, N. Y. on the first Wednesday in June next:—Brs. J. B. Shannon and S. Adams, for the Cayuga Association, to meet at the Baptist meeting house in Venice (formerly Scipio) on the first Wednesday of October next:—Br. J. B. Shannon, for the Chautauque Association:—and br. S. Finch, for the General Convention of the New-England States and others, to meet at Saratoga Springs on the third Wednesday in Sept. next; (now inst.)

The Council then adjourned to the following morning, at 8 o'clock; at which time they convened, and after having opened the council in prayer and thanksgiving by br. Shannon, proceeded to dispose of the business before them.

The Committee for receiving requests for letters of Fellowship and Ordination, reported in favour of granting the request of br. J. B. Shannon for Ordination; which request was adopted.

The Council then adjourned, to attend the publick service of the Sanctuary.

ORDER OF SERVICE IN THE FORENOON.

Introductory prayer by br. B. C. Hickox:—1st sermon by br. S. Adams, text, Rev. iv. 11.—2nd sermon by br. B. C. Hickox, text, Isa. xxxiii. 14. Concluding prayer by br. J. Potter.

During the interim, it was voted, that the Association proceed to appoint two Ministering brethren, and two clergymen, to attend a Conference at Auburn, N. Y. on the third Wednesday and Thursday in October next, to take into consideration the propriety of forming a convention.

ORDER OF SERVICE IN THE P. M. AND ORDINATION.

Introductory prayer by br. E. Ferris:—Sermon by br. J. Potter, text, Matt. v. 48.—Consecrating prayer by br. B. C. Hickox:—Laying on of hands by brs. S. Adams, B. C. Hickox, and E. Ferris:—Charge and Delivery of the Scriptures by br. E. Ferris:—Right hand of Fellowship by br. S. Adams:—Concluding prayer by br. J. B. Shannon.

The several addresses were then delivered by br. J. Potter.

After the publick exercises of the occasion were concluded the Council convened and proceeded to dispose of the remaining business.

Voted, that the fellowship of this Association be withdrawn from br. J. S. Dexter.

* Br. Ferris had previously, for certain reasons then explained, obtained leave to withdraw from the Association; and such were his standing and usefulness among us, that it was not thought necessary to subject his request to the usual formalities. Doubtless his request for readmission, caused joy to spring up in every heart, and thankfulness to pervade every soul.

ED. GOS. ADV.

Appointed br. S. Finch to prepare the Minutes of this session of the Association, together with a Circular Letter, for the press; and, voted that the same be published in the Gospel Advocate.

Adjourned, to meet at Greene Village, Chenango county, N. Y. on the last Wednesday and succeeding Thursday of August, 1828. Joined in solemn prayer and thanksgiving with br. S. Finch.

CIRCULAR LETTER.

THE CHENANGO ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS, to the Churches and Societies in fellowship, and to all, of every name and denomination of men of Adam's race, to whom this epistle may come; wishing Grace unto you, and peace from God our Father, and through Jesus Christ, ETERNAL LIFE:—

DEAR BRETHREN—Established in that faith which was once delivered to the Saints;—a goodly number of us assembled in our fifth annual session since the establishment of this Association, with hearts filled with gratitude to our heavenly Father, for all the displays of his ceaseless and unchanging goodness. We present you with the minutes of our transactions during the session, from which you may learn, that the holy cause in which we have embarked, continues to rejoice in prosperity; and we have every reason to believe, that our God, who is the "Father of the spirits of all flesh," has, in very deed, lengthened the cords of our Zion, and strengthened her stakes and caused her to grow with the increase of God! At the time this body was established, six societies were all that constituted this Association, and but two ministering brethren resided within its limits. We have at this time thirteen Churches and Societies in fellowship, and seven Pastors, we trust of God's own choosing, who feed the people with knowledge and understanding.

While, then, others rejoice when they behold a small cloud passing slowly along, resting for a short time on this place, or that, and from whence falls only here and there a drop of water to refresh the thirsty ground, or revive the drooping plant; what great cause of rejoicing is presented to us, when we not only behold the increase within the bounds of this Association, but behold the copious showers of Divine Grace extending from Georgia to Maine, and from the shores of the Atlantick moving over the mountains of the west co-extensive with civilization, and cultivation of the soil! We will, then, say to our brethren, REJOICE IN THE LORD, and be EXCEEDING GLAD, for great is his goodness, and divinely glorious his power in the Salvation of man:—Great is the Lord, for "He doeth his pleasure in the armies of heaven above, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and there is none can stay his hand." Yes, brethren, REJOICE, for the time is come which was spoken of by the prophet. The mandate hath gone forth; the word is to Zion; "Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of their habitations; spare not; lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes; for thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left; and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited." Yes, rejoice in the Lord, for he is good, for his "MERCY ENDURETH FOREVER."

After hearing the glorious news communicated to us through the letters from the several societies; we repaired in procession, to the house of our God, for social and divine worship; there, all degrees, from the aged down to the youth, mingled together; and there, with delight did we listen to the words of Salvation, "which makes glad the city of our God;" while our souls were refreshed by emanating steams from the boundless and unfailling ocean of Jehovah's Love; there we heard the difference between true, and false prophets, clearly illustrated; that all God's "holy prophets have spoken of the times of the restitution of all things since the world began," and their declarations must be fulfilled; for it is impossible for God to lie. Our ears were then saluted with the joyful tidings, that "the promise of our God is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off;" yes, equally as secure to those who are afar off, through unbelief, as those who are nigh through faith: in that, says the Apostle, "the call is to every one." In the third discourse, the extent of the promise was beautifully illustrated in the great plan of Creation, "for our God is worthy to receive glory, and honour, and power, for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." The glorious subject was still continued, although "sinners in Zion are afraid, and fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrite," yet Jesus our Saviour "comes as a refiner's fire, and as fuller's soap," to cleanse and purify those sinners, that "in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him."—In the fifth and last discourse, we were earnestly exhorted to practice that "holiness which is profitable unto all things" for there is great peace in keeping the commands of our heavenly Father, and in keeping his law. Our Saviour says, "be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." The addresses, especially that to the ministering brethren, were very affecting, and it is hoped have made a lasting impression on the minds of many. The greatest harmony prevailed in the Council; all things were done decently and in order. A very numerous congregation attended, and departed saying, "It is good for us that we have been here, this is none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven."

To those who are engaged in the ministry of reconciliation, much might be said, but a little must suffice. The spirit of inquiry is abroad in the earth, and all eyes are directed to the mountains of Zion, to receive the blessing of those, whose feet are shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace—who “publish glad tidings of good things.” If you would finish your course with joy, see that you give yourselves wholly to these things; see that you hold sweet communion continually with your God; that you teach by EXAMPLE as well as PRECEPT,—that you preserve the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace. Remember, the servants of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men; keep in view the bright example of our Lord and Master, whose soul was compassion, whose life was meekness, and purity, whose words were truth, and whose governing principle was “THY WILL, O God, BE DONE.” and above all things, remember your entire dependence on Him, who formed all worlds, and in whom all things exist.

Finally; brethren, sisters, and friends in Christ Jesus:—The joyful period has at length arrived, when we may exchange our heart-felt congratulations at Zion’s prosperity, “the mountain of the Lord’s house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it.” Our cause is the cause of truth; take courage, be strong in the arm of our God, and in the power of his might; stand fast in that liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free, and not be entangled again in the yoke of bondage, be of one heart and one mind, live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you—AMEN.

Per order.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

SIR:—An article in your 36th number, headed “False Teachers,” strikes my attention. The writer in his 5th particular says as follows:—“False Teachers make merchandize of men. This is the sure mark of a false teacher; and the object of the trade is his own emolument. The market is now principally removed to heathen lands, where the trade is briskly carried on,” &c.

It appears to me, that the writer is a hireling priest belonging to the Universalists, and rather than criminate himself as bearing this sure mark of a false teacher, he attempts to carry our ideas away to “heathen lands”—while we can scarcely go into a neighbourhood any where in our own country without we find a Market where merchandize is made of the people, by hireling priests of some sort. But not a word does he say about hireling priests making merchandize of the people here. What is the reason? Is it because the Universalists are as deep in the mud in this particular as other sects are in the mire?—and because the Universalists have not yet adopted the money-making plans of sending things to the heathens? Like some other sectarians, he tries to evade the charge of making merchandize of the people; but my opinion is, that the Universalists, as a people, are but a few years behind other sects in all the popular merchant plans of the present day.

The writer also mentions some means used to carry on this merchandize; and quotes the following passage—“And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandize of you;” 2. Pet. ii. 5. “Feigned words” he makes out to be false words and stories, and speaks of fabricated Tracts, and “stories concerning the renunciation of Universalists,” &c. Here the Universalists are cleared again. But we have reason to believe the Apostle had no reference to fabricated tracts or renunciations. And if the writer is not willing to have the Universalists charged with using “feigned words,” it may be that those among them who “serve their own bellies” use smooth words and fair speeches and deceive the hearts of the simple. See Rom. xvi. 18.

Allowing, then, that Universalism is made up of “good words and fair speeches,” they may be used for the same purpose as feigned words; viz. to make merchandize of the people. Look out, reader, we are surrounded with this merchandize business, on all sides:—it presents itself in all shapes and forms suited to our tastes and notions.

Auburn, Sept. 12.

W. A.

P. S. The writer in another place says—“The true teachers of the apostolick age, renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully,” &c. Is it not a little crafty to say the “market is removed to heathen lands”? Is there not a little deceitful handling of the word “merchandize,” in not noticing hireling priests? Does it not require a little craftiness, to get up a salary; and a little deceitful handling of the word of God to keep the people in a mind to pay it? W. A.

LETTER NO. 6.

To Elder JOSEPH BADGER, of Mendon, Monroe, co. N. Y.

SIR:—Being persuaded that it is not the duty of any individual or society, passively to submit to abuse, and calumny, where justice asks a defence, and where facts, sufficiently strong and numerous, exist to obtain redress, I will here notice a feature of your discourse on the 27th May last, which you could not but suppose would be wounding to the feelings of those against whom you turned the tide of your violence, not to say you designed it for that purpose. It was truly wounding to me; but I am now convinced, that you had no warrant to make the assertion, at least, in the light you wished to have it received. Your object on that occasion seems to have been, to persuade the people, that you had never believed nor professed to believe in universal salvation, (though you did not say fully what you did believe,) and with that profession you stated that "a purse of several hundred dollars had been held out to you as an inducement to preach Universalism!!" What! has any one attempted to bribe and turn you aside from your honest sentiments? This, sir, is a high charge against some one,—whom I know not. And this "cash" we are to suppose, from your own insinuations, was offered you, while you were openly and without disguise, preaching a different doctrine! What splendid talents yours must be to be bought at such a dear rate! Rare indeed must have been considered your gifts, and infatuated must have been the man who offered the bribe, especially if there had been no prospect of success. But it seems you were invulnerable to the shafts of temptation—you did not accept the "purse!" But why did you not? Sir, the truth must come, however unpleasant it may be. And here I would observe, that my object is not to injure you. But if an honest and necessary suggestion of facts will have that tendency, it will be unavoidable.

Did you not, sir, about four years since, inform a gentleman in West-Bloomfield, that you believed in the doctrine of Universalism, and designed to preach it, but wanted a short time to prepare yourself, the more fully and satisfactorily to answer objections which might be brought against it? and did you not, afterwards, authorize that gentleman to make appointments for you, saying, that you would meet them? Will you deny this, sir, seeing that, accordingly, the gentleman did not scruple to mention the subject in a neighbouring town, and proposed making an appointment for you? But what must have been his surprise on hearing, that but a little before (during the time, as it appears that you had been professing to him to be an Universalist) you had been heard to preach against the doctrine! This may account for the purse! and here the matter seems to have ended. Names can and will be given if necessary.

For the last few years, being perhaps somewhat chagrined it would appear, that, where it would answer your purpose, you have done what you could against us. But if, in accomplishing your object, you had used fair means, there would have been no cause for complaint. The truth, however, seems to be otherwise, and I am very sorry it is so. I could mention circumstances leading to this conclusion, but shall, at present, omit them, by observing, that, if necessary they will be named hereafter.

The above inquiries, without propounding any more at present, or adding any comments, are submitted to you for candid reflection and consideration—hoping, that you will duly weigh the matter whether the crime of offering you a bribe can be justly imputed to any Universalist, or whether your professing the doctrine was not the only cause, if any such offer were made. Yours, &c.

W. I. REESE.

September, 1827.

P. S. The insinuation in your note to Mr. Abbot, of Sept. 1, I regret to see, because it must necessarily call forth my reason for choosing to discuss the subject in the Advocate; and this I would have gladly avoided. I then solemnly declare before God, without desiring to attach any disrespect to you, that the only reason why I am unwilling to meet you in public debate, is your manner of treating such subjects. Only let me be assured, that you will conduct on an occasion of that kind in a christian manner, and you shall have no farther cause to deplore my want of disposition to meet you. And I here give notice, that, provided you will submit yourself to the direction and restriction of a candid and judicious committee, mutually chosen, for that purpose, you are at perfect liberty to name your subject, arrangement and positions, in the Advocate, and appoint your time and place for public debate. But let it not take place sooner than four weeks after the first public notice in the Advocate, should you accept, and abide by, this proposition. W. I. REESE.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

REPLY TO W. A. ON PAGE 299.

Our friend W. A. having used "great plainness of speech" in his observations, will pardon us for pointing out with equal frankness, what we suppose to be the errors of his communication.

Whoever undertakes to impeach the essays of another, should first make himself acquainted with the exceptionable parts of what he attempts to expose.—Now, it appears to us, that W. A. has not attempted to invalidate what was advanced in the article to which he refers; but finds fault with what the writer did not advance. Indeed it is tacitly admitted by W. A. that as far as the author went, he was correct; but he did not go far enough to suit our correspondent, and so, therefore, he must be charged with "handling the word of God deceitfully."

It appears to W. A. that the writer is a hireling priest; but how it happens to appear so is to us a secret. If, however, W. A. knows such to be the fact, we confess ourself his inferior in wisdom and sagacity. Nor can we perceive the impropriety which appears so obvious to W. A. in "carrying our ideas away to heathen lands." In a word; our correspondent seems to have raised a "man of straw" and in the style of Don Quixotte given it a most unmerciful drubbing. But without spending time in noticing particulars, we will seize at the strong points of the article of our adversary and endeavour to remove his difficulties.

He seems to think that universalists condemn that in others which they themselves allow. In other words, that we are disposed to speculate upon the credulity of the people, and so obtain their money. But why does he think so? Has he any facts to sustain such an opinion? We presume not. Universalist preachers are, without an exception, disposed to practice as much self-denial as any other class of men. Indeed, in all the connexion there are none who obtain for their labours more than a bare subsistence; and in nine cases out of ten, the ministers of our order labour with their hands for their support. Nor can W. A. point us to an instance where one of the order ever demanded more than an equal share with his brethren of the comforts of life. We invite the closest scrutiny into the conduct of each and every preacher in our connexion; and while we do so, we feel assured that thus far we are, as a people, free from the evil under consideration.

But another thing is worthy of notice. W. A. thinks we handle the word of God deceitfully by saying that the market is removed to heathen lands. How can we avoid the conclusion that the authour of the article on false teachers is correct, while we witness so many efforts to obtain money for the conversion of the heathen? True, we are surrounded with merchandizing plans, but the principle traffick of this kind is for the foreign market. But, again:—Are Universalists justly chargeable with handling the word of God deceitfully with a view of obtaining money? We fearlessly answer no. And we call on W. A. to point us to an instance that will support his accusation. Those to whom the writer of the article on false teachers alluded as being of that description were and are such as pretend that souls can be saved from hell by Money! Such handle the word of God deceitfully, by holding up the idea that God is sorely angry with "poor immortal souls," and that the priests, with cash enough, can save them from his wrath! "Salvation," said a "Doctor of Divinity," not long since—"Salvation will be inscribed on every dollar given for missionary purposes." This we call deception—and deceit of the worst kind. Do we as a people hold to any such system of beggary? Nay, do we deceive the people, by making them think their salvation rests upon any such measures? No. On the contrary, our language ever has been to the reverse of this. Our message is peace—our employment is that of disseminating doctrines which will make an end of all that priestly legerdemain which has operated so much to the prejudice of pure and undefiled religion in our world.

But ministers of our order, ask of their brethren a subsistence, while engaged in proclaiming the truth and exposing the evil practices of those who lie in wait to deceive; and this is the "damning sin" which W. A. would lay to our charge. But, why is this considered so criminal? Is it because he who labours in the gospel field is not worthy of a morsel of bread? Must those who toil incessantly for the public good be fed upon the food of the dogs? But W. A. may contend that it was not the custom of the apostles to receive any compensation, and that therefore we should not demand or receive any in this age of the world. Now in reply, we have only to say that times and circumstances are widely different now, from what they then were, and that a change of circumstances has rendered necessary the course we pursue. The primitive Christians enjoyed all things in common, without reference to the pursuits of different individuals. Hence there was no need of any money to keep the ministers of the word from starvation. The early Christians were not so bent upon the accumulation of wealth as they are in these times. Then their hearts were open and their doors were ever prepared to receive the ambassadors of truth, without taking their coats for a compensation. Would to God a similar spirit now pervaded the hearts of professing Christians, instead of that niggardly disposition which quiets a man's conscience while soliciting the labours of a preacher with his tongue, and withholding from his servant with his hand the needed pittance of the expected reward.

To conclude:—The writer of these remarks has toiled for several years to disseminate truth; and while he has been engaged in the good work, it is presumed, he has often suffered from the inclemency of the weather—from hunger, and thirst, and weariness, and laborious watchfulness, and incessant application, while W. A. has rested in quiet and enjoyed the bounties of Heaven in peace with his family. It comes therefore with a bad grace from W. A. to find fault with us as a body, while he knows so little of the condition of our order. We ask him not to give us of his substance nor bless us with his prayers until he feels bound so to do. But we do hope he will hereafter refrain from speaking evil of that which he understands not.

Ed.

OUT AT LAST.

In our last we gave extracts from a discourse delivered at Philadelphia, by Mr. Ely. It may surprise our readers to find so bold and unequivocal a development of the ambitious schemes of the limitarian clergy; but we have long been prepared for such an event. We need not express our feelings upon this subject, at this time; as our readers have long since been apprized of our utter abhorrence of the cunning and hypocrisy, of the limitarian clergy of our country. Mr. Ely stands at the head of the Presbyterians in this country, and his opinions will doubtless be received by his brethren, as the truth of God, and acted upon, either openly or secretly, by a large majority of that denomination to which he belongs. It remains to be seen, whether the citizens of the United States are to be driven into a compliance with his wishes or not.

We cannot refrain from noticing the bare-faced effrontery with which he alludes to the immortal Jefferson. "It would pick no infidel's pocket, and break no Jew's neck," says this doctor of divinity, "if our President should be so singular as to let it be known that he is a Christian by his Messages, and an advocate for the Deity of Christ by his personal preference of a Christian temple to a Socinian Conventicle." It was the maxim of Jefferson, that religion and politics should never be blended together, and the above quotation refers to a remark in his Notes on Virginia, in which he declares, that it matters not, politically, whether our neighbour believes in one God or twenty gods, if he does not break our necks or pick our pockets. But the beauty of the whole, consists in the gauntlet thrown at the present chief magistrate of our nation. Mr. Adams is supposed to be an Unitarian; and hence the hint about the "Socinian Conventicle!"

On the whole, we conclude the time is at hand, when the people of this country will have eyes to see the abominations of modern orthodoxy; and we bless God that it is at length known what the object is with those who bind grievous burthens upon the unsuspecting part of the community. We have only to say, let every man stand to his rights—the struggle will be short, and liberality of sentiment will triumph.

The "Albany Christian Register" has copied an article from that notable vehicle of slander and falsehood the "Anti-Universalist," entitled "Tardy the Pirate in heaven." The writer of the article seems to wonder how "Tardy, that monster of cruelty and crime," can be saved from his iniquities without an orthodox repentance. Now, we will only remark, for the especial benefit of the above mentioned editors, that if the poor fellow had been favoured with a priest an hour or so before his death, he would have had a passport which would have carried him through to heaven in spite of the very devil himself! His companions in guilt, were said to be truly penitent, and no fears of their damnation are entertained by the self-styled orthodox! O, what blessed creatures the Unitarian clergy are! Were it not for them, and their pious labours, God, for ought they have told us, would damn the whole world. Go then, deluded sinners,—pay the priests, and no matter how wicked you are, they will save your souls from their wrathful god and his co-worker the devil—without any doubt!

N.B. Will the editor of the Register please to explain certain mysteries to which we invited his attention some weeks since?

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MR. EDITOR,

Sir,—Being on a visit, sometime since, in the town of Amenia Dutchess, county, I attended an evening Lecture delivered by a Mr. Harris, who at the close of the discourse said he would entertain his hearers with a pleasing Anecdote. He informed us he had been travelling in the centre of New-York state, where there had been a great Revival, and near there lived an Universalist Infidel, who through the recommendation of his neighbour, attended one of those meetings, and on returning home the neighbour observed to the Infidel that they had a good meeting. Yes, says the Infidel, but I'll not be a fool, (that is he would not be converted.) But the next evening he went again, and the Lord met him with conviction; he returned home, walked the room, clenched his fist, and told the Lord to do his best.—While in this situation, the Lord smote him down by the bed side, which alarmed his little son, who coming in and finding his father in this situation, alarmed the house, and the neighbours, who also came in, and found the wretched man in all the agony of an infuriated demon. This he said, terminated in the conversion of this Universalist Infidel, who went afterwards to some of his old companions, in the Universal faith, and told them he had come to take back the counterfeit coin he had passed. (Universalism.) The preacher said he knew the man. I took the liberty to approach and informed him that I lived in New-York State, and should wish to know the gentleman's name. He said, No. The name of the town then, Sir. No. The name of the county. No, do not urge me, I shall not inform you. He left the room, much agitated, and in haste.

However, a friend of Mr. Harris, informed Mr. Winchester, afterwards, that he thought it was Oxford, where the circumstance took place. I published the circumstance in the Hartford Inquirer, and was threatened with two prosecutions, one at Oxford, for defaming the Rev. Mr. Harri; but on his arrival at that place, he acknowledged the story, smoothed over the falsehood, and thus it ended.

Now, Mr. Editor, if it meets your approbation, I should be happy to have this republished in your paper, that our western brethren may know the refuge to which those fanatics flee to support a sinking cause by lying about their revivals. Your's affectionately, in the cause of truth, eye and ear witness to the above.

ISAAC WHITNALL.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The several persons indicted for a conspiracy to kidnap William Morgan, had their trial at the late Oyer and Terminer at Canandaigua, and were acquitted. The papers say, many facts were disclosed on the trial which throw light on the dark subject, and will probably lead to some farther proceedings.

The extra session of the Legislature of this state, for the revision of the statute, commenced on Tuesday, 11th inst.

The steam boat North America performed a trip from New York to Albany on the 4th inst. in the short space of eleven hours and two minutes. This is unexampled.

FIRE IN PORTLAND, ME.—A distressing fire in that place consumed, a few days since, about 25 tenements. But a small amount of goods were saved from the devouring element.

A SNAKE STORY.—Mr. J. Birdsall of Sing-Sing, killed a rattlesnake a short time since.

Just before he came up to the snake, he saw several young snakes making down the throat of the mother. On opening the snake, thirty-three young ones were found, each ten inches long. If the serpent-devil of orthodoxy, is as kind to its young offspring as this snake is represented to be, we conclude the infant misnamed charitable societies of the day, will be most particularly sustained.

A FACT.—A Methodist clergyman called at the house of an elderly lady in the town of L——, Me. and found no body at home excepting her only son, about twenty-one years of age; and after asking the young man several casual questions, inquired of him whether his mother had an interest in Christ—"yes," replied the young man—"she has a cow, four sheep, and a pig." We are at a loss to determine which was the most simple, the clergyman who asked the question, or the young man who gave the above answer. For all have an interest in Christ for whom he gave himself a ransom; and we should as soon conclude that a cow, four sheep and a pig, constituted an interest in the Redemer of the world, as that Methodistical rant would procure salvation.

MR. MONROE, late President of the U. S. is said to have conveyed to the Bank of the U. States, 2600 acres of land, as security for a debt of 25,000 dollars, conditioned that if the land sells for more he shall have the surplus. It is understood he is still depressed with other debts.

A store was broken open in New York not long since, and robbed of $2 and two barrels of rotten eggs! What a prize!

A man named Brown, was arrested in Poughkeepsie two weeks since, having about him several counterfeit bills and plates for making more of the same currency.

The "Reverend" Mr. Weems, who was lately apprehended in Boston for larceny, and who, it appeared had expended his ill-gotten gain in contributing to the comfort of certain "ladies"—has had his trial on two indictments and was sentenced to the penitentiary at Charlestown. We should like to know whether this man (who is said to be a believer in endless torment) has experienced the "salutary restraints" of that "soul-converting doctrine."

The Hon. David E. Evans, we understand, has resigned his seat in congress in consequence of receiving the appointment of Agent for the Holland Land Company.

A man near Rome, attempted, not long since, to cut his throat while in a state of partial intoxication. He however acted very prudently; for he pulled the skin of his neck as far out as he could, thrust his knife through it with the back towards his throat, and cut out instead of in. This is thought to be a very prudent way of committing suicide!

Two shocks of an earthquake have recently been experienced at New Albany, Ind. So considerable was the jar in one instance that an old building occupied as a black-smith's shop, tumbled to pieces.

Capt. Bliss, of Springport, N. Y. was thrown from his carriage, near Auburn, on the 30th ult. and fractured his skull so badly that he died in a few hours.

A son of Abraham Keeler, of Auburn, was shot through the body with a ramrod. The accident was owing to the carelessness of a rifleman, who, after training, discharged his rifle, leaving the ramrod in it: the boy died soon afterwards.

A man named Chauncey Lewis, a powder peddler, from Suffolk, Conn. stopped at Berlin, to get his waggon repaired, when an apprentice, named Rufus M'intire, happened to drive a spark on the powder, which exploded, and burnt him so severely that he died a short time afterwards; Lewis was likewise so much injured that little hope is entertained of his recovery.

Mr. John Wood, of New York, was drowned from on board the steam boat Constellation, while on her passage from Albany to N. York.

New mode of begging.—The following singular circular issued in the name, and by the grace of God, is copied from the Kentucky Reporter. We publish it on account of its novelty, but we think that the preachers of the gospel throughout the United States, will, at least, inquire of Mr. Gabriel Crane before they send him the money what he intends to do with it.—Alabama paper.

Money! Money!—We received the following a few days since by mail. We hope the pious author, if he succeeds in his scheme of collecting money, will be honest enough to reimburse the postage of his letter.

A DIVINE PROCLAMATION!

I AM THAT I AM—MY NAME IS JEHOVAH.

IN the name and by the grace of God the Lord, Creator of heaven and earth. Be it known to all whom [as will appear] these presents are especially directed. That He is now upon the earth in an especial manner, for the better execution of His purposes hereunto relating, and hath appointed me to be the organ of His will for the occasion.

And farther Be it known, that to accomplish those His sovereign purposes of grace and good will to man at this time money is considered necessary, and to obtain it, I am directed to call upon his favoured servants, the Preachers of His Gospel throughout the U. States, in the manner following:

In His name and through His grace, they are therefore all and severally called upon and required, to transmit to me, through the post office, without unnecessary delay, such sums as in all due faithfulness of mind, may to each seem mete on the occasion, according to their respective circumstances; any suggestions of spirits, natural or super natural, to the contrary notwithstanding—for non-compliance there will be allowed no excuse, no exoneration, no justification.

And now, in further compliance with the will and direction of the Lord, the Creator and Sovereign Ruler of heaven and earth, after all manner of a witness, as foretold in scripture, I testify, considering myself in His immediate presence, that herein I have told the truth.

N. B. All printers are required to give this an immediate and conspicuous insertion in their respective papers, with large type.—The Lord Jehovah requests none, but requires of all; and cursed is he that doth deny me, saith the Lord God Omnipotent. G. C.

THE DEATH OF MR. CANNING PREDICTED BY NIXON, THE ASTROLOGER. In an old book, entitled, Prophecies of Robert Nixon, printed in the year 1701, is the following prophetick declaration, which appears to refer to the late melancholy event which has deprived the English nation of one of her brightest ornaments:—"In the year 1827, a man will raise himself by his wisdom, to one of the most exalted offices in the state. His King will invest in him great power as a reward for his zeal. England will be rejoiced. A strong party will enter into a league against him, but their envy and hatred will not prevail. The power of God, which reigneth over all, will cut him off in his prime, and the nation will bitterly bemoan her loss. Oh, England! beware of thy enemies. A great friend thou wilt lose in this man."

NOTICE.

Persons desirous of being accommodated with the current volume of this paper, can be supplied with the back numbers from the commencement of the year.—The terms, as heretofore, are one dollar and fifty cents a year (which includes the volume) if paid at the time of subscribing. Persons who can more conveniently transmit two dollars, can have their papers sent postage paid. All letters must come postage paid in order to receive attention. Any person who will obtain five subscribers and forward the pay in advance, shall have the sixth copy gratis.

The Ministers and Delegates who attended the Chenango Association, are respectfully requested to act as our agents in obtaining subscribers.

To Correspondents.—The communication of I. R. R. is unavoidably laid aside for this week.

We have so great a variety of matter on hand from esteemed correspondents, that some delay is unavoidable; but all shall receive attention as soon as room will permit.

LIFE'S PLEASURES.

LIFE hath its hour of joy—there falls,
No gloom on childhood's sunny brow,
No care that bows—no bond that thralls
The heart, can life's gay morning know.
But oh! for childhood's sunny hours
In vain the heart in after years
Shall seek—when wither'd by the blight
Of disappointment—when the cares
Of life are crowding on the mind,
When by fate's fearless phantom led
In search of joy, it mourns to find
The promised bliss forever fled.

Of confidence and vows of truth—
When fancy with his brightest beams
Has lighted up the path of youth;
But soon or late a time must come,
When dreams of youth must pass away,
And sorrow cast its veil of gloom,
Before its bright and cheering ray;
The noblest feelings of the heart,
Of pure and deep affection born,
From the chill'd bosom shall depart,
Wither'd by cold neglect and scorn.

Life hath its hour of Love—it brings
A strange compound of hopes and fears;—
Brightest of Life's imaginings
Is Love in youth's unclouded years;
But oh! how oft its charm hath past,
Like visions of the night away.
Swept o'er by disappointment's blast,
Leaving the heart in dread decay;—
The fondest and the loveliest form
That e'er hath known love's rapturous spell,
Has sunk beneath the wasting storm
That on its true affections fell.

Life hath its bliss—the bliss that flows
From consciousness of having done
Our duty, at life's weary close,
When slowly sinks existence's sun;
When we can look around and see
No dark accusing spirit near;
When from the bond of earth set free,
The weary soul hath joy to hear
Its summons to a brighter clime,
Where earthly woes no entrance find,
And when the dreary hours of time
Are left with all their cares behind.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

A FRIENDLY LETTER,

To Elder WARNER LAKE, Pastor of the Baptist Church, in Springport, Cayuga county, New York.

SIR:—All the apology I shall offer you for this address, will be, that you have assumed the responsibility of dispensing the divine word to a lost world, thereby subjecting yourself to the scrutinizing investigation of your audience.

I should not, however, at this time, meddle with you, were it not that the glaring absurdities in your sermon at the funeral of Captain Bliss, on the first instant, loudly demanded a rehearing.

You selected for our instruction the 13th chapter of Mark's Gospel, 33d verse—"Take ye heed, watch and pray, for ye know not when the time is." Your first remarks were, as near as I can recollect: "Our Saviour in the introduction to our text, had been foretelling the destruction of Jerusalem literally; but after having closed that subject, he introduced another of great and solemn importance to all mankind;—he cautioned them to beware, and be on their watch, for the end of all things was near at hand; he warned them to prepare for the presence of their final Judge." And you farther observed, that it was no less an end of all things to him that died now, than to the last man that should ever live. I hope to be corrected if I have not stated substantially your remarks. Now, sir, the grand query with me, is, where, in the whole chapter from which you selected your text, did you make such a grand, such a solemn discovery? I am constrained to say, that your text contains no such admonition. Now do inform us, sir, where this sudden transition from one subject to another of so different a complexion is. I know it has been handed forth from the desk times without number; but I am well persuaded that Jesus of Nazareth never intended to convey to his disciples any such idea in that discourse; and you, sir, old and plain as you are, and with all your independence of mind, would be ashamed to preach, or even to have it said you had preached, such an incoherent discourse. Only once look at it, sir, and see the propriety of commencing a different subject with the words—"But of that day and that hour knoweth no man," &c. According to your exposition, what use do you make of the connective "but," and the relative "that?"—Can you make any possible sense of them? Mark, sir, you say that in the preceding subject, the Saviour spoke of the destruction of Jerusalem, literally. Then, you say, he begins a new subject with the words—"But of that day and that hour," &c. WHAT day and hour does he refer to? Why, you would, and in fact you did, tell us, that it was the last day and hour of a man's life! Singular discovery indeed! Who would think by reading the whole of the last paragraph, that such an idea was intended to be conveyed? Curious it is, that 4000 years had rolled over the experience of mankind, yet they were ignorant that they were in the dark as to the last day and hour of their lives! When I hear a man explain this text in the manner you did, it is with the utmost stretch of the mantle of charity that I am able to cover his insincerity. If our Lord was relating in this chapter, the different circumstances attending the close of the legal age or dispensation, then we can perfectly well understand him, then we have a most beautifully arranged discourse, clearly expressed:—Beautifully prophetick, but we think easy to be understood at this enlightened day.

You made frequent mention of the passage, "Be ye also ready," which you applied to warn us to prepare to die. Now, sir, as I can find nothing expressed in the above passage which warns man to prepare to die, I will just inquire of you how a man shall prepare himself for death? Is it by keeping the words of the Saviour? O no; for he says "if any man keep my words he shall never see death." Is it by believing on the Saviour? No. "He that heareth my word and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life," &c. Now, the only method of preparing to die, that I can discover laid down in holy writ, is, to be carnally minded, which Paul says is death: and let me tell you, that the very mode you pointed out for us to prepare for death, was expressly calculated for us to prepare for life and peace.

The next noticeable particular was, that you informed us that we all knew one thing, and that was, that "except we repent we shall all likewise perish." Now what are we to understand from the application of this text? If you had left out the word likewise, we might possibly come at what your meaning was ;—but as you quoted it, we might with honest and simple propriety infer, that unless we repented, we should all perish by falling out of our carriages. You may say that I treat the subject lightly ; but my intention by so doing, is to draw your mind to a strict examination of your subject. You could not possibly wish us to have understood you, that except we repented, we should all perish by having the Governor of Judea mingle our blood with our sacrifices ; or that we should have the tower of Siloam to fall on us. For so the insertion of the word likewise in the text, would lead us to understand it.

Again ; “Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.” It did appear to me, from a few words preceding the last quotation, that you, by quoting these words, would have us understand, that it was your belief, that the spirit of the corpse before you, had gone any where but to a place of rest. The application you made of the text, would teach us, that man was born again by his own efforts. But, sir, if I understand the tenor of Calvinism, the fact that man can do any thing to effect this birth, is absolutely denied.—Now, sir, does your creed teach us, that man, by his own good deeds, performed by his own hands, can prepare himself for the presence of his Maker,—his final Judge ? If not, why did you insist upon it so strongly ? Why did you tell your audience, that it was their own work to prepare for death ? and to prove what you asserted, why did you quote the passage last above written ? How long will it be, sir, before you will be heard to quote, “Which were born not of blood nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God,” in order to prove that man can do nothing of himself ? I forbear to say any thing further for want of room ; and if you should not affect to condemn what is here written, but should wish to answer, you can have the same privilege that I now take, and through the same medium ;—and may you be led to behold and believe the whole truth as it is in Jesus.

Yours respectfully, I. R. R.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

What will be done ! alas ! what can be done ! Not more than four weeks since, in this village—the village of Elbridge—the Rev. Pastor of the Congregational Society, gave an earnest and most solemn charge to the brethren and sisters under his care, after the excommunication of three of its members, not to eat at all with an excommunicated person.—They have, notwithstanding this solemn charge from the minister, violated it in less than three days after it was given ! They have again, and again violated it. Notwithstanding the members were earnestly charged and entreated not to eat with an excommunicated person, they have, in violation to the charge, gone forward, and have eaten at the same table with an excommunicated person !!!

What will be done ? what can be done,—when the solemn charge of the minister is thus imprudently violated and trampled upon ! And now the minister has this day, previous to the excommunication of another member, been under the painful necessity of again and again repeating this charge, with all the solemnity and engagedness of a Mahomet, that it might not be violated. He has referred them to the 5th chapter of Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, as his authority for this charge ; and now he has this day, also, previous to the exercises, given a general explanation of the chapter. He has brought forward the words of the apostle, showing that he (the apostle) does not mean that they must not commune with excommunicated persons ; but that they must not eat at all at the common table at common meals, with such persons ;—with such an one, no, not to eat. And, notwithstanding this command—this solemn charge, they will violate it ! They do eat with such persons at the same table, after they have been excommunicated from the Presbyterian Church ! and although the minister makes the exception of family and near relations, as not included in this charge or prohibition, where the apostle makes no exception ; yet still they have violated it, notwithstanding all this indulgence ! ! Oh, what base ingratitude ! Alas ! what will be done ! they will not hear !

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

It seems really mysterious, that men, who profess to be rational, and consistent beings, can be serious when they attempt to palm on their fellow creatures, as a duty, and as a sentiment of the bible, a command or prohibition, the most destructive and abhorrent to every social and Christian feeling. A person may not eat at the same table with a member of the Presbyterian order, because he has been excommunicated therefrom ; and perhaps he has been excommunicated because he differs a little in judgment from that order. If two persons—the one a member, the other an excommunicated member—chance to meet at the same house, and both wish for a meal of victuals at the same time, the good lady must set two tables. But why ? Because that man don't think as I do. “Stand by thyself, come not near to me, for I am holier than thou.” This would be subjecting fellow clay to a fine predicament : this would be as degrading as the religion of the missionaries to Hindoo nations : this is what they would term “loosing the caste ;” this will do for heathen, for the dark ages; but for Christians—at this period of the world, in the state of New York, in this enlightened land where religious freedom and inquiry is encouraged—it is altogether too late in this day, for the introduction of such superstitious, pharisaical folly. The writer of this article has, within the last five years, witnessed the strict observance of this pharisaical spirit. He has thought he had seen the end of it. But no; it has again revived, or it has attempted to raise its haggard head in the village of Elbridge, through the medium of the “priest’s lips.” I would not speak disrespectfully of the Rev. clergyman—by no means. He is a smart man in the pulpit—the idol of his church: but then, again, he is a fallible creature as well as the rest of us. Nay, it is the sentiment which he inculcates that we condemn, not the man. He allows the members of his church to eat and associate with the men of the world, though they be drunkards, fornicators, &c. but with an excommunicated person, they are forbidden to eat even at the common table. It is an excommunicated person—no matter what they are excommunicated for, I suppose you must not eat with them; they are awful creatures. We have the charity to believe, however, that the members of the Calvinistic societies are possessed with too much good sense to swallow down such food, and at the same time, wiping their mouths, call it a good mouthful. There may be exceptions, however. It would be strange, if John Calvin, their founder, did not have some true disciples. If he could burn Michael Servetus to death, by a slow fire made of green wood, because he (Servetus) could not believe his (Calvin’s) creed; it would seem strange if some of his disciples, who are called Calvinists, after his name, should not feel themselves too good to eat at the same table with an excommunicated person for the same crime. There are such disciples, no doubt, and they are those whom, if they could lay aside their prejudice time enough to read this communication, they would, perhaps, pronounce its author hostile to Christianity.—But this is not the case; it is no such thing. It is the inconsistencies and absurdities that he opposes, not religion or the cause of his Redeemer. He has no hostility, no enmity to the cause of religion, or to a single child of Adam’s race. He begs leave to inquire, if the Saviour of the world, who tasted death for every man, had occasion to say, of some of those whom he loved, and for whom he was about to give his life a ransom—“Ye fools and blind which strain at a gnat,” &c. without being adverse to religion; why may not similar language now be applied to some, without implying an anti Christian spirit in the author? Let the candid observer reply. A. C.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE,

A FRIENDLY HINT TO “A.”

SIR:—Believing that good may result from properly conducted controversies, to the Christian world, who are eager to obtain the truth as it is in Jesus, and having a little more than a month since, closed my reply to your second communication, I now request a continuation of the subject, should it be agreeable to you; and as I have, according to my abilities, answered your objections, I hope you will not refuse a “reciprocation.”

I would once more call your attention to the golden rule of our Saviour. In the 18th No. of the Advocate, p. 138, is an article headed “Reciprocation,” containing several questions for your consideration, and to them, I wish you to attend as soon as may be convenient. In the close of that article, I promised some remarks on the subject of immortality, which will be delayed till the questions there presented shall have been disposed of.

Though the editor has said, at page 237 of the Advocate, that “no communication will be inserted, unless the name of the authour is known,” &c.; yet, as you have entered his columns, he will, no doubt, make an exception in your case, and give every opportunity, should it be agreeable to your wishes.

Yours respectfully, W. I. REESE.

Sept. 1827

By the same mail that brought the above, we received a polite Note from “A.” stating the reasons why he has not replied to W. I. Reese. We regret exceedingly that our respected correspondent “A.” is not in a situation to continue his favours; but he must of course be permitted to judge for himself in this matter. Should circumstances permit, we hope again to hear from him. His reasons for discontinuing the controversy follow:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

SIR:—Since my return from the journey which I took, I have been unable to find leisure to pursue the subject controverted between Mr. W. I. Reese and myself. A little time which I had, in recovering from sickness, afforded me an opportunity to write what I did, which, being now employed for another person, is not in my power.

I will thank you to mention this in your paper, as the cause of my silence on this subject, which I should be anxious to pursue if I could. Yours, A.

10th Sept. 1827.

The Temple of Truth is built indeed of stones of chrystal, but inasmuch as men have been concerned in rearing it, it has been consolidated by a cement composed of baser materials. It is deeply to be lamented that Truth herself will attract little attention and less esteem until it be amalgamated with some particular party, persuasion or sect; unmixed and unadulterated, it too often proves as unfit for currency, as pure gold for circulation. Sir Walter Raleigh has observed, that "he that follows Truth too closely, must take care that she does not strike out his teeth;" but he that follows Truth ever so closely, has little to fear from Truth, but he has much to fear from the pretended friends of it.—Lacon.

ADVOCATE AND INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

THE WAY TO MAKE HYPOCRITES.

We assume it as an incontestible fact, that it is not in man, of himself, to control his belief or faith in any proposition. All are led by the testimony presented to their understandings, either to believe or disbelieve; and although coercion may induce a person to profess an assent to the truth of a doctrine or proposition, which to his mind is not sustained by evidence, yet his assent only proves that he dare not avow what are his real convictions.

In order that we may be prepared to believe in any doctrinal proposition, it becomes necessary that we should be qualified to judge of the evidence urged in its support. That man would be considered extremely foolish who should propound a problem in mathematics to an idiot incapable of understanding the difference between an unit and ten; but such an one would be quite as wise as those are, who propose to children and ignorant adults "the incomprehensible dogmas" of what is called orthodoxy.

From the foregoing observations it may justly be inferred, that we must have capacity to understand the evidence presented in support of any given proposition, before we can, with propriety, be called upon to believe; and, that before we can believe at all, we must have evidence which appears something like a demonstration of the fact. Hence, then, if sectarians would multiply converts to their creeds, they should seek for the most convincing evidences of their truth; inasmuch as nothing else can produce belief in the minds or understandings of mankind; and these evidences should be presented to the minds of those and those only who are capable of understanding them.

The above remarks are designed to lead us on to a consideration of the impropriety of those coercive measures which have been pursued by our opponents.

The first error which will be noticed at this time, is the custom of attaching a great degree of criminality to unbelief.

If, as above intimated, we believe according to evidence, it would seem to follow that the want of evidence, and not the want of a disposition, is the cause of unbelief. Hence, unless a person is to blame for not obtaining evidence for himself, it is improper to consider him culpable in any case for a want of faith in any proposition; and should we find a person engaged in looking up testimony in favour of any doctrine, with a view of becoming a believer, we should at once conclude he had prejudged the case and was ready to receive almost any thing for evidence that should suit his purpose.

Our opponents present to mankind the proposition that there are three persons, equal in power and glory, in the Godhead; and this, they tell us, is a doctrine taught in the scriptures. But at the same time, they tell us plainly that those three persons are mysteriously and incomprehensibly united in such a manner, that, although each person is infinite yet there is but one person after all. Now, it is not strange that such doctrine should have its advocates, for almost any mystery will have its devotees; but it is strange that any persons can be found to denounce their fellow beings for not believing what, in the onset, is declared to be beyond the reach of our powers of comprehension.

Again: It is maintained that God has prepared a place of endless torment for a portion of his children in another world, and that the act of consigning millions to that place of ceaseless woe, is perfectly consistent with the Divine attributes of goodness, mercy, and love. To many, this proposition is entirely incomprehensible. But we are told that unbelief in this point of faith will excite the displeasure of the Almighty, and should entitle us to the contempt of the faithful here on earth. Hence, the torments of hell are threatened against us for unbelief in this notion, and the terrors of excommunication are resorted to, to prevent mankind from revolting from the belief of this doctrine. In this way thousands are kept within the pale of the visible church, who, otherwise, would openly reject an idea so abhorrent to the better feelings of our nature. The same remarks will apply in ten thousand instances; more especially to the means resorted to in securing an outward assent to the doctrines of total depravity, eternal election and reprobation, &c. &c.

That thousands do outwardly assent to the doctrines above mentioned, is very evident; but that most, if not all of them, rest upon doubtful testimony is a fact admitted even by the most strenuous advocates for their authenticity. And, if mankind are incapable of believing what they cannot comprehend, we conclude there are many more nominal than real believers in those absurdities.

Now, the way to make hypocrites would seem to be this: Let the clergy of the limitarian faith use measures to make the people profess to believe what they cannot understand. We will suggest a few ideas for their consideration, which relate to the more important particulars, with the hope that some of them will see their true condition.

When a member of their church intimates that some of the peculiar tenets of their order are rather inconsistent with the character of a good and merciful Creator, let the first opportunity be improved to threaten him or her with a disgraceful excommunication. This will undoubtedly have a great effect in confirming the person in doubt; but will perhaps influence a weak mind to remain quiet, and if continued incessantly, will in time make the person a passable hypocrite.

If young people are apparently anxious to hear and judge for themselves, it will be likely to make them hypocrites, to persuade them that certain meetings are composed of the lower classes of society, and are unpopular. This will by no means alter their views; but it may, if persisted in, cause them to conceal their honest convictions, and probably attend with the more popular class of society.

In order to succeed in the work of making hypocrites, it may be farther necessary, to insinuate to merchants, lawyers, physicians, and mechanics, that if they would succeed in business, they must attend a certain church, and support a certain clergyman.—When you touch a man's purse, or his interest, you touch his life; and if we are not mistaken, there are hundreds in the world who for no other than pecuniary considerations conceal their sentiments.

Much more might be said on this subject, but if our readers are desirous of obtaining farther information, we take the liberty to refer them to Doctor Ely's discourse, (a part of which was published in our 37th number,) and to the limitarian clergy generally.

IMPROVEMENT.

It seems to argue but little knowledge of human nature in any one, to suppose the mind of man can be controlled by coercive measures, or that sincere converts to any mode of faith can be multiplied, by the means used by our opponents generally throughout the world. True, mankind can be kept in ignorance by the fear of popular priests; but whenever the understanding becomes enlightened, it will be free. Those then who calculate on keeping the ascendancy, by the means above hinted at, will, unless we are in error, find to their surprize, sooner or later, that a bondage so irksome, a servitude so abject, will not always be endured by the citizens of these United States.

MISCELLANY.

FROM THE AMERICAN FARMER.

THE WIFE.

To a fond and confiding girl, few hours in life are so full of buoyancy and hope, of kindness and affection, as those of courtship; and few it may be truly said, are so important to her future welfare and happiness. In her lover she, too often, sees all that is worthy and respectable in man; the ardour of her affection softens the most offensive traits of character, and obliterates all minor failings. Whatever she may have collected from poetry, is brought in aid of her imagination, which pictures, in the most glowing colours, the character of a husband; and her affection persuades her that in her lover she has found a perfect representative of the ideal picture.

In dreams of confidence in the prudence of her choice, and delightful anticipations of succeeding years of affection and happiness, she is led to the altar; and how often alas! does one short year bring home to her aching bosom the sad reality of the falsity and emptiness of her hopes of all mutual love, and tender assiduity and lasting affection. Yesterday the lover was all attention, and love marked every action: to-day, the husband is cold, distant and neglectful; preferring the company of the dissipated to that of her, who but a few days since, he flattered himself was dearer to him than all the world beside.

I can hardly picture to myself a situation more truly heart-rending and deplorable, than that of a female who has found every want anticipated and every reasonable wish gratified under the paternal roof, with the warm confidence of youth to repose on the bosom of affection, but finding her confidence betrayed, her affection slighted and herself, with a helpless offspring, left to struggle with unkindness, poverty and want. Such alas! is too often the case in this world of uncertainty, where we find, mixed with the kindest blessings of our Heavenly Father, evils, which almost stagger our strongest faith.

In my boyish days, when every thing was bright and sunny, and pleasures sported in beautiful perspective before me, I sometimes wandered to a neighbouring farm house to pass an idle hour with its lovely and innocent inmates, who were as thoughtless and cheerful as myself. Among these beautiful girls was one more advanced in age than the rest, whose modesty and blooming beauty, was the admiration and envy of the village throng. Twenty winters have passed over my head, since I saw her sporting on the green, and yet, at this distant day, I cannot recollect her sylph-like form, her sprightly manner, and her affectionate smile without a thrill of delight.

Eliza's hand had been often solicited by those whose fortunes were much superior to her own, but none were able to win her heart. About her twentieth year, she met, at a friend's, a young gentleman who had recently come to reside in the neighbourhood; his figure was elegant; his features were regular, and his whole appearance such, as, at first sight, was calculated to excite the affections of a young, inexperienced, and susceptible girl. He was flippant, bold, and even boisterous; which, to one little acquainted with the world, might indicate a great degree of spirit; but it was in fact nothing but the ebullition of an irritable and petulant temper. To this man Eliza became most passionately attached—he offered her his hand, and it was accepted, in opposition to the advice and entreaties of her parents. It was about this time I left the parental roof, and new scenes and increasing cares almost obliterated the beautiful Eliza from my recollection.

During one of the inclement nights of our New-England winters, I was called to an obscure part of the city, to visit professionally, a poor and helpless wretch, who was pining with disease produced by intemperance. As I sat by the bed of the sufferer, I heard, in an adjoining room, the voice of a female, pleading with great earnestness, with one, who appeared to be the employer of her husband. "For heaven's sake, she said, do keep back every cent you can of his earnings; not a shilling that enters his pocket ever finds its way here. The tipping shop and tavern takes all. It is hard, and perhaps wrong to speak of one's husband thus. The time was when I did not believe it possible; but what am I to do? where am I to seek sustenance, clothing, and fuel for these my freezing and starving children? But, my dear sir," she continued, her sobs almost suffocating her; "this is but a small part of what I suffer. Oh! I could sustain myself under poverty and want; I could live with him cheerfully and affectionately under all the vicissitudes of fortune, if I could only receive the love and kindness which is a wife's due."

I inquired the name of her who had so strongly excited my sympathy; in a moment the beautiful Eliza flitted before my mind; she, who at twenty years was so beautiful, so affectionate, so happy, that angels might almost have envied her lot. I arose with an indistinct feeling that I should meet something which my youthful mind was wont to contemplate with such delight. I entered the room, but what did I see? the shadow of her whose early dawn was the promise of earthly bliss. Would to God it had never been my lot to have thus encountered her, who, in youth, had left such a magick and undying spell on my mind.

Man may be justly entitled the great destroyer and exterminator of life, without regard to time, place, or circumstance. By his power the strongest are overcome; by his ingenuity, the most subtle are circumvented and their energies of body and mind made subservient to his necessities or pleasures. He is superior to the whole animal creation in the noblest attributes, but he enjoys one pre-eminence for which even the lowest have no cause to envy him. All the destructive animals fulfil their dire offices upon creatures belonging to other kinds: when the lion leaps from his ambush, it is into the neck of the wild ox or antelope that he buries his claws;—when the wolves howl in unison, it is the deer they are pursuing;—when the scream of the eagle sounds shrillest, then let the wild duck beware! Even the insatiably ferocious tiger keeps aloof from his brethren of blood. But, when the drums roll and the trumpets clang;—when the banner-folds are shaken abroad upon the air, and the neigh of the charger re-echoes the deep notes of the bugle, then is man with his boasted reason, preparing to spill the blood of his brother—to drive his desolating chariot over the faces of his kindred—spread havoc and despair before his path, and leave famine and pestilence to track his footsteps.

American Quar. Review.

When the Athenian Orator was asked—what is the first grace in oratory? he replied, Pronunciation; the second? Pronunciation; the third; still he replied Pronunciation. So if I am asked, what is the first grace in religion? I reply, Humility; the second? Humility; the third? still, Humility; and self conceit is the first, and second, and third obstruction.

A plain but excellent father had a son much given to the pleasures of the toilet. Coming home in a new fashioned bang-up, with something less than a score of capés, he was asked what kind of thatching he had on his shoulders, "Capés, only capés, father!" "So, so," said the old man, passing his hand over them, "Cape Hatteras, Cape Henlopen, I suppose; and here," clapping his hand on his head, "is the light house."

"Are you yet to learn," asked Lord Cleveland, "that in the management of a political party, arrangement is every thing, friendship nothing, nay, that the most determined friends must often give way to doubtful allies; to determined enemies always."—De Vere.

"The Paris Journal des Debates of June 30, has two blank columns under the head "Variety," the matter having been struck out by the Censors. What would subscribers to an American paper say at blank spots where reading had been and should be? They would, at least, flock to the office by thousands to know what the offending matter was, and more would hear than would have read; and the suppression would cause more excitement than the publication. By the way, are French editors forbid to tell what is struck out?"

How to have a good Memory.—To some one who was complaining of his memory. Dr. Johnson said, "Pray, sir, do you ever forget what money you have in your pocket? or who gave you the last kick on the shins that you had? Now, if you pay the same attention to what you read, as you do your temporal concerns, and your bodily feelings, you would impress it as deeply upon your memory."

Despotism can never exist contemporaneously with the liberty of the Press, as we cannot have night before the setting of the sun.

ANGER.—The first emotions of anger should always be suppressed. This is a goodly policy whether right or wrong. One's mind cannot see so clearly in the whirlwind of passion. If anger and high passions should ever be indulged let the feelings rise gradually into that lofty region. By this means you carry with you, and intimidate much more your antagonists. A winged spirit might reach the top of the Andes in a single flight, but if he wants to carry men with him, he must accommodate his progress to their weakness.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Extract of a letter dated Belmont Hall, (Schooler's Mountain, N. J. July 21, 1827.

A remarkable discovery was made a few days ago in the "Morris and Eaton Canal," about four miles from this place. It is a Mammoth skeleton, in a remarkable state of preservation. It lay about three feet beneath the surface, and was exhumed in excavating the canal. It is supposed to be much larger than that in Peale's Museum, one of the tusks being probably about 150 weight. The grinders look as fresh as if they had not been buried a day, tho' they may have lain there a thousand years.

I have purchased the entire skeleton and enclose you a precise description of it, written by Dr. Stewart of Hacketstown. I intend to send it to Europe shortly, and in the mean time those who visit Belmont, can be gratified with a view of it. Yours, &c.

PETER C. BROWNE.

NATURAL CURIOSITY.—The brig Sarah Louisa, from the Cape de Verds, which came up from Quarantine on Sunday evening, has three live Ostriches on board. Capt. Abbot procured them with some difficulty, for the owner of a caravan of animals. The largest only eight months old, in a natural posture, is nine feet high;—the others are younger and smaller, but seem growing very rapidly. They swallow bones, broken stones, iron nails, &c. with avidity, and the gastric fluid of their stomach, possesses the peculiar property of dissolving them in a short time.—The plumage is at present, rather disordered, as they have plucked each others' feathers, on the passage. The bird has but two toes on the foot; the legs large and white as a man's arm, is a great curiosity of itself. Its eyes are large and vacant, and what is remarkable, the ostrich appears entirely destitute of attachment to its own species, or those who have them in charge. The natives often ride them; and though their wings are too small for flying, their speed over the deserts of their native country, is far greater than the fleetest Arabian horse.

American Traveller.

CURIOUS DISCOVERY.—The Vermont Patriot of the 18th ultimo, says: "We learn that a gentleman in Irasburgh in Orleans county, in this state, while plowing in his field, found, a few days since, what is termed by some, an "iron shirt," the body part of which is made wholly of iron rings linked into each other, about one eighth of an inch in diameter.—The collar is made of brass rings, so closely interwoven as to be perfectly stiff. The proper name of the garment is undoubtedly a "coat of mail," but how it came to Irasburgh, is left to conjecture. It was found, as our informant states, under the stump of a tree, about two feet over, which had become rotten. We have seen several of the rings, which are made of small wire, and appeared to be rivetted together. We are told that the United States' engineers, who are surveying in that region, have procured it, and intend to carry it to New York.

CLERICAL GLADIATORS.—We have heard of disputations at all times and on almost all occasions, but a circumstance which happened in Fall River, last Sabbath, we think leaves them all in the rear. Two pastors, the Rev. Mr. Ross of the Baptist persuasion, and the Rev. Mr. Taylor of the Methodist order, happened to meet upon the shore for the purpose of immersing converts. As it was not convenient for both pastors to proceed with their services at the same time; Elder Ross proceeded with an exhortation, which lauded "some folks," and "some folks" it did not laud; rather leaning towards his own belief, and rather calculated to push those over who did not lean the same way. This rather touched the feelings of the other party, and Mr. Taylor replied; rejoinder followed the reply, and a rebutter followed that which also succeeded by a sur-rejoinder, and the dispute finally reached such a height that most of both congregations withdrew and left the reverend combatants to themselves.—N. Star.

Robbery.—The store of Messrs. J. and C. Gascoigne, dealers in hardware, No. 74 Maiden Lane, New York, was, on Friday night, entered by some villain or villains, and goods to the amount of about $150 stolen. The thieves made their entrance through the door in Liberty-street, by means of a chisel and iron bar, both of which they left in the street near the premises.

It is remarked in the Chronicle, printed in that place, that in Cincinnati, Ohio, although 185 houses were built there in 1826, the number building this year will probably be above three hundred. With all this increase of habitations, there are no tenements to let, and the emigration continues, in a degree equal to the extension and improvement of the place.

Mr. Alfred Allen, son of Mr. Holden Allen, of Black Rock, has recently arrived there from Mexico. He was captured by the Spaniards in 1812, and liberated by the operation of the new Spanish constitution in 1820.

A doctor Walker, a native of Maryland, who had lately located himself in Hertford, N. C. put a period to his existence on the 10th inst. by deliberately taking a knife from among his surgical instruments, with which he divided the carotid artery and the jugular vein, making a wound in the side of the neck about two inches in length. He left a note on the table, bidding his friends in Hertford and his mother, farewell.

The steam-boat Lady of the Lake, was launched on Canandaigua lake, on Saturday the 15th inst. A boat of the same model is building at Ithica, and it is understood one of this kind, will also be built for Seneca lake.

Capt. Patridge has it in contemplation to establish a military school at Rochester.

Two hundred laborers, are wanted on the "Cayuga and Seneca canal."

On the 3d inst. Mr. Allen Sergeant dropped down and expired at the house of his cousin, Mr. D. Sergeant, at Morristown, New Jersey.

At the court of General Sessions, held in Kingston, Ulster county, last week, Frederick F. Johnson, convicted of manslaughter, was sentenced to the state prison for the term of three years. Schoonmaker, a coloured boy, convicted of grand larceny for the term of six years.—N. Y. Enquirer.

Another warning.—On the 19th inst. says the Norwalk (Conn.) Gazette, a young man named Isaac Wardwell, living in Darien, committed suicide by drinking rum! It is stated that after drinking very freely at a store, he returned home, found his father's bottle, drank a pint of the liquor, and not long after expired.

A bloody deed!—A man in this city sent for a respectable Physician the other day to bleed him. When the arm was banded, the doctor asked for something to catch the blood. The usual article for that purpose was afforded, but all refused by the patient, who demand a tumbler. In this he caught the blood with his own hand, and when it was full, after ordering the Doctor to stop the blood, he put the tumbler to his mouth and drank off its contents! On the Doctors' expressing his horror at the deed, the patient said, that he had several times bled himself and got the blood to drink—it was the best physick he could take!—Augusta (Geo.) Courier, Sept. 5.

The Le Roy Gazette, in speaking of the descent of the vessel over Niagara Falls, gives the following anecdote:—One of the publicans who had made preparation for the entertainment of visitors on this occasion, spread a table upon Goat Island, which, to his great satisfaction, soon attracted a goodly number of the lovers of the good things of life. During the repast, he sat quietly ruminating upon the effect which the liberality of an assembly of hungry gormandizers was likely to have upon his purse, when a wag raised the cry, "The Schooner is coming!" No time was to be lost: the guests sprang from their meals and repaired with all possible speed to the opposite shore, leaving for the astonished Mr. Boniface an empty table as the only compensation for his trouble.

Hail pleasing Autumn! hope of man!

• Hast thou return'd once more,
To crown our joys through wisdom's plan,
And spread our tables o'er?

God's bounteous hand, the gran'ries fill,
He makes our cups run o'er:
It is his pleasure and his will,
To bless us ever more.

He clothes the trees with ripen'd fruit,
Delicious to the taste;
How sweet his blessings, (our pursuit,)
To gain them we're in haste.

Our land with milk and honey flows,
The vine, us fruit supplies;
All this for MAN, it plainly shows,
That God is truly wise.

Do not the works of NATURE prove,
To every child of God,
That all things were designed to move,
For his unbounded good.

How grateful, then, ought we to be,
And praise him for his good;
And humbly bow the suppliant knee,
And worship HIM as GOD.

20. Voted, that the Minutes and Circular Letter be published in the Gospel Advocate.

21. Adjourned, to meet at the Centre of York, Livingston county, N. Y. on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in September, 1828.

Prayer and Benediction by br. O. Ackley.

H. SAMPSON, Moderator.

W. I. REESE, Clerk.

CIRCULAR LETTER,

To the Ministers, Delegates; Churches and Societies, belonging to the Genesee Association of Universalists; and to brethren of the Abrahamic faith to whom the grace of God hath appeared.

BELOVED BRETHREN:—God, in his good providence, having again favoured us with an opportunity to meet in annual council, I am instructed to commu-

* Besides the discourses delivered on the days of the session, six others, at different places, were attended in the evenings of Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, in that vicinity. Brs. Sampson, Peck, Whitnall, Everett, and Reese, officiated on those occasions.

nicate to you such intelligence as has been received regarding the advancement of our Zion in the region embraced in the territorial boundaries of this association; and to inform you of what, in the estimation of your brethren of the council, will be promotive of the spread of truth, the establishment of peace, and the increase of righteousness within our borders.

By referring to the minutes of our proceedings, which accompany this letter, you will find that ministering brethren, whose lives are devoted to the cause of Christ, and whose labours are generally approved, owned and blessed, were present on the happy occasion, and took part in the active duties and deliberations of the council. It is with much pleasure that we inform you our consultations were attended with peace. The utmost harmony and good will prevailed during the session, and no root of bitterness was permitted to spring up to mar our happiness or dishonour our profession.

The public exercises of the occasion were characterized by a good degree of perspicuity, a suitable seriousness, and were attended by demonstration and power. The several discourses were heard with devout attention, and apparently, received into good and honest hearts. A respectable congregation attended, and evinced their readiness to hear the truth, and a disposition to improve the word of life by a well ordered conformity to its moral requisitions. Gratitude to God, faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and love to all mankind, seemed to be the predominating emotions in every heart.

Four new societies, which had previously been organized according to law, were received into fellowship; and it was peculiarly gratifying to learn, that each society represented in council, was in a prosperous condition, having been owned and blessed by the Master of assemblies. It is believed that no diminution, but rather an increase of zeal exists among the brethren; and, judging from present appearances, we conclude, that a firm resolution has been very generally adopted by our brethren, to persevere in the good cause of truth and holiness, until our endeavours to emancipate the world from mental bondage, and deliver mankind from sin, misery, ecclesiastical oppression, clerical domination, the slavery of error—the death of the soul, shall be crowned by the God of Israel with a glorious triumph.

The subject of a Convention was deliberately and candidly discussed in council; and a free expression of the sentiments of the brethren was given by an unanimous vote disapprobating the New-York State Convention. It was further voted with but one dissenting voice, that a convention of any kind is not needed under existing circumstances to secure union and harmony among us. It should, however, be remarked, that some are undoubtedly willing, at any time when it shall become expedient, to have a convention or general council organized, provided it could be composed of delegates from the respective associations to be selected by the unrestricted will of their constituents. But any limitations or restrictions upon the freedom of the brethren, will doubtless be repugnant to the feelings of every member of the association, and detrimental to the cause of mental and spiritual liberty.

Delegates were appointed to meet with others from sister associations at Auburn on the third Wednesday in October next, (now present,) to confer on the subject of a convention; and the brethren throughout this part of the heritage, will look with deep solicitude to the result of their deliberations. Much good, it is hoped, will result from a candid consideration of the subject; and it may be confidently expected, that such measures will be recommended, as shall be adapted to the restoration of more perfect harmony among us, and the perpetuation of that unexampled prosperity which has hitherto attended our exertions.

Having adverted to the more important doings of the association, it remains to recommend to the different societies and individuals within the jurisdiction of this association, such measures as in our opinion are calculated to subserve the interests of our Zion.

It is therefore affectionately recommended to the brethren composing the different societies in fellowship, to give increased attention to a wholesome and Christian discipline. Such is the frailty of human nature, that any cause, however good in itself, may suffer from the want of attention to the means necessary to promote good order in societies. Social compacts are designed to promote improvement, a knowledge of the truth, and a growth in grace among the members, by concentrating the wisdom of the wise, and the prudence of the prudent, that an union of the wisdom of the many may be felt by each individual within its influence. Hence, unless the body be kept pure, and a zealous attention be paid to the conduct of each member of a society, the object cannot be obtained.—And beside all this, should a laxity of discipline prevail, the world which has fixed its scrutinizing eye upon us, will be likely to discover our faults and charge them upon the doctrine we profess.

The comparative infancy of our cause, the rapid accession of believers, the diversity of opinion necessarily existing among us in consequence of the prejudices of education, and impressions received in early life, as well as a prevalent and well grounded apprehension, that we, like other denominations, may adopt a too rigid policy, are so many causes of any want of regularity and discipline that may be recognized in our order. But these impediments, it is believed, may be removed by mutual concessions on all subjects of minor importance, and a prudent adaptation of proper means to the great end in view. It is therefore, respectfully suggested, that societies should be composed of such as are truly moral and have the good of the cause at heart. And none should be permitted to take upon themselves the name of Christ, but such as give evidence of sincere intentions to do honour to the profession; for it is not the number, but the character of professors, that constitutes the criterion by which we are to judge of our prosperity.

The moral duties and religious obligations which devolve upon us all, are so generally understood, that in recommending their particular observance it is not necessary to enumerate them. While those who believe in the doctrine of limited grace, feel themselves bound to love God and keep his commandments, how much ought we to strive to walk blameless in all things. Believing, as we do, that God first loved us—that the way of transgressors is hard—that in keeping the commandments there is a great reward—in a word, that virtue and peace, are inseparably connected; how great are the inducements for us to deny ungodliness? We rejoice in believing that a full assent of the mind, to the doctrine we profess, has ever produced the most desirable consequences; and this consoling consideration is esteemed as an earnest of greater improvements in morals and religion than have ever yet been realized.

A liberal support of a preached word, we confidently believe, will be instrumental in promoting the tender charities of Christianity. Thus believing, it becomes a duty to recommend to your particular attention your ministering brethren. It is not our desire that you should injure yourselves or them, by an injudicious bestowment of your temporal favours; but after having satisfied yourselves of their usefulness in building up the cause of God and of truth, it is your duty to see that their wants are supplied.

No man can deny that preachers of the impartial grace of God are called to endure reproach and many indignities on account of their profession; nor will it be pretended that, as a class of people, they aspire after forbidden emoluments. Be entreated then, brethren, to feed them when hungry, to clothe them with the products of your flocks, when necessary; and, by your suitably generous gifts, keep them from an exposure to the untold mortifications and miseries of uncommiserated indigence. By so doing you will enable them, with more devotedness, with more confidence, and with more resolution, to combat the unseemly errors of the world, and propagate the sublime doctrines and precepts of the gospel of God.

Finally, brethren, we presume to tender you our regard and unabated affection; praying Almighty Love to bless you with all temporal and spiritual blessings. May you each and all, enjoy the smiles of your Redeemer from day to day, until the year shall have brought about another happy anniversary convocation; then, if Heaven permit, may we again be allowed to confirm each other's hope in God; from thence forward, from year to year, may our faith in impartial goodness be more and more established, until, when called to bid adieu to sublunary things, we may, without a doubting emotion, tread with joy and confidence the valley of the shadow of death, and, realizing all our blissful expectations, go home to our God, our Father, and our eternal Friend.

By order of the Association. L. S. EVERETT.

There is nothing in the world really beneficial, that does not lie within the reach of an informed understanding, and a well directed pursuit. There is nothing that God has judged good for us that he has not given us the means to accomplish both in the natural and moral world.—Burke.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

MR. EDITOR,

The following extract from "The Mutual Rights," &c. a work published in Baltimore, by the reformed Methodists, breathes so much liberality and good sense, that I think it will be profitable to the readers of the Advocate, and hence forward it for insertion. The work is in opposition to Episcopacy, and is ably conducted. After making some remarks for the purpose of calling the publick attention to the subject, and pointing out the evils arising from personal influence in the establishment of church discipline instead of forming "our decision according to the quality of the subject and the conclusiveness of the evidence," the author observes:—If the above account of reform be correct, then, while truth is in progress, enlightening the publick mind, the work is substantially going on. In due time it will produce its practical effects: an alteration will take place in the publick will, and the community will feel itself prepared to act, in the production of all wholesome amendments to church government. We need not be uneasy because such amendments are not now made, nor be anxious concerning the time when they shall be made; for while truth is in a state of advancement, and a disposition is kept up in the publick to appreciate, and defend good principles, the cause is safe, and is most surely tending to its consummation.

"The business of reformers is one and undivided. Does it consist in confining our attention solely to a lay delegation, as though the whole cause of reform consisted in this alone? No: it consists in the illustration and defence of all righteous principles, by a proper exhibition of truth to the human understanding. A lay delegation is one of its principles, but not the only one; and this should be kept in constant conjunction with the great axioms which are essential to a genuine reformation. That the reader may have the subject before him, in one view, let us here lay down seventeen propositions, all essentially included in the cause of reform.

I. Proposition. "The written word of God is the only rule, and the sufficient rule, both of our FAITH and PRACTICE"—Methodist Discipline, page 80.

II. Truth will never contradict itself, and a candid attention to evidence will never give error an advantage over it in any intelligent mind; therefore, the supposition, that it is dangerous for people to use their reason, in a candid attention to evidence, is utterly false, and may be justly regarded as an invention of ecclesiastical tyranny.

III. It is the right and the duty of every man attentively and can idly to inform his mind as extensively as he can, concerning all subjects on which his happiness depends.

IV. It is the right and the duty of every man, after finding the truth, or honestly believing he has found it, to use all the means in his power that are calculated to communicate a knowledge of it to his fellow creatures.

V. All civil or ecclesiastical attempts to take away those rights from any man, or any number of men, are tyrannical; and such tyranny is UNJUST, UNREASONABLE, and IRRELIGIOUS.

VI. BIGOTRY and PARTIALITY are constituent principles of MORAL EVIL, contrary to true religion, and as inconsistent with all Christian morality, as PRIDE, ENVY or COVETOUSNESS.

VII. All that course of STRATAGEM or policy which aims to conceal the truth from men, by taking advantage of their ignorance, their passions or their fears, has in it the essence of LYING, and ought to be discouraged among all people, as having a pernicious influence upon the best interests of society.

VIII. The kingdom of the Lord Jesus is not of this world; its design is to subdue the malevolent affections of man, to transform him into the divine nature, and thus to fit him for eternal happiness; therefore, all attempts to change our Saviour's system of religious discipline, and to convert it into a temporal or worldly dominion, are utterly unchristian, and destructive of the gracious ends he had in view in coming into the world.

IX. The church should be subject to Christ in every thing, and be governed by HIS LAW to the end of the world; there being no human authority to make any other rules and regulations, in the church, than such by-laws as are necessary to carry into effect the essential laws of Christianity.

X. Gospel ministers are not only publick teachers of religious truth, but also executive officers, authorized to govern the church, by rightfully executing the law of Christ, and such by-rules as are necessary to carry it into effect together with an equitable proportion of legislative authority. The church has no right to give her ministers higher authority than this, and they have no right to any such assumption. For them to assume undue veneration, derived solely from their office, regardless of the rectitude of character, is one among the most wicked and dangerous impositions upon mankind.

XI. Private members of the church as well as ministers, have a right to an agency in making all Christian rules and regulations by which they are to be governed; because they have a right to maintain and guard the privileges granted to them by their benevolent Redeemer.

XII. For ministers or members of the church to be arrested by the lawless caprice of an officer, or expelled without being convicted of the breach of any law, is an abandonment of all church government, and may be regarded as the most tyrannical concentration of anarchy and despotism.

XIII. All ecclesiastical bodies are responsible to God, in their social capacity, for their official acts; and for them to make laws for the expulsion of members not founded upon the law of Christ, is to act upon independent authority, and officially to renounce their allegiance to the Supreme Governor of the church.

XIV. All people who believe the record which God gave of his Son, and who, from the influence of that faith sincerely labour to obey the gospel, are Christ's true disciples, and ought to be acknowledged; therefore, all sectarian policy, legislation or intrigue, intended merely to rival, degrade or destroy other Christian sects, is unchristian, and ought to be discouraged in every religious denomination.

XV. Ignorance and error are the great promoters of sin and misery among mankind; and the maxim that general ignorance is advantageous, as the mother of devotion, had its origin in the darkest regions of ecclesiastical despotism and imposition.

XVI. It is possible for publick investigation or controversy to be carried on without being connected with bitter and malignant passions; and such discussion for controversy, rightly conducted, far from being injurious, is highly beneficial to mankind.

XVII. The human mind in its intellectual inquiries, has a right to progress without any restrictions other than those of truth and evidence; all religious truth is to be ascertained and determined by the light of reason and revelation, which should never be suspended or set aside by the mere decisions of human authority."

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

In my last, I purposed further to notice some of the proceedings at the Bible Class meetings in this village. The passage introduced on the evening following, for explanation, now to be noticed, is recorded in Rom. vi. 1 th. "Therefore, as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." Time would fail me to notice all the exertions, the indefatigable zeal manifested at this time to evade the obvious meaning of the passage. I will, however, notice a little of the minister's ingenuity; and in doing this, I shall endeavour not to misrepresent, but will notice the import or substance of his argument.

It was admitted by the minister, that the term all in the 18th verse, signified all men without exception; but then we were not to infer that all those who were included in the last clause of the verse would receive that abundance of grace, and gift of righteousness which effects complete and ultimate salvation. To make this appear, he has reference to the preceding verse—"For if, by one man's offence, death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one Jesus Christ." "Now," says the minister, "who are they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness? Christians. Now, are we to infer that all men, or sinners, will receive abundance of grace because Christians do? Are we to infer this? When the apostle says, 'They which receive abundance of grace;' meaning Christians, shall we infer that all receive abundance of grace because Christians do?"

Now the reader will perceive that the object of the minister seems to be to impress on the minds of the hearers, that the terms—"they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness," &c. implies a complete salvation; but are applicable only to the elect, or to a part of the human family: notwithstanding, all the apostle had said in the rest of the chapter to the contrary: notwithstanding the apostle expressed the matter in terms which could not be misunderstood, that those who were made sinners by the disobedience of Adam, should be made righteous by the obedience of Christ. But the words—"They which receive abundance of grace," &c. is only applicable to a part of the human family; and the whole scope of the apostle's reasoning must bend to this parenthetical verse—this verse which the minister understands as being only applicable to a part of mankind; and which is one of the five verses which the apostle includes in a parenthesis. Now, Esq Webster says, that "a parenthesis includes a part of a sentence which is not necessary to make sense, and should be read quicker and in a weaker tone of voice." But the minister has turned the thing upside down. He will have the greatest stress laid upon the parenthetical reading; nay, all that follows after must bend to it; and having taken for granted that the words "They which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one Jesus Christ," is applicable only to a part of mankind; he now gives his decision that the apostle has not the least reference to universal salvation.

It is true that the apostle said in the last parenthetical verse, "Much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one Jesus Christ;" but why does it follow that this language is confined to a certain few? What other language could the apostle employ, suppose for instance, he meant that the whole human family would receive abundance of grace? (which seems to be the case from the context.) If the answer be, that instead of saying "much more they which receive abundance of grace," &c he could have said,—much more shall the whole human family receive abundance of grace; I answer, the apostle has expressed it in plainer terms in the rest of the chapter. No honest man can deny this. It reads for itself and needs no comment. The apostle plainly tells who those are, who shall "receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness," and "shall reign in life by one Jesus Christ," in the following words: "Therefore, as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; Even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon ALL men UNTO JUSTIFICATION OF LIFE. For as by one man's disobedience many;" Who? the preceding verse expresses it, ALL, "were made sinners, so by the obedience of one, shall many" (the same many) "be made RIGHTEOUS." Moreover the law entered that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded grace did much more abound. That as sin hath reigned unto death even so might grace reign through righteousness unto ETERNAL LIFE by Jesus Christ our Lord." The sentiment here advanced by the Apostle seems to be clear and conclusive, that wherever sin abounds in the human family that there grace should superabound. But says an upstart without a moment's reflection: If this is the doctrine of the Apostle and the doctrine be true, I will indulge myself in all manner of wickedness; no matter how much I sin, I shall be saved, grace will superabound sin. This hasty conclusion which many are ready to draw, the Apostle seems to have anticipated. He interrogates, "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?" That the Apostle believed that grace would superabound sin wherever it existed, is evident from his interrogation as well as from his language which precedes it. If this is not the case why did he assert it? And why did he thus interrogate, if he believed endless misery would follow the person who should continue in sin, would he not have thus interrogated? Shall we continue in sin that endless misery may abound? But no, the Apostle says, "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? God forbid." The Apostle, after informing his Roman brethren of the situation of the whole human family—the purpose of God in redeeming or delivering them from the bondage of sin; he now appeals to his believing brethren: "How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" May all who profess the faith of this Apostle, the impartial grace of God, be so dead to sin, as to cease to live any longer therein; knowing that "In keeping" (and not for keeping) "his commands there is great reward." A. C.

The necessity of being absent to attend the Cayuga Association, will serve as an apology for the want of the usual quantity of original matter for our paper this week. The extracts from "Mutual Rights," are worthy of attention. ED.

MISCELLANY.

FROM THE NEW-YORK ENQUIRER.

PHILANTHROPY.

Soft peace she brings wherever she arrives,
She builds our quiet as she forms our lives;
Lays the rough paths of peevish nature even,
And opens in each breast a little heaven.

Prior.

The love of mankind is a feeling which is calculated to allay in that bosom which entertains it, many of the angry passions which tear the heart of the misanthropist, or even of an individual whose thoughts and energies are all concentrated upon self, and the little circle of child, brother, parent and friend. Philanthropy, if guarded by frequent reflection and study of human nature, opens to the mind new, ever-varying, perpetual and satisfactory enjoyments. It even enables us, by its ennobling qualities, by the fearless independence of mind which it creates, and by the conscious importance it establishes in our every action, to grow for ever more intelligent, industrious and cheerful, and consequently to act in private business with more acuteness and success. It is those individuals, male and female, who have occasionally stepped forth from the little routine of their money making concerns, to look abroad upon the evils in society, and study their alleviation—who have reared our hospitals, prisons, houses of refuge, infant schools, our laws and our government.

What would have been the present state of society if there never had been an Alfred, Justinian, Howard, Wilberforce, Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Pestalozzi, Lancaster, Eddy, and a host of living philanthropists, the reformers, the ornaments of the human race, and partakers of the purest bliss which any occupation of amusement could bestow. No innovator upon the dull round of selfish employments and habits ever found many to agree with him until the innovation had poured its genial beams upon the mountain and vale, into the lakes, dells and deepest caverns of the human mind and compelled the mass of mankind (who always oppose improvements) either to admit the excellence of the alteration, or deny that the sun shines at mid-day. This age may justly be termed the age of truth. The spirit of investigation has burst from its thralldom of centuries. The chains which are flung from its giant limbs may crush surrounding aristocrats, kings, courtiers, and jugglers. By the term this age, I do not confine my view to this year or century. The first moment of the age of truth is dated when the great Columbus first thought of a western world. Alone, this great man had in his mind a passing thought, a vague glimpse of the then wonderful future events which thought was the germe of the present order of things. He begged the jewels from a woman's waist to enable him to equip a vessel to discover those territories, which would have made the fortunes of the nations of Europe. But mere money-makers were then as now. Their minds cramped, their mental energies enervated by luxury and superstition, and by the daily, dull, mill-horse operations of their contemptible occupations. They were, and are now, superficial thinkers, and nothing but a change of habits, and the lapse of a sufficient length of time to establish new habits of body and mind, could have restored to their thoughts that clearness and independence, and that moral courage which would have enabled them to investigate the world around them and its doctrines, detect absurdity and error, proclaim truth in the teeth of tyranny, ignorance, prejudice and folly, and triumph by making knowledge enlighten the darkest places in the moral world, and shine and warm and enliven all nations like the glorious orb of day by its effects, defying all disputes about its existence, Columbus conducted a trembling superstitious crew to a new continent, a new people, a new congregation of nations, spread over a vast theatre of fields, forests, mountains, lakes, rivers, seas and islands, embracing every clime and every species of savage society, from the stunted Esquimaux shrouded in rein deer skins amongst eternal ice and snows at the north pole, to the southern extremity of the globe, in a line in the centre of which the enervated Mexican reposed in fragrant groves of the lemon and orange, sheltered from the burning airs of the Equator. Under the banner of the cross came the Catholick and the Protestant across the extended wilderness of waves, and drove by the artillery of Europe, the sons of the forest into the western caves and prairies. On their usurped territories the towns and cities of civilized and luxurious man reared to the skies their proud spires and steeples. The slaves of European tyrants and bigots having seized a new and grander world and destroyed its sea coast population, became invigorated, enlightened and emboldened; they declared in defiance of English cannon and the ravings of Kings and priestly prelates, that a l men were born free and equal, and that this beautiful world was made for all God's created beings and not for a few. They laid the foundation of civil and religious freedom, amid the thunder of despot armies, and bathed it in their blood as they fell victims to their stern virtues. On the 4th of July, 1776, they lit the beacon of truth, whose beams are now enlightening the world and awakening man to the estimation of his natural rights. From that moment the fountains of knowledge have poured forth their streams in the moral world upon the surface of human folly, first drowning the herbage of vice and the insects of crime. The greater species of the race had began to fly for shelter to the rocks, hills and cliffs of ignorant and bigot minds. Ere long there will be no resting place for absurdity, ignorance, superstition and the consequent human misery, when "a shoreless ocean" of truth will "tumble round the globe." Science with its wand is touching many human institutions, and much that ages have consecrated to holiness and power, is becoming trifling and preposterous a jest and a bye word. Human labour is lessening, and mind is making machines of wood and stone, and iron, and steam, and air to do our drudgery, to fabricate our clothing and convey us from place to place. Fools have been ambitious of immense wealth, power, distinction, of sceptres, coronets, mitres, stars, garters and crowns, the baubles of an ignorant rabble, of creatures who are born, vegetate and rot.—What the military conqueror who enslaves nations has looked up to, as almost above his reach, in the regions of fancy and too much for human nature to soar to, viz. the applause of a world, the philanthropist from his elevation now looks down upon as the vulgar noise of unthinking millions, as too degrading for him to receive. He spurns it, as a loathsome thing. His aim not individual aggrandizement, but the happiness of the whole human race.

OBSERVER.

We would seriously invite our readers to peruse with attention, the following great question now pending in the Court of South Carolina. It involves a principle which, if recognized in this country, would go directly to disfranchise a very large body of respectable people. It would erect our courts of justice into inquisitorial tribunals, and tarnish the reputation we have hitherto maintained of sustaining a Jurisprudence founded on equity.—It would pollute the streams of justice at their fountain, and drive us into the arms of the self styled orthodox, whether we would or not. Besides the ravages it would make upon our rights and privileges, it would cramp the energies of intellect, and oblige us either to renounce our views of a God of universal goodness, whose providence is alike over all men, or submit to that denial of justice which the question involves.—Olive Branch.

The question whether the oath of a person denying the doctrine of future rewards and punishments is valid in law, was argued in the Court of Equity in Union District, S. C. last week. His Honour, Judge de Saurree on the bench. The case was one of importance, and the pleading on both sides, eloquent and learned, embracing it is said, every possible view of the subject. The person, whose testimony is questioned, is Mr Charles Jones, a gentleman with whom the editor has the pleasure to be personally and intimately acquainted. He is a man of wealth, and respectability, and one whose character for uprightness and integrity bids defiance to the world. Such is the common report, and contradicted by none—however strange it may appear, there is no doubt that the very persons who are opposing the admission of his testimony in a court of justice, could select no man, on whose veracity they would more readily rely. We speak not this to flatter Mr. Jones, the community in which he resides will freely acquit us of any such intention, from their knowledge of his character. We speak but to show the absurdity of human conduct, where interest stands opposed to principle, and the oppression and downright tyranny always engendered by the slightest possible connexion between religion and civil law. The decree of the Court has not been divulged. We understand that whatever the decree may be, the case will be carried up to the Court of Appeals, for a final decision.

We cannot but hope that for the honour, the peace and quietness of the State; for the honour of its laws, and its judiciary department, the question will be decided favourably to our persecuted brethren. If not, the consequences will be serious, if not awful. In addition to the degradation of free born citizens, to a rank little above that of slaves, there are many reasons why its operation would be greatly to be deprecated. There are thousands of persons in this state, believing in no future rewards and punishment; and among them, a full share of gentlemen of Wealth, Talents, and Respectability. These persons collect debts on book account; they cannot act as jurors, nor officers under the government, they can neither lend legal aid to protect others from fraud, nor protect themselves. In short, a decision against them would deprive them of the privileges of freemen, expose them to the malignity, abuse and craft of the most abandoned wretches, and place them in circumstances to which, we do not believe, any body of American citizens ought to, or will, quietly submit. Publick functionaries may think it a light business, but should they decide against us, they may find it a more serious one than they are aware of. S.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Perpetual Motion.—Mr. Lewis Babcock, a watchmaker at Ware Factory Village, has constructed a machine of brass, of about eighteen inches high and ten inches wide, which has the power of winding itself up once in five minutes, by means of a spring lever, that falls instantly, without diminishing or retarding the power of the machine. When put together it commences motion immediately, without any starting cause, and moves a pendulum at about the same rate of a clock pendulum. We are informed that it has now been running about five weeks incessantly; and several distinguished mechanics who have seen it, say that they see no reason to hinder its running perpetually, until it is worn out. The ingenious inventor intends taking it to Washington the approaching winter.—Springfield Rep.

Law intelligence extraordinary.—Yesterday, at the Court of Sessions now holding in this city, Garrett Simmons, a stout and rather good looking white man, was arraigned for stealing a chemise. At the same time, Susan Grew, a bold faced damsel, was arraigned for stealing a pair of pantalons. The eccentric taste of these rogues excited no little merriment in the audience, which was much enhanced by the sheepish manner in which Simmons plead guilty of his ungallant crime, and the brazen faced boldness with which Mrs. Grew admitted she took the breeches, but denied she stole them.

The result demonstrated that Garret was the honestest thief of the two. Susan was convicted, and each were sent three months to imprisonment at hard labour, where the state will supply their wants, in a manner more appropriate to their respective sexes than they evinced in making their own selections.—Phila. Sent.

Worthy of Record.—I observed in a newspaper a few days since something like the following: A gentleman in company with a friend had his butcher's bill presented; he paid it promptly and observed—"I will have no more butcher's meat in my house this year." How so says his friend it is now the beginning of the year? "I will pay for it when I get it—then it will be my meat." [How many read the printer's papers?]

Hudson and Delaware Canal.—The Sullivan Whig says, that the late breach, which was not as bad as has been stated, has been repaired, and a boat passed through since, from the Delaware to the Hudson. Several boats have also cleared from Wurtsborough, for the purpose of taking out wood, lumber, &c.—So that the canal can be said to be in ample order for use.

Donald McDonald, a Scotchman, who is said be 105 years of age, was sentenced to the house of correction on Monday as a common drunkard. He had but just finished a six months sojourn there. When a man gets drunk at the age of 100, he must be incorrigible.—Boston Patriot.

Commodore Tingey who has had the command of the naval station at Washington for nearly twenty five years, took his seat on Monday last as a member of the Board of Navy Commissioners, to which seat he has been preferred.

Yellow Fever at New-Orleans.—The New-Orleans Advertiser of the 7th inst says, that "though the prevailing yellow fever be unusually mild in its character, yet the bills of mortality show that it is fatal in many instances. During the week ending on the 2nd inst. there were 21 interments in the Protestant Burying Ground, 14 of which were cases of yellow fever. There was also a considerable number of interments in the Catholic ground during the same period; and though the diseases are not mentioned in the public reports, yet some to our knowledge, were yellow fever cases of a malignant kind."

THE BIRTH OF LIGHT.

Like the tempest's wreath round the mountains curl'd—

Night's mantle of mist was thrown over the world;

Whirling around in the abyss of space,

It's huge dark form, void of feature or grace

Roll'd alone in the sphere of its birth,

Ere the thunderer spoke into being, the earth.

Around it was flowing the waters of ocean,

With a wild, and sullen, irregular motion;

Within it the voice of the Volcan was speaking.

Whilst the fire of its breath, its dark mantle was streaking;

Above it, in light, was the God of its being,

Alone, in the greatness of self, the all-seeing.

Hark! the mountains leap, rejoicing,

At that wild and mellow voicing;

Stills the ocean, in its rushing,

As that melody is gushing;

Lo! the Volcan, stays his thunder,

And his red-eyes ope in wonder;

Earth in all her parts rejoices,

With her myriad of voices;

O'er the eastern realm is streaking,

Hues of white, like lightning breaking;

Now the ocean drinks it splendour,

Shining bolder, and less tender.

Now the mountains form a cluster;

To receive the rising lustre;

Now the vallies hail the morn,

Earth rejoices—Light is born!

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CAYUGA ASSOCIATION.

The Ministers and Delegates composing the Cayuga Association of Universalists, convened in Venice, (formerly Scipio,) on the first Wednesday and Thursday of October, 1827, and organized the council by choosing br. L. S. Everett, Moderator; br. O. A. Brownson, Clerk, and br. Nelson Doolittle, Assistant Clerk. Prayer by br. Whitnall.

Ministers present.—John S. Flagler, Scipio; Isaac Whitnall, Marcellus; Calvin Morton, Barre; L. S. Everett, Auburn; William I. Reese, Mendon; Orestes A. Brownson, Litchfield; J. B. Shannon, Macdonough; Nelson Doolittle, Berkshire; H. D. Davis, Washington, Dutchess county.

BUSINESS OF THE COUNCIL.

Proceeded to read the letters and examine the certificates of delegates from the societies in fellowship.—Received as members of the council, from Marcellus, John Shepherd, Chester Clark and Robert Earl; from Virgil, Ebenezer Burges; from Caroline, Aaron Legg and Samuel Ball; from Fleming, Samuel Gregory and Zimri Allen; from Homer, Merrick; Sempronius; Auburn, George Standart.

Received brs. J. S. Flagler and O. A. Brownson, who had previously withdrawn, into the fellowship of the Association.

Appointed brs. Flagler, Whitnall and Morton, a committee to receive requests for letters of fellowship or ordination.

Accepted the report of the committee of Discipline for the last year. No cases of misconduct or complaint had come before them.

Appointed brs. J. S. Flagler and L. S. Everett, the committee of Discipline for the ensuing year.

Took a recess for publick worship.

Evening—met and adjourned to 8 o'clock, Thursday morning. Prayer by br. Whitnall.

Thursday—met according to adjournment, and opened the council with solemn prayer by br. Morton.

Appointed brs. Flagler, Whitnall and Standart a committee to consider the propriety of the third article of the constitution of this association.

This committee presented the following report, which was accepted:—

Whereas, by the third article of the constitution of this association, all ministers of the gospel in regular standing, of this or any other Universalist association, are entitled to a seat in our council; and whereas, in the opinion of your committee, each and every association is an independent body;

Therefore resolved, It is manifestly improper to grant this privilege in all cases which may come before the association.

Resolved, therefore, 2nd. That the third article of the constitution be and the same is hereby annulled; and in future no minister not resident within the territorial limits of this association, shall be entitled to any vote when the vote requires the decision of more than one association.

Voted unanimously, That this association does not approve the New-York State Convention of Universalists as it now exists.

Voted unanimously, That this association will not sustain the proposed or any other convention in this state.

Voted to send four delegates, two ministers and two laymen, to express the sense of this association, to the conference to set at Auburn, on the third Wednesday and Thursday in October, 1827.

Appointed J. S. Flagler, L. S. Everett, Genl. R. Earl and G. Standart, to be that delegation.

Appointed visiting committees to the several associations in this state. To the Genesee, N. Doolittle; to the Central, L. S. Everett; to the Chenango, J. S. Flagler; to the Black River, J. S. Flagler and L. S. Everett.

Voted, That the several societies in fellowship with this association be requested to report to its next session, what are their particular numbers and situation or prospects.

Appointed brs. Flagler, Everett and Standart, a committee to consider the propriety of adopting a new mode of delegation from the societies, and report to the next session.

Voted, That the minutes of this association be published in the Gospel Advocate at Auburn.

Voted, That br. O. A. Brownson prepare the minutes for publication and append a Circular.

Adjourned to meet in Sempronius on the first Wednesday and Thursday in October, 1828.

Thanksgiving for the protecting kindness of Our Most High returned by br. Flagler.

Note. The ministering brethren would, in their individual capacity, express their grateful sense of the kind liberality of the friends which so cheerfully supplied their wants and cheered their hearts. May the smiles of a beneficent Creator continue to rest upon them, guide them through life, and at last accept them with the ransomed family to enjoy him in his kingdom forever and ever.

CIRCULAR LETTER.

To the believers in the unbounded goodness of Jehovah; to all the friends of free inquiry, of liberality of feeling and universal philanthropy; to all the sons and daughters of Adam whatever be their hopes and fears. THE CAYUGA ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS send Christian salutation and fraternal affection.

BRETHREN:—Under the auspices of a kind and beneficent Father, we have enjoyed an other annual convocation. Our hearts were rejoiced, our minds edified and our souls drawn out in gratitude to Almighty God for his loving kindness. Our meeting was harmonious. The business of the council was dispatched with promptitude, without the least jar or discordant voice. The publick services were solemn and listened to attentively by a large and respectable concourse of people. The declarations of God's unbounded benevolence, which will judge the world in righteousness, the progress of the human mind, and the signs of improvement, the gift of eternal life, and the prospect of future felicity, were received with apparent joy by the waiting multitude.

The cause of universal philanthropy is fast acquiring friends in this section of country. Some convulsions are observable among those whose minds retain the narrow and illiberal notions of former ages, but they are little more than the agitations of the waves after a storm and will soon we hope subside in a calm.

The time seems to have arrived when the human mind, bound for so many ages, may regain its independence. This is all that is wanting to make our land the paradise of God. Bigotry and superstition have degraded man and made him a prey to the worst of tyrants—the usurpers of conscience. But Brethren, the time is come when we must labour to liberate conscience from its former abject slavery, to give it an elevated character, which shall prompt a more noble piety to God, and a more dignified and benevolent conduct towards our fellow-men.

Our country is highly favoured. Liberty, driven from the courts of Europe has taken up her residence here, but we fear she may fall beneath a petty religious creed, or become the vassal of clerical domination. Europe, will regain her independence and regard the original equality of the human family. Let the good citizens of these United States be on their guard lest at that time they be what Europe has been.

To the believers of Universal Salvation, we say, your doctrines rest upon eternal truth for their support, and should be maintained with a liberality of feeling, correspondent with the ubiquity of that God, in whom you trust, and to the extensiveness of that felicity which you believe he will confer on the human race. To our shame be it spoken there are Universalists, who retain all the bigotry of the twelfth, amid the improvements of the 19th century. Every well instructed Universalist wishes for the spread of his doctrine, but he wishes it only, as he believes it will be the most successful means of ameliorating the condition of the human family, of inspiring them with that kindness of affection, with that tender solicitude for each other's welfare, which it has been the effect of former notions to destroy.

Other denominations have laboured to concentrate their forces and bring them to bear simultaneously upon the publick mind. There is danger they may for a time injure our free institutions. But popularity acquired by such means is short-lived. Let Universalists be cautious about following the footsteps of their predecessors. We need no extraordinary exertions to support our sentiments. Leave truth in the free exercise of her own powers and success will crown her efforts. If Universalists pursue the course which others have, they will like them become sectarians, and the advantages anticipated from the spread of our sentiments will be lost.

To the preachers of the "faith once delivered to the saints," the writer of this, is too young to presume to say much. But they will permit him to say, brethren, your doctrine is the friend of humanity. It is calculated to elevate the human character and to have a salutary influence on the morals of society; be cautious that no misguided zeal destroy its utility. Our sentiments teach us to be grateful to God and benevolent to men. So far as they lead to this result we are to enforce them, but no farther. We are the watchmen of Zion, and should be the guardians of publick virtue. We must therefore encourage free inquiry; we must remember that we are dissenters from former notions, and it will be absurdity itself for us to establish a creed and presume to censure another if his mind cannot come to it, or if it should chance to go beyond it.

Brethren, morality must be the test of a man's character, and if we wish for the peace and harmony of society, we must use our influence to destroy contentions about faith, and place the whole inquiry in, who shall add most to the happiness of mankind, by relieving the oppressed, by guiding the youth in the way of moral virtue, and by smoothing the decipitude of age!

Brethren, may we all be faithful. May the God of Heaven prosper our cause, and grant us wisdom to discharge our numerous responsibilities—grant us peace of mind while here, and eternal felicity not only to us but to the whole family of man in that world "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

By order, O. A. BROWNSON.

From the London Examiner.

Joint Stock Salvation Company.—At the Gospel Tract Society Meeting, (London,) the Rev. Mr. Evanson was facetious on the subject of a Joint Stock Company to buy shares in "Purgatory." "There was actually, he knew as a fact, a society of this kind in full vigour in Dublin. Each shareholder, by paying a penny a week, purchased a right of having so many masses said for himself, and so many others for his relatives. The first mass was to be celebrated on his death; the second a month afterwards; the next at the end of four months; and finally, there was one twelve months after his death, by which time it was calculated the soul of the poor shareholder might possibly be released. By a curious arrangement, the relatives were to benefit in the following order:—Fathers first, and afterwards mothers, husbands, wives, brothers, and sisters uncles, aunts. This story was positively true. He did not state it to raise a smile, though it had produced that effect. Such was the state to which Ireland was reduced by Popery—gulled, not only out of their pence, but out of their salvation also."

The foregoing is republished in the Albany Christian Register of the 6th inst. We would thank the erudite editor to inform his readers wherein it differs from the true condition of the "Joint Stock Salvation Companies" of America! The Dublin establishment was designed to save souls from hell; and the National Tract, and other Societies of the kind, are instituted for the same purpose. Stock in either may be obtained for certain sums in cash. Surely, the people of Ireland are "gulled out of their pence" and their present salvation; and the people of America are cheated out of their cash and their reason too, we believe, by pretended soul-savers!—ED. ### ADVOCATE AND INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTEND FOR THE FAITH."

"ALBANY CHRISTIAN REGISTER"—AGAIN.

☞ "It was said of Pierpont Edwards, once in hearing Murray, the celebrated universalist preach, at the close of his sermon, that he would give half of his fortune to have the doctrine true, but that he would flog a son of his for a dunce, who should attempt to prove it either by scripture or common sense."

The Albany Christian Register of the 29th ultimo, has disgorged itself upon us; and we are induced to notice its assertions, (for argument seems not to belong to the editor's vocabulary,) and to rebut them with such facts as shall place in a proper light its attempts to darken the publick mind. We enter upon the task, not with the expectation of convincing its editor of the "error of his ways," (for that would be presumptuous,) but with the humble hope of opening the eyes of the publick, that the "whole world" may see the condition of modern orthodoxy.

The above extract stands at the head of the article to which we allude, and serves, (with the editor of the Register,) as a substitute for a "thus saith the Lord." The extract itself is no more than is frequently expressed by "limitarians" of all grades—from the conceited and sanctimonious parson, down to the "squalid and bloated objects who are staggering under their filth and dirt,"—or, we may add—those objects of commiseration who tenant our prison. But it is proper that we inquire who the individual is, whose declaration is quoted by the Register, as expressive of the sentiments of the limitarians. Is it the language of God? of his prophets? of Christ or the apostles? Did the sentiment drop from the lips of a man eminent for his humility, his piety, or his godliness? We desire an answer. Shame upon your duplicity, Mr. Hoffman! Your oracle, if we mistake not, was more famous for his libertine principles—his profanity, his impiety,—not to say abhorrence of every thing good, than for his knowledge of God or sense of moral (much less religious) obligations to his fellow men!! The opinions of Pierpont Edwards, then, are pressed into the service of our opponents, forsooth,—to show that a child ought to be flogged for attempting to prove Universalism true by scripture or common sense! Orthodoxy, thou art mad!

But, setting aside the source from whence the sentiment emanated, we are not a little puzzled to conceive how a child, so depraved as children are represented to be by our opponents, could be censured for attempting to prove a doctrine true, which, (if what they say be correct,) is so congenial with the "natural heart!" Nor can we tell how the oracle of Mr. Hoffman could feel himself justified in flogging a son for trying to prove the truth of a doctrine which his godly father would give "half his fortune" to have substantiated! A dutiful child should try to please his parent,—but orthodoxy is always inconsistent!

Having noticed Mr. Hoffman's text, we proceed to notice his discourse; which we shall present to the reader in detached portions, the better to exhibit its true character. The editor, in view of the remark of the great Mr. Edwards, proceeds as follows:

"Believing this to be about a fair exposition of the manner in which the doctrine is held by those who will take the trouble to put two and two together, we would offer it as a reason why we have not before noticed the "certain mysteries" propounded to us by the learned editor of the Gospel Advocate. At present, it appears, we have fallen under the rebuke of its editor, for extracting from the "Anti-universalist," an article entitled "Tardy the pirate, in heaven." With the editor's permission, we must confess, that the reasoning in the article in question, did strike us as entitled to republication, both on account of its originality, and because we did believe the premises assumed, were correct."

Those, then, "who will take the trouble to put two and two together," may take the sentiments of Pierpont Edwards for a reason why Mr. Hoffman has not before noticed "certain mysteries" proposed to him by our humble self! Admirable! The "mysteries" to which the Register alludes, are certain facts given in reply to a "passing remark" of his own, in his paper of the 9th of June last, contained in our 25th number; in which we enumerated a variety of instances of crimes of the most abhorrent kind, having been committed by persons under the immediate influence of the doctrine of endless misery! Mr. H. promised a reply to those facts; but at this late period, we are called upon to put two and two together, and then, to take the ridiculous sentiments of a libertine as a reason why the Register has so long neglected to reply ! But we will endeavour to accommodate Mr. Hoffman, by putting two and two together according to our best knowledge of the "limitarian" arithmetick. "The Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God, and yet there are not three Gods, but one God !" See Athanasian Creed, &c. "With the editor's permission, we must confess that the reasoning in the article in question, did strike us as entitled"—to a smile from every man of common sense !

"We would confess still farther, (the "certain mysteries" of which the Advocate will probably explain) that to associate together the names of Judas and Paul, Herod and John, and a host of others, as uniting in the worship of Him, whom one sought to destroy, and the other betrayed, would be to ascribe that injustice to the Deity, which we will venture to say the erudite editor of the Advocate would pointedly condemn in a tribunal governed by human wisdom. Why should men enact laws for the good government of the social world, and then attempt to put to shame the "Author of every good," by declaring his statutes to be neither based upon propriety, consistency, or justice ? It is a golden rule here on earth, to make man responsible for the acts (overt only) committed by him, and to distinguish between a good and bad citizen. Does it come within the pale of common sense, (setting aside its blasphemy) to say that the Almighty, as Creator, has endowed the works of his hands, with a virtue he is not possessed of Himself.—This must be the fair inference."

Why are we accused of associating together the names of Judas and Paul, Herod and John, as uniting in the worship of God or his Son ? Mr. Hoffman's insinuation to that effect is entirely "gratuitous." True, Judas betrayed his Master, and Herod sought to destroy the child Jesus; but we have never said that either, in their sinful character, could ever praise the Lord. On the contrary, it is a fundamental principle with us, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." For the especial benefit of Mr. H. we assure him, (his assertions to the contrary notwithstanding) that we hold to the necessity and utility of repentance; and that, unless mankind all repent they cannot be saved. If the "learned editor" of the Register would take pains to inform himself of our true sentiments, we are sure he would not impute to us the erroneous ideas which he has with so much courage combatted. Limitarians have no difficulty in sending to heaven persons more vile than either Judas or Herod, provided they will satisfy the clergy of their repentance ! Then why do they think it impossible for God to reform all, and give them repentance unto life ? If one sinner can be saved, by this process, why not another—yea all ? Will it be said that repentance is a virtue ? We presume not. Christ was exalted a prince and a Saviour to GIVE repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins. Then why do men contend that he will withhold it in any conceivable case ?

We would condemn a tribunal governed by human wisdom, that should restore to favour and respect an unreformed criminal; but we would ever applaud a court or tribunal that had wisdom, by a judicious disciplinary punishment, to reform and thus restore to happiness an unfortunate culprit. Will it yet be maintained that repentance is a gift to be bestowed and received here on earth or no where ? If so, we reply, the idea is preposterous. The arm of the Lord is not shortened that it cannot save from sin in eternity as well as in time; and if we may be allowed to express our honest convictions, we would affirm, that the notion that repentance can only be conferred in this life, is not sustained by reason or common sense; and, was invented, and palmed upon the world, for the especial use and behoof of a money-loving and ungodly priesthood. Hence it has been for ages, a favourite tenet with the priests, that repentance could only be obtained through the supplications of men; and that, should their aid not be sought after, the subject would be left exposed to the dire displeasure of God ! The trick has succeeded too well: hence, not only culprits, but all vile wretches, have fled to the priests rather than to God, with a blind and dreadful hope, through them to obtain salvation from the Eternal !

Again : The editor asks—"Does it come within the pale of common sense (setting aside its blasphemy) to say that the Almighty, as Creator, has endowed the works of his hands, with a virtue he is not possessed of himself ?" In reply we answer NO. God has never given to any creature of his power, a virtue that he did not from eternity himself possess;—and while we refer the editor of the Register to the foregoing observations on the nature of repentance, and the object of punishment, as facts sufficiently explicit to parry off his thrust at us, we press upon him the inquiry : Has God ever given to man a virtue he did not himself possess ?—Then, is it not a virtue to desire the conversion and salvation of all mankind ? Is it not a virtue to pray for the redemption of all ? Mr. Hoffman, we conclude, will answer in the affirmative, and will point us to the exertions of godly missionaries, as evidence of his being correct. Their object, he will probably tell us, is, to save "poor immortal souls!"—and that, if the people will increase their power by giving them money, they will evangelize the world and save mankind ! Very well;—How is it, then, with Mr. Hoffman's inquiry ? Does God possess the same emotions ?—does he desire the effectual conversion and salvation of all men ? If so, will he be forever dissatisfied ? Or will he save all, by bringing them to a knowledge of himself, and granting them repentance and forgiveness of sins ? The Register should be careful in handling edge tools. Who, now, think ye, "attempts to put to shame the Author of every good," by denying to Him the virtue imputed to poor, sinful man ? We proceed :

"The sneer of the editor, that if "Tardy had had a priest an hour before his death, he would have gone to heaven, is gratuitous and without point, only so far as the truth of the assertion is warranted in sending this debased and unhappy wretch were "faith and repentance, is not needed, viz.—an universalist heaven."

Whether our remark in regard to the case of Tardy, is considered "gratuitous and without point" by the editor of the Register, or not, is with us a matter of very little consequence; but of one thing we feel assured, viz. that in almost every instance, within our recollection, murderers have been pronounced candidates for heaven by the orthodox; while the murdered have oftentimes been represented as being in hell, and sent there by the want of a proper repentance. The Thayers, were told by the learned judge, that they had despatched Love into eternity, and sent him "unprepared into the presence of his Maker." These same unfortunate beings, were pronounced, by the notorious Elder Fillmore, converts to Christianity, and truly penitent! Howe, who had "tried to be a Universalist" but never did believe the doctrine, repented as was said by his confessor Eld. Badger, and he too was saved! Van Patten, the murderer of Mrs. Schemerhorn of Schenectady, a truly praying, and strictly orthodox man, repented, and, according to orthodoxy, escaped the threatened misery of another world! So we might go on, and enumerate instances of a similar kind, in which the awful disparity between the doctrine of endless misery and truth is forcibly exhibited,—but enough. These facts bring to mind an anecdote, related a short time after the execution of the Thayers. "Suppose"—said an orthodox professor, to his neighbour an Universalist—"suppose, that when the eldest of the three Thayers aimed his rifle at the unfortunate Love it had missed fire, and Love, alarmed for his own safety, had seized a club and had instantly killed Thayer,—what would have been the consequence?" "O," said the Universalist, "he would have gone to hell for the want of a good flint!" This is in point. For Thayer, having a good flint, succeeded in killing Love—had time for repentance, and was saved from hell; while Love was sent "unprepared into the presence of his Maker;" whereas had he had a space for repentance, he would doubtless have been equally well off with his murderers! Thus we see, that modern theology makes an eternity of happiness or wo, to depend upon the snap of a rifle!

What is said by the editor of the Register about the place where repentance is not needed, is entirely gratuitous, and can only be excused by the utmost ignorance of our sentiments; for repentance implies reformation, and it is well known to all who have taken pains to make themselves acquainted with the doctrine, that we hold to an universal regeneration of all things, as a pre-requisite of perfect happiness in eternity. Not that we would be understood as maintaining the necessity of being changed so as to be made happy by seeing our fellow creatures in unspeakable torment—as do the self-styled orthodox; for that would be a corruption of depravity itself. If, therefore, it be a fact, that Tardy the pirate is in hell, he went there for the want of a priest to save him; for without doubt, a Fillmore, a Finney, (or perhaps the good editor of the Albany Christian Register) had either of them been allowed to preach endless misery to him, he would have "got religion," and have been considered one among the number of the elect! But here follows a tale of direful import:

"Previous to the execution of Strang, (who "for the twelve last years" of his life was a hopeful member of the universalist family) when prayers were continually offered to the Throne of Grace for him, we took the liberty of asking the opinion of a Rev. Gentleman, who stands high as a theologian, what proportion of gallows-repentances were probably accepted. "Not one in a million," was the reply. We are induced to give this fact not only for the information of this sage editor, but also for the especial use of cavaliers in general: and upon our own responsibility we will venture to say, that were he himself unhappily in the same situation, and placed within a few hours of his account, the same charity which was extended to the cases in question, he would probably be made a partaker of. But whether it "would be a passport to heaven," the editor of the Advocate knows as much about as his unpretending neighbours."

On first reading the above sentence the idea occurred that the most convincing proof of the fact that orthodoxy tends to corrupt the whole soul of its devotees, is found in their disregard of truth and common sense. Strang—the infamous wretch, who, in addition to the crime of murder, defiled the bed of the lamented Whipple, is represented (by Calvin Pepper, and others of the same faith,) as having been a hopeful member of the Universalist family! We shall not for the present attempt a refutation of the statement; but without the fear of contradiction, pronounce it an infamous falsehood! Take it then, Mr. Hoffman—we challenge you to substantiate your mean and disgraceful statement, by any testimony better than that of a libertine, a murderer, or a common prostitute! We stand ready to prove from the confession of the miserable wretch himself, not only that he never was an Universalist, but, that the cause of his nefarious deeds, was a want of faith in the doctrine of Universalism. Promise us, Mr. Hoffman, a place in your columns for four weeks, and if we do not succeed in substantiating the above assertions, we will openly renounce our faith.

Again: If the statement of the Reverend gentleman, referred to by the editor of the Register, be true, that not more than "one in a million" are truly penitent after being condemned to death, it proves that other "reverend" gentlemen of the limitarian faith, have broken a certain commandment which says, "thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour." For as above remarked, in almost every instance that has fallen under our observation, murderers have been represented as candidates for heaven, while the victims of their hellish designs have been given over to perdition!

Want of room prevents a further consideration of the subject in this number; it will be reserved for next week.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

AN offer was made in our 38th number, by W. I. Reese, to settle the controversy with Mr. Badger, by publick debate under proper regulations. Now, we have no objections to urge against a measure of that kind, provided it does not prevent Mr. B. from giving us the reply to W. I. Reese which has been promised. Of course the parties have the right to settle the controversy in their own way; but we and our readers have a claim upon Mr. B. which cannot consistently be relinquished, and with which we urge him to comply as soon as convenient. We notice this, because we are willing that if the doctrine of Universalism can be proved false or of licentious tendency, it should be exposed in a way that a greater number than could attend a debate of the kind proposed, should be enlightened and benefitted.—EDITOR.

MISCELLANY.

ONE DENOMINATION IN THIS COUNTRY.

A late writer in the Boston Recorder, under the head of "Christian Union," in expressing his disapprobation of a sentiment in a previous number of the Recorder, viz. "that it would be undesirable for christians of different denominations to be united in one," says:

"Look at the history of New England during a century and a half, the whole management of civil and ecclesiastical things, comparatively speaking, was under the control of one denomination. And in what country did political, scientific, and religious knowledge, and what is more, ardent piety and devotedness to God, ever flourish better?"

It is the wish no doubt of the New-England Clergy and their partizans, that the management of this whole country, should, in the same manner, be in the hands of one denomination, and that denomination to be their own.

The following extract from the Warren, Rhode Island Gazette, presents some striking traits in the management of the civil and ecclesiastical concerns of New-England, when in the hands of one denomination.

OUR "PIOUS" FOREFATHERS.

"It is deemed almost as great a crime as sacrilege to doubt the piety of the puritanick settlers of this country; and it may not be well to reflect on the life and manners of a people who have been dead for centuries, but to hear it asserted and the assertion daily repeated, that there never was a people on the face of the globe their equal for morality and virtue, the temptation to contradict it is beyond our power to control. The Plymouth settlers considered themselves a persecuted people, seeking a wilderness where they might say their prayers in their own way; indeed such was the very fact—they were flying from the reach of those who would set up an unwarranted dominion over the mind, but still that did not make them a "pious" people, nor did this attempt to curb their opinion teach them to respect the opinions of others: on the contrary, they set foot upon New England with the determination of establishing their own doctrine at all events, and to compel all who should follow them across the ocean, to believe as they did. And the sequel shows that they did not repent of nor correct the error, for when a Quaker showed himself among them, they hanged him as the Jews did Haman; and when an unlucky Baptist chanced to express an opinion among them, they denounced him even to his fourth generation, with as much rigor as the Catholics ever did 'round heads.' In short pious as our forefathers were, they brought all the will which characterized the followers of Oliver Cromwell, and vented all the venom which will naturally arise in the breast of a fanatic, upon those who did not walk according to the letter of their creed, and whose consciences had not yet yielded to the evidence which convinced others. Nor does it appear that these settlers were more honest in their dealings with one another than people are at this day. The history of those times shows plainly that there was as great a proportion of crime then as there is now.

"As pious as our fathers were, they swindled the Indians out of their possessions, and said very little whatever they might have thought about it. They hung old women, because they could not live, breathe, and have a being under water; brought decrepit, gray-haired females to die on a gallows; murdered members of a religious society because their communication was simply yea, yea, and nay, nay. These were the acts of our 'pious' forefathers! The doings of men who were persecuted for conscience sake, and left home and country, rather than to be compelled to perform a ceremony they thought improper or unnecessary.

"That our ancestors were enterprising, industrious, and independent, we are ready to admit. But that they were self-willed, bigotted, and superstitious, is an undeniable fact, which cannot be hid under the cloak of piety. It was not because they believed the Quaker or the Baptist guilty of heresy that they banished or hung him; it was because they were jealous of his power; because they did not like to see his society growing up among them.

"From that kind of piety which hangs folks, we pray to be delivered."

MOVEMENTS OF ORTHODOXY.

Within the last twenty-five years, a Society of Baptists in this vicinity manifested a most virulent opposition to the Congregationalist Society here; and the members of the latter, in many instances, returned the same usage to them. Slander and abuse were freely propagated, and numerous attempts were made to draw the members of each society over to the others. But within the last five years, lo, these societies have become closely united in design and operation. The same building can now be occupied alternately by the preachers of both, and the same people attend. It is natural here to ask, have these societies become more liberal in their views, which causes this alteration? No, I presume not. Of one of them only can I speak with certainty, and that has moved the other way, having adopted a more exclusive and intolerant policy in its internal regulations. What then? Why reason enough. The Methodists having located one of their preachers in the neighbourhood, measures must be adopted to prevent them from "getting a footing there." It was accordingly agreed for each of the ministers to hold a meeting at the place every other Sunday night in rotation, at the same hour the Methodists held theirs, for the avowed object of preventing the attendance on that meeting. And some, who are esteemed patterns of piety, were most virulent against those who disregarded them so much as to attend the Methodist meeting. The same opposition is manifested against Universalists; and similar measures adopted. The present week has given us an instance.* But at this very time, the great organ of orthodoxy, the Boston Recorder and Telegraph, is circulating the doings of the Methodists, and evincing a cordial union of the leading men. Thus with the most bitter enmity among individuals, the ruling organs are joining hand in hand in the same cause.

Now I draw the following conclusions from these facts. First that the union which appears to be taking place among the leaders of the different sects in this country, is not prompted by pure motives of Christian benevolence, but for self-aggrandizement. And secondly, that no measures would be rejected, if they had a tendency to give an exclusive support to orthodoxy. It is my firm belief, notwithstanding the cry raised against theatres, if they could be brought to support Orthodoxy and condemn heresy, and especially if the proceeds could be secured to Missionary Societies, they would be patronized as worthy institutions. See as an illustration of this position, the account of exhibitions in the last number of the Philadelphia Reformer. What would not those men employ who openly recommend slander, scurrility, obscenity and impiety. Who publicly patronise as ministers of religion, 'men who have been notorious for impiety and blasphemy—disturbers of the peace, and promoters of "universal misrule" and desolation.'

Old Colony, Mass. Sept. 15.

* And last year one of these men dismissed two of his workmen, who were engaged for the season, for attending a Universalist meeting a single day.

LADIES BEST QUALITIES.

Ladies should be duly sensible that no beauty has any lasting and permanent charms, but the inward one of the mind. And that gracefulness of manners is far more engaging than beauty of person. They should consider that intelligence, meekness, modesty and sensibility are true and lasting charms. That contentment, industry and economy are amiable and useful qualities. That virtue is an invaluable treasure, the universal charm, and should not be parted with upon any consideration. And that Piety, sweet celestial visitant, is at once, a most useful, and happyfying ornament.

They who have these, are qualified as they ought to be, for usefulness in society and the domestick circle, for the management of families, for the education of children, for pure and lasting affection for their husbands, and for submitting cheerfully to a prudent mode of living. Such females are admired, respected, and beloved, because they are truly amiable and lovely, and contribute so much to utility and felicity. They are no revealers of secrets, tattlers or slanderers; but are true to their trust, say nothing but what is proper to be said, and speak well of the absent.

In a word, they are industrious, economical, sincere, cheerful, discreet, modest, virtuous, and pious.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE INDIANS.—We understand, says the National Intelligencer that letters have been received from Gen. Atkinson, dated on the 2d of September. The Gen. had with five hundred men ascended eighty miles up the Ouisconsin, on his way to the Portage, and had been joined the preceding evening by Gen. Dodge, with one hundred and thirteen Galena volunteers, mounted men. At the Portage, gen. Atkinson would be met by major Whistler, with a detachment from Green Bay, and would then have a collected force of one thousand men, ready to move as circumstances might direct. No hostile Indians had been met with, and the general, at the date of his last letter, was still of opinion that the Winnebagoes would give up the offenders agreeably to the demand which had been made upon them.

A rumour which had reached Bellville, in Illinois, that an attack had been made by the Indians upon the settlers at the Lead Mines on Fever river, but by the direct accounts which we have from St. Louis to the 8th ult. it proves to be entirely unfounded.—N. Y. Gazette.

MURDER.—The widow of Samuel Beaks, of the township of Hopewell, N. J. was murdered in her dwelling on the afternoon of the 24th ult. she was found very much beaten and bruised, lying partly in the fire place, with one hand in the fire, by one of the neighbours who called in to see her. She breathed but a short time after being taken up.—Suspicion rests upon a black boy as the perpetrator of the horrid deed. He has been committed for trial.

Melancholy circumstance.—Mr. Drochner, who resides near the Mountain, after having been absent for the last nine months in France, arrived a short time ago at New York on his way hither. A letter from him, dated New York, reached Madam Drochner, on Wednesday evening last, informing her that he would be home in two days. This happy intelligence had such an effect upon her spirits that her very joy threw her into a fit from which she never recovered. On Thursday, a friend of the family, on coming to town, met Mr. Drochner, going home to surprise his family by his unexpected appearance. The gentleman informed him that his wife was dangerously ill—and when he arrived at his home he found her speechless—shortly after she died.

Montreal Herald.

Manufacture of Combs.—In Westbrook, but a mile or two distant from this town, Mr. Ebenzer D. Woodford has rising fifty persons employed in manufacturing combs—the value of those annually manufactured by him, is nearly $40,000. His accurate imitations of shell, and superior staining, and finish, have given his work a very considerable celebrity, and acquired for him an extensive and ready market in the principal cities of the Union.

Portland, Maine paper of September 21.

Russian fleet.—It appears from the late London papers, that eight only of the nineteen Russian ships of war, which lately arrived at Portsmouth, are about to proceed to the Mediterranean, viz. four ships of the line, and four frigates. It is stated that this is in pursuance of an arrangement made between the Russian and English governments, subsequent to the sailing of the fleet from Constadt, on the ground that a force composed of an equal number of ships of each of the parties to the treaty for the pacification of Greece, will still be amply sufficient for effecting the purposes of that treaty.

Facts.—A single mercantile house on Long-wharf, Boston, has sold, since the first of January last, thirty-seven thousand barrels of Genesee flour; of which less than 300 barrels have been disposed of coastwise; the remainder has been sold to country traders, and chiefly to those in the manufacturing villages.

Another house has paid, since the first of April, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for American wool, purchased of farmers and wool-growers belonging to the New-England states and New-York, and sold out again to the manufacturers of New-England.

The Boston and Canton Factory company imported, during five months preceding the first of May last, one million pounds of Smyrna wool; all of which is used in its own factory, in the manufacture of what is called negro cloths.

Is it possible that our manufacturing establishments can be detrimental to commerce and agriculture, when a single establishment imports wool enough in five months to freight three or four ships, (to say nothing of other articles necessarily used in the manufacture of wool,) when a single dealer in American wool pays, in the same time, to the farmers $150,000, and another individual receives from another portion of farmers, and sells off to the country traders, flour enough to make its first owners rich, if not independent.—Bost. Cour.

FIRE.—On Tuesday night the 25th ultimo, the Woollen Factory of Capt. Henry Austin, jun. of Marcellus, Onondaga county was entirely consumed by fire, together with all its valuable machinery. So rapid were the flames, when discovered, that nothing was saved. A desk containing his notes and accounts, valued at $2000 was lost;—the loss exclusive of that, estimated at $3000, upon which was no insurance, besides about 50 pieces of woollen cloths belonging to customers. How the fire originated is unknown,—there had been no fire in the building for several days, and had only been entered that evening with a candle, by a very careful person.

ANOTHER TRIAL AND EXCOMMUNICATION for believing the testimony of all God's "holy prophets," and renouncing the cruelties of Calvinism, will appear in our columns soon. We have just received the M. S. of a correspondence between Mrs. Betsey Dodge, and "Rev." Robert Hubbard, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, in Danville-village, Livingston county, N. Y. in which the former is charged with heresy, or a disbelief of the "fire points."

☞ The continuation of Mrs. Curtis' letters to the Church at Nine mile Creek, will appear soon.

☞ A General Conference of Universalists will be held in this village on Wednesday and Thursday of next week. Divine service will be attended during the sitting of the Conference.

EXAMINATION

Of a Sermon preached in Chenango, N. Y. by Josiah Keyes, of the Methodist connexion, in vindication of the doctrine of the eternity of future punishment, by J. B. SHANNON.

This sermon was handed to me by the friends of the impartial grace of God, and who desired me to give it a candid examination.—Our brethren have no fear that the sermon will do any injury to the enlightened part of community; but to those who have already been made to wander from hill to mountain, and to forget their resting place, it is to be feared it will do some injury.

In order to disprove the sentiment of universal holiness and happiness, Mr. K. pressed into his service, Isa. iii. last clause of the 11th verse, which he also, of course, used to subserve the cause of ceaseless woe.

In Mr. K.'s preliminary remarks he says, "our sentiments produce corresponding influence on our lives and conduct." Well, friend K. what are "our" (the Methodist's) "sentiments?" Do you answer, total depravity? But what influence does this have on your life and conduct? I confess it would appear, even to superficial observers, that some of our friends, when at camp-meetings, &c. act upon the principle of total depravity, whether they believe it or not. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Again: our friend K. believes in the common doctrine of original sin. Now, let me ask, what is original sin? Mr. K.'s answer will, no doubt, be, "the sin of Adam." Well, Mr. K. what were the effects of Adam's sin? Will you not answer in the undisguised sentiments of Methodism, that, as a consequence, God became infinitely incensed with the first pair as also with their whole progeny, and was moved by the implacability of his wrath, to prepare an awful hell, in which to burn sinners throughout all future ages.

Now, sir, in conjunction with the above cited sentence, and the subjoined remarks, look at the following, taken from p. 3d of your sermon—"Therefore, that sentiment which takes off all restraint from the passions, and gives full liberty to indulge in every vicious course, must be false, and should be exploded." I now appeal to the good sense of all men, and ask—does not the popular doctrine of original sin and total depravity take off all the restraint of which you speak? As an example in this case, suppose you have a refractory child,—how could you lay any restraint upon its passions? Answer, no restraint could be laid on one who is totally depraved. Now, sir, as you would not punish your child for not doing good, if it were incapacitated or unable so to do, you would spare the rod, which would "remove all restraint from the passions" of the child; should not the doctrine of total depravity "be exploded," admitting Mr. K. to be the judge? But add to this, the doctrine of original sin, the manner in which God deals with man, on account of what Adam did upwards of five (nearly six) thousand years ago, together with the conduct of many of the present day, and I am certain that my reader, on a moment's reflection, will say, that some men, at least, have greatly mistaken the right way, and in following the path dictated by the furious attributes of their imaginary Deity, they have "indulged in every vicious" act that wickedness could invent!

If God is angry, in the common sense of that term, in order for us to be like God, (or godly, which is every man's duty,) we must be so too! If God punishes the innocent instead of the guilty, so must we! If God punished, or permitted to be punished, his innocent Son instead of the guilty world, in order to imitate the God we worship as nearly as possible, we must imbrue our hands in the blood of our innocent children, and let the guilty go unpunished!!! I agree with Mr. K. that the doctrine which thus removes all restraint, and permits every lawless indulgence, "must be false, and should be exploded." So let it be!!

Again, speaking in reference to the Bible and quoting the 5th article of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Mr. H. says, "whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite to salvation." If nothing but the Bible is required as evidence in this case, why does our author call up the opinions of the Mahometans, Josephus, and others to the neglect of the scriptures.

I agree, Mr. K. to take the word of God as the grand criterion in the discussion at issue; and shall, therefore, treat that part of your discourse which has, "thus saith" man for its support with becoming neglect. But whatever has "Thus saith the Lord" for its foundation, shall be treated as orthodox. For I will not take the liberty to call any man an heretick, nor his doctrine heretical without reason and scripture for so doing. I will endeavour to be as brief as possible and give the sermon a candid review. It will therefore be expected, that I shall give the sermon no farther attention, than to do justice to my opponent's arguments.

Mr. K. states, and presumes no one will deny, "that calamities and miseries of various kinds are the portion of the wicked in the present state of existence." He continues, "the point in question is, whether they, (the wicked) will be eternally punished hereafter." It is no where declared in the scriptures, that any man either has or will be eternally condemned. To say that any have been eternally miserable is to say that eternal duration has come to an end—to say any will be is equally absurd. To say God has ever threatened man with any other punishment than he meant to inflict is to charge him with insincerity, and to say he means to afflict man with endless punishment, is to presume, that God intends to do what is impossible in the nature of things!!

But "to the law and the testimony;" if my opponent speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in him. It seems, then, Mr. K. believes that miseries, &c. "are the portion of the wicked in this life"!! Permit me here to ask, sir, do you think God will visit the wicked with CALAMITIES and MISERIES in THIS LIFE, and punish them for the same in the next? Would this be justice? It would seem not. If God does not chastise man enough here, why punish him hereafter. If it be the will and purpose of God to "recompense the righteous in the earth much more, the wicked and the sinner," why should any part of his "calamity" be reserved for a future world?

It would surprise us if the legislature of the State of New York should enact a law, that that every murderer should receive the prelude of his punishment in America, and be transported to Europe to complete his destiny. This is the way, however, in which Mr. K. supposes God's judgements are poured out upon offending man! For he argues, that calamities and miseries of various kinds are the portion of the wicked in the present state of existence, yet, that these same miserable beings will be tortured to the wasteless ages of eternity besides!!! Mr. K. says "the question is whether they (the wicked) will be eternally punished hereafter. Here some deny, but we affirm. To establish this point, we shall prove, 1st. Some sinners do die in their sins. 2d. They will be doomed to punishment 3d. Their punishment will be endless."

I think Mr. K. has undertaken what he has not, and never will be able to accomplish.—Notwithstanding the word "endless" is recorded in sacred writ, it is never used in connexion with the punishment of the wicked.—There are no words applied to the punishment of the wicked, but such as have been applied to things that have long since ceased to exist. If this be true, (and none will deny it,) it appears to me that Mr. K. must have been possessed of much assurance to stand up before an enlightened congregation and boldly assert that the punishment of the wicked will be endless. I think Mr. K. ought first to have shown that there will be those in existence to an endless eternity who will be wicked. But this he cannot do; for the Bible declares there will be a time when "all that do wickedly shall be burned up," that neither root nor branch shall be left unconsumed. Certainly, after the fulfilment of this prediction, there will be no punishment, as there will be no wicked to punish.

I shall now endeavour to prove, that the holy Prophets did not intend to convey an idea that any being will be endlessly lost; after which I shall attend to a more particular examination of Mr. K.'s production.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE:

Sir:—The insertion of my communication, signed W. A. argues favourably respecting your liberality and sincerity.—Your reply seems to invite an answer for two reasons; one is self-defence, this being the strongest law of nature. We are all urged to it, as circumstances will admit; and this is not only true of animated creation, but it is also true, of those principles of action called truth and error. Whatever of truth or error there may be in our minds, an effort will be made by either to maintain its existence.

When truth presents itself to the mind, it doth not make many promises, and representations, nor use flattery or disguise; but if admitted, it proves to the happiness of its occupant that it is a doer more than a promiser. But it is not so with error; it presents itself with many promises, false representations, and useth much flattery; and if it cannot gain admittance this way, it will use disguise, put on the garb of truth, and employ all the terms and names that belong to truth; and by this latter means it has wonderful success in the religious world at the present day.

The operation of truth on the mind, brings that mind to a simple and friendly condition, and makes it very easy of access; for truth is not naturally afraid of any thing. It is not so with error, for that creates a jealousy in the mind, and renders it difficult of access; and being naturally afraid, it leads mankind to the adoption of rules and regulations for its defence, that truth may be kept at a distance and from making an attack upon it. For it knows its weakness and insufficiency when brought in contact with truth; hence, I conclude that the regulations of the various religious sects, so far as they deny liberty of speech in their religious meetings, are the result of error. That fear of a liberty, which is equal between man and man, is most certainly the result of error in its operation on the mind. Truth leads to liberty and equality; but error is on full drive to classify mankind into orders and degrees, superiour and inferiour, dealing out honours and privileges with profusion on the one hand, but disesteem, negligence and contempt on the other. When I see that the rules and regulations of the various religious societies partake so much of the nature and principles of error, I cannot refrain from the conclusion that they are all gone astray, and each one hath turned to its own way; but to return.—

Another reason for answering your reply, is, that many of your sayings or sentences, would lead me, in my remarks upon them, to a developement of my views or reasons, why I conclude that the Universalist priests, along with many others, are now making merchandize of the people, and are seeking to do so more and more.

Whether a controversy on this subject is suitable for the columns of the Advocate, I must leave you to determine. If the Advocate is principally designed to illustrate and disseminate the doctrine called Universalism, I wish not to divert, or throw any obstacle in your way in such an undertaking; for it may be that a contest about doctrine, and managed too, on the same principles of proceeding, as those of your opponents, may lead the way to a more liberal religious dispensation. But if the columns of the Advocate are open for a discussion of subjects relative to the means or modes of proceeding, best calculated for finding and promoting true religion, I should be very glad, as occasion may require, and circumstances permit, to assist or engage in such discussion. W. ANDREWS.

W. Andrews has liberty to proceed, and will be attended to, as soon as we are favoured with a conclusion to his article. We hope, as our columns are much crowded at present, he will use great plainness of speech and brevity with all. Ed.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

Mr. Editor:—Several Universalists with whom I am conversant often urge to me the doctrines of fate, or according to the old Westminster, that "God has foreordained whatsoever comes to pass;" and at the same time urge the accountability of man to his Maker for what he does. Now, how to reconcile both these ideas, I am at no small loss.—Will you, or some of your correspondents try to relieve my mind? Universalists inform me that sin and misery are inseparably connected. By this I understand that man is punished for his sins; but, sir, admitting the doctrine of fate, why is he punished at all on the principle of justice? and what constitutes sin? By giving an answer to the above in your paper, you will oblige ASA.

REPLY.

It has long been a question with theologians how far the predetermination of God has an influence upon the freedom of mankind. For one, the writer of this article believes that God controls all the events of the universe. Yet, that man is free, in a certain sense, is quite evident from the fact that we feel condemned or justified for every act we perform. The Calvinist, as well as the Armenian, believes that man is a moral agent, notwithstanding God hath predestinated whatsoever cometh to pass. As to the particular mode of arriving at this conclusion, viz. that man is a free moral agent, we conceive it a matter of little consequence;—for an assent of the mind to the proposition, is enough to answer all useful purposes.

The idea that man is punished for his sins, according to the common or popular acceptation of the term punishment, we conceive to be entirely erroneous.—It is generally believed that God punishes because he is vexed with the offender. But in fact, the term punishment signifies correction or chastisement for the benefit of the one punished. Hence, punishment itself is an act of mercy, inasmuch as the object in view is the reformation of the offender. On this ground it would be consistent with every principle of justice, to suppose that God works in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure, and yet punishes us for certain actions.

Sin and misery are inseparably connected. This fact will be admitted by every one who has known transgression. But the misery connected with sin may be permitted to exist for wise and benevolent purposes, even admitting that God predestinates the means as well as the end.

Sin is a transgression of the law of the understanding, and cannot exist where there is no law; neither can it be committed where there is no freedom to act.

The foregoing is not intended as a full reply to Asa, but it is given with a view to elicit farther remarks from some of our correspondents. We should like to receive a well written essay upon the subject.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

TO REV. D. C. LANSING, OF AUBURN, N. Y.

Sir—Having heard you spoken of as a gentleman of science, and of commanding address, curiosity led me to attend your lecture on Wednesday evening of the 10th inst. to test the truth of the representation. Of your science, or your eloquence I have nothing to remark; but I am unwilling to pass without re-tice certain observations made by you at the time, which I was unprepared to expect. It appears a principle object in the present day to secure the glory of God at the hazard and expence of every other consideration, even if christianity itself suffer by the means! I will not charge you, sir, with wilfully turning your hand against the Christian scriptures, because I charitably think such was not your design. But from your remarks, I shall take the liberty of suggesting to you a different treatment towards your neighbours who are willing to glorify God by testifying the truth.

1. In a clumsy attempt, no doubt to reproach the faith of Universalists, as you have spoken from the same text more than once in this Village with that unhallowed intent, you alluded to a sect whose doctrines were not countenanced by scripture nor common sense, and whom the Apostle denominated "dogs!" By this you would probably be understood, that such in your dignified estimation are infidels!

2. In addressing yourself directly to your "brethren," you charged them, and included yourself, with "amazing infidelity!" and,

3. You acknowledged a part of it before you ended your performance on that evening. For in speaking of Paul's vision while on his way to Damascus, you said you had but little doubt that Paul saw Jesus at the time! and repeated it twice or thrice. "But little doubt!" Then, sir, it appears you have some doubt on the subject! Now be it remembered, that, while speaking of that event, 1 Cor. xv. 8, the Apostle says, "and last of all he was seen OF ME ALSO." But of this, sir, you appeared to have some doubt! What shall the publick make of this, but evidence of the second particular above? But it may be objected, that "Paul saw him only by an eye of faith"—I reply, he saw him in the same sense in which he was seen by Cephas, the "twelve," the "five hundred," James and "the Apostles," verses 5—7, as we have no notice to the contrary. Besides, if Paul meant only, that it was by faith, that Jesus had been seen, by those above mentioned, he might have swelled the number to three, and even to five thousand, who by faith had seen Jesus.

Yours, &c. R.

REMARKS
ON 1ST KINGS, XVIII. 21.
BY N. DOOLITTLE.

NO. 1.

Man is naturally a religious being. When the faculties of his soul have ripened to maturity;—when he beholds the glory and the splendour of the heavens, and views with admiration the sublimity, the grandeur, and beauty of Nature's works; he feels a propensity to adore that Supreme Architect, who, with infinite skill, marked out the planets' course, and reared the pillars of the universe. Mankind, in every age of the world, have had some religious object of adoration; and all have aspired to the worship of the only living and true God. But man in his earthly nature, is an imperfect, fallible being, liable to err, and has become deceived relative to the true object of religious homage. Mankind, in their blindness and ignorance, have framed to themselves gods of their own imaginations, and have bowed down and worshipped before them. Hence, there has been, from the earliest ages of the world, false gods,—imaginary deities, or the work of men's hands in contradistinction to the only living and true God.

If we turn over the pages of history, and look back to ancient times, we shall find that then, as well as at the present day, mankind had a variety of gods; and in order to secure their popularity, they have given them the appellation belonging to the Most High. But there is a far greater difference between the most perfect of false gods ever invented by the mind of mortal man, and the God of heaven, than there is betwixt the darkness of midnight, and the resplendent lustre of the sun at noon day. Here I will lay down a criterion by which you may ever distinguish a false from the true God.

There never was a false god, the production of man's invention, but what was represented by his worshippers as possessed of a like disposition, or subject to the same passions as themselves; as hard of heart, cruel and unmerciful: 'Gods partial, changeful, passionate, unjust.' As there have been false gods in every age of the world, so there have been false prophets or teachers among their worshippers, whose time and talents have been devoted to the service of their god. And in order to find false teachers and those who worship a false god we need not go to heathen countries or to the islands of the sea, for we can find them in our own enlightened land: they are near at home even at our doors. But, says the candid reader with surprise;—the writer would not desire us to believe, that here in this Christian land where the light of the gospel shines, there are those professing to be Christians, who knowingly and willingly would worship a false God. No, charity constrains us to say that we do not believe there is any one professing Christianity, who knowingly would worship or believe in a false god, in preference to the true. But many have become deceived, for I bear them record that they have a zeal, but it is not according to knowledge. Through the beguiling influence of false teachers, many have been led astray, as we hereafter design to show. We shall now lay down a few principles by which you may know these false prophets from the prophets of the Most High.

1. You may distinguish these false prophets from the true watchmen in Zion, by their numbers. False prophets in every age have been more numerous than the true prophets of God. In the days of Elijah, the prophets of Baal were four hundred and fifty, while he only stood as a prophet of the Lord. And I am firmly of the opinion, that was there a census taken of all the prophets, the true ones would be found to be no more in proportion to the false than one to four hundred and fifty at the present day. There are certain factories established in this land of freedom, from whence they issue, as the frogs were wont to do in old time from the rivers and fish ponds of Egypt; and come up into our houses and villages, bringing along with them fiery pestilence, arrows and death. The true prophets and apostles of God, prophesied of these days, and foretold of the coming of these deceivers, and warned their brethren of their approach. St. Paul informed Timothy that the time would come when they would not endure sound doctrine; but would heap up to themselves teachers having itching ears, who should turn them away from the truth: Moreover, he tells us that their coming should be after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness. The apostle Peter told his brethren that they would privily bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them; that many should follow their pernicious ways, by reason of which the way of truth should be evilspoken of. Isaiah pronounces a woe upon them;—because they call good evil, and evil good: they put light for darkness, and darkness for light; bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter. Ezekiel declares that the Lord shall deliver his people out of their hands; because they make the hearts of the righteous sad with lies. That this is the case we shall hereafter make appear. From the striking and correct account which the apostle Peter gave of those false teachers that were coming among his brethren, we find that they bore a very near resemblance to those who are scattered up and down in our land at the present day. He declares that these deceivers are presumptuous and self-willed, and represents them as clouds that are driven about by a tempest, going about and beguiling unstable souls, having a heart which they have exercised with covetous practices, following the way of Balaam the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness.

When we look abroad in the world, and view that eagerness of desire which a certain class of men manifest for that treasure, the love of which St. Paul calls the root of all evil; and witness the plans projected for the accomplishment of their purposes by the establishment of Mite societies, Cent societies, Rag-bag societies, and others too numerous to mention; we cease to wonder that the apostle, in prospect of their coming, should declare that they would have hearts exercised with covetous practices, and would follow after Balaam who loved the wages of unrighteousness. When we take into consideration that artful and intriguing course of management by which they sometimes set whole towns and villages in an uproar; and notice that subtle and beguiling influence by which they enter houses leading away women and children after them: well might Peter represent them as going about and beguiling unstable souls, and compare them to clouds driven about by a tempest.

We shall now proceed to show the light in which these deceivers, or wolves in sheep's clothing, represent the character of their false god to their deluded followers. Here I shall be entirely confined to the account which his worshippers give of his attributes, plans and designs, because his character is not described in the volume of revelation, neither does it shine forth in the works of nature.

They say that he is possessed of infinite Wisdom, Power, and Goodness; yet they represent him as a cruel, partial and malignant being in his conduct towards his creatures.—Those who pretend that they have received a commission from him, to make known his counsel and will to his offspring, inform us that he created the earth and placed mankind upon it; and in consequence of the first man's sin and disobedience to the injunction of his Creator, the whole human race have become involved in corruption: that this corruption extends so wide and deep over the soul, that it has become totally depraved, destitute of every principle of goodness, wholly unable to turn to God, or to perform one good work acceptable to him, and is exposed to his righteous displeasure forever. But it is said that their God, anticipating the forlorn condition of his offspring, and foreseeing this dreadful catastrophe, predestinated a portion of them to everlasting life for his own glory without the least foresight of faith or good works; and that the rest he was pleased to pass by and ordain to everlasting dishonour and wrath, to the praise of his vindictive justice.* Thus, reader, you perceive that they represent their God as cruel and unmerciful to the highest degree. But why this partiality? why this cruelty? were not all in the same condition?—were not all equally entitled to his favour? Supposing that one of the children of men possessing ability, should conduct like this; would you not consider him as a monster in human shape? Suppose a parent's children should become disobedient to his commands, and should go so far from home as to become lost and ignorant of the way back. After wandering about for a while, they at last set down to perish with hunger. The parent pursues after them and finds them. The children in transport raise their hands, and in accents of joy hail him as their deliverer; but the parent tells them, that for his own glory, it is his determination to take only a part of them from the wilderness to his home of plenty, and leave the rest to perish with hunger, or to be devoured by wild beasts. Is there a parent in the wide world who would conduct like this? If so, would he not be exterminated from the earth, as undeserving of the name? Yet these false prophets represent the God whom they worship as conducting in the same cruel and partial manner. But this is not all. The worst is yet to come.

They tell us that this omnipotent being whom they presume to style the Lord Most High, has prepared a lake of fire and brimstone in the unseen world, into which he will finally cast a great portion of his creatures—there to be tormented while the ages of eternity shall continue to roll their ceaseless rounds. There, parents will behold their children, and children their parents, groaning in miseries that will never end. There, the meeting of friends was never known, nor one sound of pity ever heard. There, no gleam of hope will ever come. There, no soft hand will wipe away their tears. There, the most piercing cries and earnest entreaties for mercy will avail them nought, but will die away unheard along the battlements of heaven.—While those who are so fortunate as to be admitted to the regions of blessedness will look down and behold those who were connected with them by the most endearing ties, while on earth, groaning in the pains of everlasting death; the sight of which will not inspire one emotion of sorrow or tender compassion, but induce them to raise a higher song of glory to that being who thus cruelly separated them forever. Alas! what a God is this! Is this a God of justice? Is there such an infinite difference between the most vicious and most virtuous of the children of men, that the one part merit such a fate? Can this be the God of heaven, of whose impartial goodness we behold ten thousand evidences all around us? Has he, unasked, brought beings into existence, with a determination that they should be endlessly losers by their existence? Will he thus dispose of his creatures, eventually consigning a part to interminable wretchedness and woe; and admitting the remainder to mansions of eternal happiness and peace?—"Of horrid things this is the most horrid! stupendous! highly strange! O! tell it not ye stars, and thou, pale moon, turn paler at the sound!" Surely this can be none other than a false God, the phantom of error, or the production of a disordered imagination.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

By some strange fatality the Albany Christian Register containing the article, an examination of which appeared in our last number, has been mislaid and lost. This will prevent a conclusion of the article until another can be obtained. We have endeavoured to procure one, but have not been able to find it, and therefore respectfully request the Editor of the Register to forward a copy. Should he condescend to comply with this request, the favour shall be duly acknowledged and cheerfully reciprocated should an opportunity present. ED. GOS. ADV.

HUMILITY.

Humility is a virtue of the highest order. It was expressly enjoined upon the primitive disciples of our Lord, by their divine Master; and it is recommended by all good men, as a distinguishing trait in the character of the truly religious. Without this virtue, the professor, however devout he may appear, is like sounding brass: For this Christian principle constitutes the source of almost every other god-like affection of the heart. This virtue is so important, and so universally acknowledged to be an essential qualification of the Christian, that it would be strange indeed if it had not been counterfeited by many.

Those who assume the appearance of humility without possessing it, are not to be found among the openly profane and irreligious. We must look for them among those who profess Christianity. And, perhaps, could we read the hearts of religionists, we should find the least of real humility where the most is assumed.

We have known certain persons, who pretended to be very humble, who would be offended to be told that their neighbours were as likely to be saved as themselves! Now, an apostle commands us to esteem all others better than ourselves; and how can a man be humble who thinks that thousands will be endlessly miserable for the want of that grace which he possesses himself?

When we hear persons declaim against the doctrine of divine and impartial benevolence, we cannot avoid the conclusion that the pride of their hearts has never been subdued; or in other words, that they are destitute of the humility required by the gospel. For if we are truly humble and contrite of heart, we shall be as willing that all should be saved, as we are to be saved ourselves; nay, we shall think, and verily believe, that all others will be saved if we are ourselves.

The idea, therefore, that the doctrine of partial grace is calculated to humble the soul, and inculcate humility, is not sustained by any thing like reason—much less by the scriptures. In fact, it is our honest opinion, that the doctrine of endless misery has been the cause of more arrogance, spiritual pride, and hypocrisy, than all other doctrines put together.

We appeal to facts—Do we find an uncommon share of humility among the popular sects of the day? Are the devotees of modern orthodoxy more disposed than others to deny themselves, take up their cross, and follow Christ? Are they less extravagant in dress—less anxious to be sought after—less disposed to take the highest seats, than others? We think not. And, although we have attentively observed, for several years, the conduct of the professors of the various denominations of Christians, we have not yet ascertained, that humility is confined to the ranks of those who say most about their own devotedness to the cause of Christ.

Humility will be found wherever charity exists in the heart; and is evinced by those who are willing to labour and suffer reproach for trusting in God the Saviour of all men. Reader: if you would cherish this brightest of the Christian virtues, you will esteem all others as being the objects of God's regard; and you will never be heard to say that "if every body goes to heaven, you won't!" #### DEDICATION OF CHILDREN.

The practice of dedicating children to the Lord Jesus, as it exists in most of our churches and societies in the New-England states, is perhaps as solemn and interesting as any ceremony ever performed by man. In recommending the custom to the brethren of our faith, we present an outline of the ceremony. It follows:—

"We dedicate thee to Him, to whom thou properly belongest, to be Baptized with his Baptism, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit; and we pronounce upon thee, that blessing, which he commanded his ministers, Moses, Aaron and his sons, to pronounce upon his people, saying—The Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee Peace—AMEN."

Arabian notions of the English.—Soon after our arrival at Muscat we were visited by men of all nations and colours. I was principally attracted by the appearance and manners, of some Arabs from the interior, who were brought on board by their countrymen to see an English ship-of-war. Their figures were light and elastic, their countenance expressed quickness and energy. The most remarkable of their features were their dark rolling eyes, which perhaps struck me more from their wandering rapidly from one object to another, glistening with wonder at all they saw. A good telescope happened to be placed so as to give a complete view of one of the farthest fortifications. I called an Arab to look through it, and he did so for about a minute, then gazed with the most eager attention at me, and without saying a word, dashed over the ship's side. When the boat he was in got to a little distance, he exclaimed, "You are magicians, and I now see how you take towns; that thing, (pointing to the telescope,) be they ever so far off, brings them as near as you like." We were much amused with his simplicity, but no arguments could prevail on him to receive such a lesson on optics as might dispel his delusion in supposing us to be adepts in the black art.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A distressing accident happened on Wednesday last in Ridgefield. Mr. Daniel Hamilton, with his sister, Mrs. Standart, and her child, were riding in a one horse waggon along the high bank of Huron river, near the village of Monroeville, when by some means, the horse, wagon and all were precipitated over the bank, and fell to the bottom—a distance of about forty feet.—Mrs. Standart had her jaw broken, and her thigh so entirely shattered to pieces that fragments of the bone were forced, not only through the skin, but through her clothing; and we have been informed that one piece, about two inches long, was found sticking in the log against which she was thrown. The injury she has sustained is so great, that it is feared she cannot long survive. Mr. Hamilton was considerably, though we believe not dangerously hurt. The child escaped with but slight injury. The horse was killed, but the wagon was not much broken.—Sandusky Clarion.

New Bedford.—This town is now in a very flourishing condition. It has, we believe, about 160 vessels employed in the whale fishery, in which, as well as in other commercial pursuits, a great amount of capital is profitably invested, giving employment to more than two thousand seamen. The town contains nearly 6000 inhabitants, among which are a greater proportion of wealthy individuals, than probably in any other place of the same extent, in the Union.—Prov. Amer.

The annual exhibition of domestic manufactures by the Franklin Institute, was well attended yesterday. There are many beautiful specimens. The porcelain made in this city, the cut glass, straw and leghorn bonnets, coal grates, cloths, flannels, and numerous other articles, cannot fail to gratify the patriotism of every American. We have not space to give a particular account of the different articles to-day.—Phila. Aurora.

It appears from a publication in the Baltimore American, that a vessel peculiarly adapted to the service, is about to be built in that port, by Mr. James Beacham, (if one suitable for the purpose cannot be purchased,) in which Mr. Reynolds and his associates are to undertake the Antarctic Expedition. It is added that the funds necessary for the purpose are nearly realized.

THE ELM TREE.—We are informed it is in contemplation to erect a stone, or some lasting memorial, with a suitable inscription, upon the spot upon which the "Great Elm" stood. Our readers are aware we allude to the venerable elm tree under which the important treaty between William Penn and the Indians in 1632, was held. The plan of commemorating this interesting event, upon the spot where the transaction took place, is happily conceived.—Penn. Gazette.

Sudden Death.—James H. Gregory, a young man who had recently purchased a farm in the west part of this town, was killed on the afternoon of the 4th inst. by a falling tree.—He left his boarding-house after dinner, and went into the woods to his work, and was found dead an hour afterwards. From the situation in which he was found, it appeared that in felling a tree, it had struck upon another, and been thrown off the stump in a different direction from what he had anticipated, striking him so violently as to produce immediate death.

Lockport Observatory.

Mammoth Beet.—As accounts of the extraordinary productions of the vegetable kingdom are daily going the rounds of the newspapers, we publish the following as a match for any of them. Raised by Col. Magher, in this village, a Beet measuring twenty-two and a half inches in circumference, and weighing seven pounds and fourteen ounces. It was planted late in the season, was of the common turnip kind, and perfectly sound and well formed.—Cherry Valley Gaz.

Introduction of foreign Sheep into Russia.—The Emperor of Russia has appropriated the sum of one hundred thousand roubles in the form of a loan for several years, to the object of improving and enlarging the breeds of sheep in his dominions. This amount is to be placed at the disposal of the proprietors of Courland and Esthonia, for the term of 18 years, to be then reimbursed without interest. Markets for wool had been established at Riga and Libau.—N. Y. Daily Advertiser.

Letters from Gibraltar, dated on the 8th of last month, mention that heavy rains had set in, on the 5th and that letters from Malaga, of the same date, announced that half the crop of fruit was on the ground, drying, and would be entirely destroyed. Great distress was anticipated. A small portion of the crop had been secured.

MARRIED.

In this village, on the 12th inst. by the Editor of this paper, Mr. ——— DOUGLASS, of Orleans, to Miss MARY HIBBARD, of Scipio.

On the 13th inst. by the same, Mr. WM. I. REESE, Pastor of the Universalist Society in West-Mendon, Monroe county, to Miss SARAH SATTERLEE, daughter to the late Hon. WM. SATTERLEE of Sempronius.

In Sempronius, on the 11th inst. by the Rev. Mr. McNeal, Mr. JAMES BRINKERHOFF to Miss CHARITY BRADT, daughter of David Bradt, all of Sempronius.

In Marcellus, on the 7th inst. by Eld. I. Whitnall, Mr. NORMAN CHAPPELL to Miss MARY ANN McCAUSEY.

DIED. on the 27th ult. in the 36th year of her age, SUSANNAH, wife of Eli Stone, of this village, leaving a husband and two children to lament her loss.

She was perfectly reconciled, and on reviewing her former life and sentiments, became convinced of the inefficacy of all external forms and ceremonies, and that her confidence rested on an inward redemption, independent of all worldly considerations, founded as she believed on the pure principle of divine love.

SACRED LYRICK.

By James Edmeston, London.

Where can I go from Thee!

All-present Deity!

Nature, and Time, and Thought, thine impress bear;

Through earth, or sea, or sky,

Though far afar—I fly,

I turn, and find Thee present with me there.

The perfume of the rose,

And every flower that blows,

All mark thy love, in clusters of the vale;

The corn that crowns the fields,

The fruits the garden yields,

Proclaim the bounties that can never fail.

The vapour and the cloud,

The thunder bursting loud,

Speak of thy majesty in words of flame;

The ocean as it roars,

Lashing the rocks and shores,

Declares from what a mighty hand it came.

The vasty globes that roll,

Each on its own firm pole,

Through all the boundless fields of space alone,

Prove that indeed Thou art

The life-wheel and the heart,

Of systems to our little world unknown.

From Thee I cannot fly;

Thine all-observing eye,

Marks the minutest atom of thy reign;

How far so e'er I go,

Thou all my path wouldst know,

And bring the wanderer to this earth again.

But why should I depart?

'Tis safety where Thou art;

And could one spot thy being hold,

I, poor, and vain, and weak,

That sacred spot would seek,

And dwell within the shelter of Thy fold.

IMITATION OF SERVIAN POETRY.

The maiden turn'd her head away—

"You'll have no kiss from me to-day."

"And why to-day, love, must I see

The roses bloom and not for me?"

Tears filled the maiden's raven eyes—

"The lightly won you lightly prize;

To make you prize the kiss you gain,

It must be won by toil and pain;

And seldom, too; so still I say,

You'll have no kiss from me to-day."

CONFERENCE.

The Delegates appointed to meet at Auburn on the third Wednesday and Thursday of October, to take into consideration the subject of forming a Convention for the State of New-York, convened and organized the Conference by choosing Br. J. S. Flagler, Moderator, and L. S. Everett, Clerk.

The Conference then united in thanksgiving and prayer for Divine assistance, with Br. H. Sampson.

On calling for the credentials of Delegates but seven appeared, who took their seats as members of the Conference.

After indulging in free conversation on the subject of their appointment, a Committee of three, composed of Brs. H. Sampson, L. S. Everett, and George Standard, was appointed, to consider the subject, and report to the Conference.

After a recess, the members of the conference were called to order, to hear the report of the committee, which follows.

REPORT.

Your Committee, having taken into deliberate consideration the circumstances of our order in this state, its present prospects, and the means for promoting the advancement of truth within our borders, have been led to the conclusion, that no worse evil could occur to the cause of free inquiry and evangelical truth than the adoption of those plans or measures which tend to give artificial pre-eminence to one class of men over another.

Your Committee are aware of the fact that there may be a want of proper and becoming regulations amongst the order of universalists in this state; yet so far as they are acquainted with the circumstances of Societies and Associations, there is, and ever has been a degree of harmony and good feeling existing among us as a people, which has no parallel in those bodies where arbitrary rules and regulations have been adopted; and this harmony and Christian fellowship have prevailed in exact proportion to the degree of liberty enjoyed.

Believing as above expressed, your Committee respectfully beg leave to submit for consideration and adoption by this Conference, the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That this Conference disapproves of the "New-York State Convention" in its present form, or any other Convention to be composed of Ministers exclusively.

2. Resolved, That a Convention of any kind is not called for by the present circumstances of the order of Universalists in this State.

The foregoing report and resolutions were adopted unanimously.

There being no other business before the Conference, it was voted that the proceedings be published in the Gospel Advocate; and the Conference adjourned sine die.

J. S. FLAGLER, Moderator.

L. S. EVERETT, Clerk.

REMARKS.

Owing to the badness of the roads and other circumstances, there were but about one half of the delegates appointed by the different Associations, present.

The delegates from the Black River and Central Associations, (Brs. P. Morse and D. Skinner,) did not arrive until after the Conference had adjourned. Being desirous to obtain all the information possible, Wednesday was devoted to a candid discussion of the subject of a Convention, during which much harmony of feeling and friendship was exhibited, and many weighty considerations candidly discussed.

There appeared to be but one opinion on the subject of a Convention to be composed "exclusively of ministers." There could not be found among the brethren assembled, one in favour of such a Convention. This argues well. It shows that there is yet a redeeming spirit among Universalists, which will defend the rights of man, and discountenance whatever savours of clerical domination. We rejoice that our brethren now, with one voice, condemn that which threatened to divide and distract our hitherto united order. As soon as the subject had been deliberately discussed, the measure was acted upon with that unanimity which ever has, and ever will preserve us from those evils which have befallen other denominations.

It is nevertheless the opinion of many, that a Convention of some kind is necessary. This subject was not acted upon, as it was well known that a majority of the delegates present, were instructed by their constituents to vote against any Convention being formed at present. We expect to be able to present our readers with arguments for and against the measure, as some of our most capable brethren have intimated their intention to make use of our columns for that purpose. Such a measure would be calculated to elicit many important facts relating to the subject, and we hope it will be adopted.

We have thought proper to make these remarks for the information of our readers, and hope they will not be considered an infringement on the rights of any. Our prayer to God the Lord, is, that harmony may be continued to us to the latest generations, and that nothing hereafter shall occur to disturb the peace of Christians in all God's holy Mountain. Ed. Adv.

REMARKS

ON 1ST KINGS, XVIII. 21.

BY N. DOOLITTLE.

But it is due to some of these false prophets, who we believe would be gladly undeceived if they thought themselves in an error,—to state that some of them appear to be rather inclined to place the character of their God in a more amiable light. They deny that he ever created any beings designing them for endless misery. But they admit that he knew what would be the final destiny of every creature before he created them. Hence, if the doctrine of endless misery be true, he must have known that that would eventually be the portion of some of his creatures when he brought them into existence. If so, could it be an act of goodness or mercy in creating them? If they admit that the God whom they adore had a design in the works of his hands, and some finally sink down to interminable misery, it is self-evident that he must have designed them for that very purpose.

Again: They maintain that this God once created an angel of light pure and holy, and placed him near his holy habitation; and in a mysterious manner which they can never explain, sin originated in this place of holiness, and rendered impure this angel of light and he became a Devil, rebelled against their God, and he drove him out of heaven to a fiery furnace, which was previously prepared for his reception. Now, being full of spite and malice, in order to get revenge, he is going to and fro, over the face of the earth, endeavouring to ensnare as many of the children of men as possible, and drag them after him to his fiery pit; and it is calculated that he will finally succeed very successfully in frustrating the will of his creator, and obtain, and hold an eternal dominion over a far greater portion of mankind, than God who created them. Many more traits of the character of this imaginary Deity which is worshipped by thousands, might be brought forward, but sufficient I trust, have been noticed, to convince every candid and impartial inquirer, that, from the representation of his prophets, he is a cruel and partial being, wanting both power and wisdom.

I shall now notice the obscurity of those doctrines which these teachers communicate for the instruction of their followers. They tell them that if any are saved, they are plucked like brands from the burning by the Almighty Power and outstretched arm of God. At the same time they admit that he is no respecter of persons: that all are equally entitled to his favour; and when inquired of, why he will not save all, then, since all are by nature alike; they will reply that they cannot tell, that it is a mystery, that it is one of the secret things that belong to the Lord their God. Again they assert likewise that if any are saved it is not of works but wholly of the grace of God; yet if they don't perform these works they will certainly be damned and that without remedy. They also inform us that the Godhead in which they believe is composed of three infinite and distinct persons; yet these three infinite persons are but one, and compose but one infinite God. This, reader, appears just as reasonable, and you can comprehend it as clearly, as though I was to tell you that "one and one make but one."—Every candid examiner will become convinced, on a moment's reflection, of the unreasonableness of these doctrines, and will discard them at once as unworthy the reception of any man of common sense. Still, notwithstanding the palpable contradictions of such doctrines which stamp them with falsehood, yet if a person has independency of soul sufficient to dare lift a feeble voice against them, he is immediately branded with the name of heretick or infidel and accused of advocating the devil's doctrine.

Lastly, for the consolation of their brethren they tell them that when arrived at heaven, if there they shall find that some of their children are banished from thence, and consigned to endless burnings, they will then be so reconciled to the will of their Maker, and see his Justice so illustriously vindicated in the ceaseless misery of these helpless victims, that they will be entirely resigned, and raise higher ascriptions of praise to their Creator, who, they will then be enabled to say "hath done all things well." We might go on and produce many more specimens of these doctrines so repugnant to the principles of humanity, which these deceivers have proclaimed through our land, and sounded from hill to dale to the sorrow of thousands who have received them without enquiring for a moment into their ridiculous absurdities; but let these suffice for the present.

We now enquire, what has been the effect produced in the minds of those who have received these doctrines as sacred truths from the cabinet of heaven? Has it not caused many to look up to that being as to an unkind and hard master: whom they imagined was their heavenly Father and patron in the heavens? Has it not caused the rose to fade from the cheek of youth? Has it not destroyed and laid low many in the bloom of life and sent them as despairing mourners to an untimely tomb—once the hope of fond parents and the joy and delight of all around them, as the fragrant plants of summer are laid low by the cold and chilling frosts of winter. Were it necessary, I might here bring forward a catalogue of names who might have proved as ornaments to society, and a blessing to their country, had it not been for the lamentable effects produced by these horrid and bewildering doctrines, which caused them, in despair, to put an end to their lives; their existence here being rendered wretched, "joyless and forlorn." These are but a few of the sad effects of these unmerciful and cruel dogmas which have been published to the world, and which are calculated to freeze up the tender sensibilities of our nature—to render man gloomy, unsocial, unfriendly, and “hard of heart to man.” The writer of this communication has had his mind once clouded by their darkening gloom. The time has been when I would have given all the treasures of earth, if in my possession, could I have been convinced that death would have been my last end—that the grave would swallow me up forever; for I anticipated that nought awaited me beyond the tomb but an endless state of excruciating torture. But I can now rejoice and ascribe praise to the God of heaven, who has delivered me from the jaws of the devouring adversary, and I feel, while in this earthly tabernacle, to warn others to beware of these deceivers and their false doctrines, that they may escape the whirlpool of their destruction.

I now charge you, my brethren, in the faith of Abraham, as though it was the last time I shall ever address you, to shun these false teachers, for their doctrines are blind and delusive, and if received into your minds, will sooner or later cause your tears to flow, and harrow your souls up with trouble.

Many of them represent the path of vice, as a pleasant way—as a way strewn with roses, and adorned with fragrant and ever blooming flowers. But the path of virtue—the way of holiness wherein the pilgrims of Zion travel, they tell you is a way of sorrow and affliction, beset with briars and thorns and “rugged as the mountain brow,” wherein no pleasant prospect is seen to cheer the lonely traveller this side the grave. How different is this description of these two ways from that given in the record from heaven. If the path of virtue be such a rough and cheerless way, what inducement can there be to leave the path of vice? But that portion of doctrine which I would more particularly caution you to avoid at this time, is, that which teaches the never-ending torment of a far greater portion of mankind in a future world, where they will forever curse the day of their existence in unavailing and bitter cries. This unmerciful doctrine is revolting to every principle of our nature, and its falsehood need only be known to be rejected by every benevolent mind. It is calculated to make the hearts of the righteous sad: because it is contrary to the prayer of every Christian, and contrary to the desires of all good men.

The Christian, whose heart glows with love divine, and who prays agreeably to that spirit which is an emanation from heaven, sends forth an ardent desire for the happiness of mankind to the ends of the earth. He feels to embrace all in the arms of benevolence.—Therefore, my brethren, as you value your present and future welfare, and feel interested in the happiness of others, neglect not to warn them against this cruel doctrine, which can never satisfy the longings of an immortal soul, and which is in opposition to the will of heaven. “Entreat, persuade and rebuke them, with all long suffering, gentleness, meekness and love.”

Finally—beware of these false teachers;—for with artful and designing intrigue, with that subtlety wherewith the Serpent beguiled Eve, they will endeavour to lead your souls astray. If you are connected in life and disbelieve their doctrines, they will sometimes watch an opportunity, when you are absent, to enter your dwelling, and endeavour, by smooth speeches, and enticing words, to win over to their creed, the companion of your bosom, by telling her that you are in a gross error; that you have embraced a damnable heresy, &c. Therefore, I charge you to “watch and be sober.” Be instant in season and out of season. Take to yourselves the whole armour of the gospel, that you may be able to resist the temptation of the adversary and to stand having on the breastplate of righteousness and for an helmet the hope of salvation. Then you will finally gain a glorious victory, and be able to come off more than conquerors through Him who, as a manifestation of Jehovah’s Love, died to redeem you, and who will finally raise you to the enjoyment of that immortal inheritance beyond the grave, which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that which fadeth not away.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE, EXAMINATION

*Of a Sermon preached in Chenango, N. Y.
by Josiah Keyes, of the Methodist connexion,
in vindication of the doctrine of the eternity
of future punishment, by J. B. SHANNON.*

In the first place then, let it be observed, that the vision which Isaiah is here relating, is concerning Judah and Jerusalem. See 1st chapter; 2nd verse—“Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth, for the Lord hath spoken. I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master’s crib, but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider.” That the prophet is not speaking exclusively of the Israelites, is manifest from what follows in verse 4th—“A sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil doers, children that are corrupted, they have forenaken the Lord, they have provoked the holy one of Israel to anger, they are gone away backward” 3d and 9th verses, “Wo unto their soul! for they have rewarded evil unto themselves.” If the prophet had at that moment inquired of the Lord, what he should declare to the wicked, the answer would have been, “Cry wo to the wicked, it shall be ill with them for the reward of their hands shall be given them.” “But why shall I cry wo,— is this wo to take place?" The answer of God would be: "As for my people, children are their oppressors, and women rule over them. O, my people, they which lead thee, cause thee to err, and destroy the way of thy paths." See verses 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th. The 5th verse in particular refers to the temporal punishment of Jerusalem. It is said Jerusalem is ruined, and the reason is given—"Because their tongue and doings are against the Lord," &c. Every circum-stance spoken of in the context proves indubitably that the wo in the text refers to the national punishment of the Jews. God says, concerning them, "I will give children to be their princes and babes shall rule over them;" chapter iii. 4th. This refers to an injudicious government; for children and babes will do better upon their mother's lap or in the chimney corner, than at the helm of government. Again; verse 5th, "And the people shall be oppressed, every one by his neighbour." "For at that time, a man should take hold on his brother of the house of his father, saying, Thou hast clothing, be thou our ruler and let this ruin be under thy hand;" verse 6th. But because of the straightness of the times, the brother refuses to take on him the responsibility that necessarily devolves upon a ruler. His reasons for thus refusing to govern, are as follows:—"For my house is neither bread nor clothing: make me not a ruler of the people, for Jerusalem is ruined;" verse 6th. I think that no one will deny that the above quotations refer to the temporal destruction of the Jews. Moses foretold and forewarned the Jews of this same destruction. Deut. xxviii, 22nd, &c.—"The Lord shall smite thee with a consumption and with a fever; and with an inflammation, and with an extreme burning, and with mildew; and they shall pursue thee until thou perish." Here I would ask my opponent, if the consumption, inflammation, &c. means endless misery? Again: verses 23d, 24th,— "And the heavens that are over their heads shall be brass, and the earth that is under their feet shall be iron. The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust; from heaven shall it come down upon thee, until thou be destroyed." Verse 25th—"The Lord shall cause thee to be smitten before thine enemies: thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them; and shall be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth." See this whole chapter in connection with the two following in this book; also, Levit. xxvi, all of which, declare the same truth, viz. that the punishment of the Jews was to be temporal. Now, if it be taken for granted, that Moses understood the future state of man perfectly as well as Mr. Keyes, and knew that some of the Jews to whom he spoke, would go to an endless hell; why did he not act as wise as Mr. Keyes has done, by adding the words future, endless, &c. That Moses is speaking of the punishment of the same people, there can be no reasonable doubt, when we compare the two predictions together. See Isaiah, iii. 17th—"Therefore the Lord shall smite with a scab the crown of the head of the daughter of Zion. Deut. xxviii. 27th, "The Lord will smite thee with the botch of Egypt, and with the emerods, and with the scab, and with the itch, whereof thou canst not be healed."

It would seem, according to Mr. Keyes' 2nd description of hell-fire and brimstone, that it would be almost impossible for one to be there long and not be cured of the itch. Again: see Isaiah, chap. i. 19th verse, "If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land; but if ye refuse and rebel, ye shall be devoured by the sword, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." In Deut. xxviii. we find a specimen of the curses which were to fall upon Israel in case of rebellion. See verses 16th and 19th inclusive: "Cursed shalt thou be in the city, and cursed shalt thou be in the field. Cursed shall be thy basket and thy store. Cursed shall be the fruit of thy body and the fruit of thy land, the increase of thy kine and the flocks of thy sheep. Cursed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and cursed shalt thou be when thou goest out." Here is no less than six curses pronounced against Israel. Now, friend Keyes, I wish you to point out to me the curse or any other declaration of Jehovah, expressive of the doctrine of your proposition, that the punishment of the wicked will be endless, and you will merit the most devout thanks of one who never has been able to obtain such evidence. No one will suppose that the curses in the field, city, basket, flocks, kine and in going out and coming in, meant endless misery. If we turn again to Isaiah, 3d chapter 17th to 26th, after reading the declaration—"thy men shall fall by the sword, and thy mighty men in the war, and thy gates shall lament and mourn, and she shall sit on the ground;" it would seem impossible for any candid person not to confess that all the punishment spoken of, is national and temporal punishment on the Jews.

Having thus considered the context, and called in the aid of other testimony to help me to a right understanding of the subject, and having found nothing worse threatened the Jews than the above named curses, I take it for granted that I have torn up Mr. Keyes' foundation, and therefore his building, which he reared of hay, wood and stubble, will necessarily fall. I am certain that the doctrine of endless wo is not a truth. If it is, why is it not found plainly asserted in the bible? and since Mr. Keyes has agreed that no man is required to believe as an article of his faith, what is not to be found therein, I hope to be excused for an unbelief of endless wo, as the bible contains no such declaration: I might here by express testimony, prove the salvation of all men from sin, but I leave this for a future number, as I probably shall have occasion to notice the fact before I close my examination of the sermon.

ADVOCATE AND INVESTIGATOR.

"EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH."

EXTRACT FROM THE UTICA MAGAZINE.

"I shall now notice the extract, copied by S. from the Gospel Advocate, relative to the proceedings of the Convention at its session last May, and make it appear that the Editor of that paper, though he claims the character of a prophet, is no better entitled to it than S. is. He says; 1st. 'The Convention has already dictated in matters of conscience to those who have acknowledged its authority.'" As a proof and example of this, he says, 'The Convention has not only issued its public instructions in the form of resolutions &c. but it has actually through its committee appointed for such purposes, at least in one instance, sent forth an admonitory letter, censuring a brother in the ministry for holding and propagating certain sentiments therein mentioned, supposed by the Convention to be erroneous, relating to the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Now, Mr. Editor, I do not wish to accuse the Editor of the Advocate of wilful and designed falsehood; (for he says in that very article that he was not in possession of the letter of admonition alluded to (but this much I do say, that this charge against the Convention is absolutely untrue and unfounded. The Convention passed no resolutions relating to, nor addressed to any brother in the ministry with an admonitory letter on, the subject of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. There was not one word said, either in the resolution or letter, on the subject of those ordinances. The resolution was passed, and the brother admonished solely on the ground of his decided opposition to, and his speaking in private and preaching in public against, the organization of churches and societies, and the disciplining of their members—that he was decidedly opposed to any organization either of churches or societies so that they could either discipline their members, or withdraw fellowship from them, whatever might be their characters or conduct—that he was pulling down and endeavouring to destroy what all the rest of our preachers were endeavoring to build up and establish, viz: good order in society—and in addition to this, treated at that time in the presence of the council, an aged brother in the ministry with abuse.

These were the grounds on which the Convention acted. Of this, I am possessed of ABSOLUTE KNOWLEDGE: for I was in the council at the time of these transactions. And facts, it must be confessed by all, "are stubborn things." I regret, however, the necessity of stating these things at this time; more particularly on the account of the brother alluded to, inasmuch as he has since made ample satisfaction to the brother treated with abuse at that time, and I cannot but believe, he begins to see, and will ultimately be fully convinced of the impropriety of the ground he then took relative to societies and churches. My sole motive in mentioning these circumstances is to undeceive the publick, who have been long enough hoodwinked and blinded by these misrepresentations by the enemies of the Convention.

Again, the Editor of the Advocate is mistaken relative to the Convention's "issuing its public instruction" in the form of resolutions," &c. For the resolution and admonition above alluded to, were not publick, nor intended as such, but private ones, intended particularly for the benefit of the individual concerned, and never would have been mentioned in publick, but for the great hue and cry of the enemies of the Convention. But be this now as publick as any one chooses, I care not how publick it is. And the Convention will never be ashamed of having done their duty, as they evidently did in the case above alluded to. As there has been so much said against the Convention by a few disaffected individuals, and so little in reality known of it, it is high time I think to have FACTS stated that our brethren may all be in possession of them.

In a future No. I propose, with your leave, Mr. Editor, to consider the other statements contained in the article from the Gospel Advocate from which the above was taken; and doubt I shall make it appear that the editor of that paper is as much mistaken in his other statements, as he has been shown to be in those already noticed. N.

As we can avouch for the truth of all the statements made by our correspondent in the above communication, we think it due to justice and the cause of truth that our respected brother Editor of the Telescope and Miscellany, should give it a place in his columns; which we have no doubt he will cheerfully do.

As S. intimates that he shall in a future number furnish further remarks on the article from the Advocate, we would suggest to him the propriety of waiting till the result of the approaching Conference at Auburn is known; (as it is hoped that there, all differences and collisions of views and feelings on the subject of the Convention will be reconciled or done away, and that universal harmony may exist hereafter.) If, however, he should write again on the subject we hope he will use gentle and kind language to all, as this is the most effectual method of convincing. We wish him not however to sacrifice or conceal the truth to please any one.—Ed. Utica Mag.

REPLY.

That ever-to-be deprecated god-mother of the Utica Magazine, the "Universalist Convention of the State of New-York"—AS IT IS CALLED, is doomed once more (and we pray God it may never be again necessary to disturb the hateful monster) to pass under the notice of our readers. We had laid aside our pen, with a full purpose of heart never again to trouble our kind patrons with the mention of the name of a thing so obnoxious to the order of Universalists generally throughout the country, when the Utica Magazine, (which was got up to keep the convention alive,) containing the foregoing extract, came to hand. We had just parted with Mr. Skinner of the Magazine, who was here to attend the "Conference," (which observed with becoming decency the funeral obsequies of the Convention,)—we had just bid him "God speed,"—not knowing what awaited us in the womb of time when to our surprise and astonishment, we learned, that while the Editor of the Magazine was at Auburn, declaring without hesitation or reserve, that the Convention in its present form could not exist, the press at Utica was teeming with censure directed against our humble self, for condemning measures, now universally acknowledged to be bad! O, we exclaimed, what a blessed thing it is to be an editor of a paper "published every other Saturday, under the patronage of THE Universalist Convention of the State of New-York." For, reader, when a man is sold to a Convention, and living under the genial warmth of its patronage, he can say what he pleases.

out of his editorial chair, and write what the Convention pleases to dictate, when in it!

What strikes us as peculiarly singular is the fact, that the paper containing the foregoing extract was dated October 13—two days previous to the editor's leaving home to visit this place, and we received it by Friday's mail, six days after it was published, and twenty-four hours after the Editor had left here to return to Utica! Quere—is the circumstance of withholding the paper until after his return, an evidence of his feeling ashamed of its contents? And is not shame an evidence that the ordinary emotions of modesty are felt by the man, while they are extinct in Editor?

To the subject. Ever since the Convention had a name to live, we have opposed it conscientiously, and with firmness. Although there have been several papers constantly published in this state, the Gospel Advocate has been alone in opposition to the Convention in its present form. We have been threatened with a loss of patronage in consequence of the measures we have adopted; and we have been explicitly told by more than one of the friends of the Convention, that we would be destroyed if we persisted. We have been told by the friends of the Convention, that New Associations were about forming, which would "grind the existing ones to powder!" All this, and much more, which might be stated, has been said and done;—but we have persisted in the course, which was deliberately adopted, until we have witnessed a great change of sentiment in those who have heretofore advocated the Convention. Once, but a few discovered, and dared to point out, the defects of that plan;—now, we know of none foolhardy enough to speak in its favour! Even Mr. Skinner, when acting for himself, is disposed to acknowledge the plan defective, but the Editor of the Convention paper, forsooth, would strew the monster's grave with a sprig of Cassia and the emblems of sorrow!

We have adverted to the foregoing facts, to let our readers know, that the Convention is dead, dead, DEAD! and that the above extract is to be viewed, rather as an attempt to protect the ashes of the defunct, than to keep in being an institution so justly abhorred by the majority of Universalists in this state. Having noticed these circumstances, we shall now attend to the extract.

It is difficult to say whether pity or contempt predominated in our mind on perusing the extract under consideration; for it abounds with such miserable attempts to evade the subject in debate, that we truly commiserated the imbecility of the writer, and yet his effrontery seems to entitle his production to our unqualified contempt. We shall notice the article of "N." only with a view to vindicate our former statements, leaving it for others who feel interested, to make what use they please of our remarks.

Our statement, which "N." pronounces "absolutely untrue and unfounded," is the following: "The Convention has already dictated in matters of conscience, to those who have acknowledged its authority." This is "the head and front of our offending!" We are accused by the charitable "N." and the no less charitable Editor of the Magazine, of having uttered an absolute and unfounded misrepresentation, in the above statement! The letter of admonition, it is true, is not in our possession, but remains in the hands of the Editor of the Magazine; nevertheless, we are furnished in their own acknowledgments with enough to clear our skirts from their "avouched" accusations.

Let it be remembered, that we are charged with having made an untrue, and false statement in saying that the Convention has already dictated in matters of conscience. The verb to dictate is defined in our common dictionaries, "to deliver to another with authority." Now, that the Convention did deliver a letter to a certain brother, is not, nor will it be denied. That the letter was delivered with authority is evident from the fact that the Committee, whose names were attached to it, did not act as individuals, but in their official capacity, as directed by the Committee. If the Convention had no authority to act, then it was a non-entity; if the Committee acted according to its instructions, the admonitory letter was a dictatorial one, and "by authority." Next, we are to ascertain whether this gentle, kind, "admonitory letter," had any reference to matters of conscience. That it had reference to a matter of conscience is evident from the fact, that it admonished the subject of its censure, to abstain from preaching his sentiments on the subject of forming societies, &c. and they have not dared to accuse him of preaching what he did not conscientiously believe. Take the statement of the Magazine as the truth, and behold the consistency of this defender of the faith. "He was decidedly opposed to any organization either of churches or societies"—i. e. he was honestly opposed to forming churches and societies—conscientiously opposed to any such thing! What next, the Convention wrote him a letter, and stated the grievances of an "aged brother," and officially admonished him to abandon such practices, to wit, that of "speaking in private and preaching in publick" what were his honest sentiments!! What now becomes of the "absolutely unfounded and untrue" statements of the "editor of the Gospel Advocate?"

But, the knowing authour of the extract, and his "avoucher," may attempt to evade the force of these facts, by insisting that the letter did not relate to the ordinances of the Lord's Supper and Baptism. This was evidently their design; but we fearlessly affirm, that the letter DID relate to those ordinances. It was read in open council, at the Central Association last June, and was explained by those who knew the circumstances, to refer to what had previously transpired between the "aged brother" and the one to whom it was addressed. It is well known that the difference between those brethren, consisted of a complaint on the one hand that the ordinances and discipline were not attended to, and the denial, on the other hand, that such ordinances, and that kind of discipline advocated by the former, were necessary or proper. The "aged brother" complained of the disrespectful manner in which he, and his opinions had been treated.—The letter, therefore, related, not only to the opinion of the brother addressed, on the subject of forming societies, but also to the administration of those ordinances! Even the editor of the Magazine himself, in conversation with the editor of this paper, within ten days, declared, that one ground of complaint against the person to whom the letter was addressed, was, that instead of having a church formed, to whom he would administer the Lord's Supper, he would invite all without discrimination to partake. What sources of "absolute knowledge" the writers for the Magazine have access to, we know not, neither do we care. The letter will speak for itself—let that be produced, and when taken in connexion with the explanation given by the complainant and the friends of the Convention, we shall abide the result.

That the Convention has "issued its publick instructions in the form of resolutions," &c. is a fact evinced in the history of their proceedings. We would advise "N." and his "avoucher" to look again, before he denies a fact so glaring!

The foregoing remarks are submitted to the publick with confidence in the discrimination and good sense of the community. It is with reluctance that we have uttered a word on the subject; but believing that the cause of truth requires it, we have written what we have written. It has been with emotions of astonishment and regret, that we have witnessed the course pursued by the friends of the Convention. We respect them as brethren—we love them as Christians;—but God forbid that on that account we should refrain from vindicating the truth of our own assertions or exposing the incorrectness of their accusations. If we are thought to write with too much warmth, let the reader bear in mind, that there are certain circumstances under which forbearance becomes criminal.

ED. GOS. ADV.

"PERSECUTION."

We have sometimes been surprized to hear the popular religionists of the day raise the cry that they are a persecuted people! Notwithstanding they bear rule over the minds, and (what is more surprizing) the purses of a majority of our citizens—and although they adopt and recommend a rigid policy in all things pertaining to their intercourse with other denominations; yet they would fain have the publick believe, that they are persecuted and set at naught!

The members of a certain church within a hundred rods of this village, have recently been cautioned, by their teacher, to have no intercourse with the Universalists—who at the same time are frequently compared to "dogs"—and yet it is pretended that these same pious and charitable Christians are, persecuted! We mean no offence; but it does appear to the writer of this article, that if our good friends who thus denounce us, would look into their own hearts and examine their own conduct, they would find within themselves a spirit of persecution of the blackest character.

Not many months since, it was declared, by a clergyman in this village, that "were it not for the civil law, and the outstretched arm of Almighty God, the enlightened and polished citizens of Auburn would wash their hands in the blood of the Saints!" Now, we thought at that time, and still think, that the expression was outrageously incorrect and wicked! For, to the praise of the citizens of Auburn be it said, they are not disposed to infringe upon the rights and privileges of any person in any way, much less upon the religious privileges of each other. We wonder, more than at any thing else, that the citizens of this place should suffer such expressions to be made with impunity.

But the above is but one instance of a thousand, in which similar sentiments are advanced. And we greatly marvel, that those who use such language, should claim for themselves the honour of being persecuted! How often has it been said that the Universalists are licentious, immoral, irreligious—that they are the off-scourings of society and all this;—and this too by those persons who are expecting to suffer martyrdom! Within a few weeks, preachers of our order have been pronounced by a certain clergyman in this place, the "recruiting officers of the devil" and all this comes from a persecuted man, and is tolerated by a persecuted people!

We notice these facts with the humble hope that the good sense of this community will correct the evil, and learn the fact that persecution is one thing and the cry of persecution quite another. Let the popular religionists set the example of charity and christian forbearance, and others, if they are not "dogs" indeed, will follow their example.

CORRECTION.

We find in the Christian Telescope of the 13th inst. some remarks by a writer under the signature of S. on an article which appeared in the Olive Branch, in which our remarks on the "New-York State Convention" are called in question. We feel ourself under obligations to the editors of the above papers, to give all the information in our power on the subject in question. This we shall do without ambiguity.

The editors of the Olive Branch seem to think that we were mistaken in saying that the Convention dictated to a brother in matters of opinion, and say—"It is a mistake that 'the Convention has already dictated in matters of conscience to those who have acknowledged its authority.'" Now, we feel bound to declare that it is not a mistake, but a fact susceptible of demonstration, that the Convention, by its Committee of Discipline has dictated in matters of conscience. We referred to a letter addressed to a young brother in the ministry, who was admonished to abstain from declaring his opinion on the subject of forming Churches, &c. The charge of insubordination was preferred against him by a member of the Convention, whose name will be given if required; and it is well known that the subject of the complaint, convinced by this act, that freedom of opinion could not be enjoyed under the reign of the Convention, actually withdrew from it on that account.

It remains to be known whether this censure was dictatorial or not. Of this fact there cannot be a doubt, when it is well known that he was plainly censured for what he had done, and admonished to abstain from holding and propagating his views of church government. We have not the letter in our possession, but a copy of it is in the hands of the Editor of the Utica Magazine, and we are desirous it should be published, that the facts may speak for themselves. The Editors of the Telescope and Olive Branch, may therefore rest assured, that although our statement was from recollection, yet that it was made advisedly.

As to any use that may be made of our remarks, we have nothing to do or say; but that we shall ever feel a deep regret to have them employed to the injury of any person on earth. Our statements had no personal allusions, but related to the New-York State Convention, which has, we fear, been productive of no inconsiderable degree of disquietude and unhappiness in our order.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER.

The following extract was kindly handed us for publication. It accords with the views of a large majority of our brethren in this state; and we hope the authour will favour the publick with a more full development of the subject. We are glad to find that our brethren generally have embraced the same views. ED.

"I am extremely sorry and mortified to find that the former plan for a Convention, so long agitated, has finally succeeded. It is an entering wedge to the destruction of our order in its purity, and, no doubt, has been carried by electioneering and unfair means—'The still small voice,' and the purity of the gospel, would guarantee its success and prosperity; and this Convention is the first step to a creed, that will, in the end, land us among bishops, and fetter us with priest-craft, and at last destroy our religion. I detest the plan, and intend, when I get leisure, to drive the quill against it—to sound the alarm to the laymen, and convince honest priests that the ROCK CHRIST JESUS, wants no extraneous props to keep it in its place.

Yours in the faith,

JOSEPH KINGSBURY.

Sheshequin, Pa. August, 1827."

REMARKS.

The above is from a gentleman of the first respectability and is worthy of being treasured up in the heart of every Universalist. We bid him a hearty welcome to our columns; and will endeavour to yield the little aid in our power, to demolish a plan so abominable as that of the thing misnamed—the "Universalist Convention of the State of New-York."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Steam boat Accident.—The steam boat, William Penn, met with an accident on Tuesday last, when on her passage up, at Dunkirk, which will probably lay her up for the remainder of the season. On starting from the wharf, she carried away the cap of the plunger block that secures the outer end of the main shaft, broke her main shaft and the fly wheel flange, and otherwise materially damaged her machinery. She has since been taken to Erie for repairs. No injury was sustained by the hands, and we have heard no blame charged to the commander or engineer, for the accident.—Buffalo Journal.

Surprising Feat.—One of the workmen employed in building a bridge over the Patterson Falls, in New-Jersey, lately threw himself from the surrounding rocks to the bottom of the falls, a distance of 75 to 80 feet, without injury. On approaching the water, he drew up his feet a little, and as he struck the surface, extended them suddenly, and disappeared. He rose to the surface and swam ashore, after remaining under three or four seconds.

Twelve hundred and fifty houses are said to have been commenced this season, in Philadelphia, which will be finished during the season. The Rochester Telegraph states that there will be half that number put up in Rochester, this season.

An attempt was recently made in the parish of St. Ambrose, near Quebec, by a Ring-tailed or Russian Eagle, to carry off a child seven years old. The lad had a sickle in his hand, with which he successfully defended himself, and killed the bird. The wings expanded upwards of six feet. This is the first well authenticated instance of an eagle's attacking children, in this country.

The Boston Centinel states that $150,000 have been subscribed towards the erection of a Hotel, worthy of the city. The location, it is said, will comprise the estate of Lt. Goy. Phillips, in Common (late Tremont) street.

A Lancasterian School is about to be opened at Trenton, N. Y. of which Joseph Lancaster himself is to have the superintendence.

From the Telescope and Miscellany.

Why should th' all-good, all wise Supreme Create one soul for endless pain?
Why should He raise a part to heaven,
And in despair let part remain?

Sure EARTH is not man's final home—
This realm of strife and care and pain—
There is another, higher home,
Where he forever shall remain.

"Not made with hands," there's no decay;
Not built on earth, there's no despair;
There is no cloud to dark the day:
There is no pain nor sorrow there!

Why was man made if but to weep.
The prey of passion and of pride;
To pine in misery long and deep,
Then sink in Time's oblivion tide.

Or, worse than all, when he was borne
Woes that no human tongue could tell,
And mourn'd while life was left to mourn—
To sink to an eternal Hell!

It cannot be,—God never made
A being for eternal pain;
His image on MAN'S FORM He laid—
That Semblance will He MAR again!

'Tis His own seal; to man alone,
This everlasting pledge was given;
And He will raise it to His throne,
To shine eternally in heaven!

EXAMINATION

*Of a Sermon preached in Chenango, N. Y.
by Josiah Keyes, of the Methodist connexion,
in vindication of the doctrine of the eternity
of future punishment, by J. B. SHANNON.*

Mr. Key's first proposition is, "some sinners do die in their sins." Here I remark. 1st. that, although I am a Universalist, yet I believe that more sinners die in their sins than Mr. Keyes. Where he uses the phrase "some die," &c. I should say, all die, in their sins. See Ezekiel, chap. xviii. 4th: "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Yes, says Mr. K. but this means natural death. How do you know, sir! Is it not a fact, that all men die a temporal death? If so, what is the use of the word sinneth? That it has reference to moral death may be shown from the context. See 5th verse: "But if a man be just and do that which is lawful and right, &c. he shall surely live saith the Lord God." verse 9th. If I should ask Mr. Keyes, if one soul that dies in sin will ever live an holy life again? I think he would answer with much assurance, No! But God declares that if those who are dead, do that which is lawful and right, they shall live. If a man doth live in the righteousness which he hath done; friend Keys must admit, that it means moral life; and if the wicked die in their sins, it means the reverse, which is moral death. This is evident, as life and death are contrasted throughout the whole of this chapter. That all sinners die in their sins, yet, that the same may live again, is a fact. See verses 20th and 21st: "The soul that sinneth it shall die. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son. The righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him; and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him; but if the wicked will turn from all the sins that he hath committed, and keep all my statutes, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live, he shall not die." Yes, so true as God has said, "all have sinned; and the soul that sinneth shall die;" so certain it is, that all men do die in sin. The reason that St. Paul gave, why Christ died for all, was, that all were dead.

The 3d chapter of Ezekiel, which Mr. Keyes quotes, has not an individual application, but a national one. It would be nonsense to say to a living man, you shall live, or to a dead one, you shall die. It is expressly said, that God set the prophet a watchman to the House of Israel. Though Israel was dead in sin, yet they had not experienced the great national death which fell on them at the destruction of Jerusalem. See Levit. chapter vi. 34th: "And they that are left of you shall pine away in your iniquity in the enemies' land; also in the iniquity of your fathers shall ye pine away with them." Now, kind reader, please to turn to Ezekiel, chap. xi. 11th, and you will find that Ezekiel was commanded to go to the people of the captivity, to whom he delivered his message. Hence, you see that pining away in iniquity, &c. means a state of captivity. The captivity and calamity which took place in the days of the prophet Ezekiel, was hardly to be compared with the captivity and destruction when Jerusalem was destroyed. The people were informed that the only way to escape this calamity, was to turn from their idolatry, &c. I think, if Mr. K. could prove that all who die in sin, go to an eternal, endless hell, he would find himself in as awful a dilemma as his wicked neighbours. Paul tells his Ephesian brethren, that they were dead in trespasses and sins; yet they were quickened, that is, made alive. But Mr. K. is not of this opinion. He supposes that men will die a spiritual death,—totally. See sermon, page 5-6. As I do not recollect of any statement in the scriptures, where it is said that the spirit dies; I think it falls on Mr. K. to prove this statement, or confess it erroneous. The scripture declares that the spirit returns to God who gave it.—Eccl. xii. 7th. I think my opponent would not be willing to admit, that God either gives or receives dead spirits. If the spirit dies, and the flesh is also dead; I would ask Mr. K. how there can be a warfare in the human breast? St. Paul tells us, that at the same time that the body was dead because of sin, he served God in the spirit.—Romans, i. 10th. Friend K. quotes John viii. 24th: "Then said Jesus unto them, I go my way, and ye shall die in your sins." Mr. K. Remarks, that "the death here described could not have been spiritual death; because the instant the man refused to take warning he became spiritually dead." 1 seems, according to this statement of my opponent, that he believes that all men die a spiritual death. He adds "that when the creature refused to believe, he became spiritually dead." Very well; but it seems, sir, that you have lost sight of your creed, which says;—"All men, by the fall, lost communion with God, and died death temporal, spiritual and eternal in Adam." If this be true, how can a man, on refusing to believe, become spiritually dead? Unless a dead man can die, there is no possibility of any man's dying on refusing to believe the truth. If men die the three fold death in Adam, as our limitarian brethren preach; I wish to be informed, how any man can become more dead? Mr. K. quotes 2nd Pet. ii. 12th: "But these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not, and shall utterly perish in their own corruption." Upon this text, Mr. K. remarks as follows: "The word perish, whenever used in scripture, signifies death temporal, or spiritual, or eternal, to say the least; it here signifies temporal death. The Apostle says they shall utterly perish in their own corruption, that is totally and finally. If this is true they must die in their sins." Here I remark, that as death eternal is not to be found in the scriptures, I am under no obligation to believe it. I think that Mr. K. ought first to have proved that such a death exists, instead of taking it for granted, and endeavouring to palm it upon the world with a "Thus saith the Lord." Suppose it means temporal death, it would only prove that men wholly or totally die. Whoever will examine the context, will find that Peter was encouraging and consoling his persecuted brethren, by informing them that those who troubled them could not cease from sin, and should receive the reward of unrighteousness. Still it is said in scripture that "Jesus shall make an end of sin."—Dan. ix. 24th. Consequently, when this is done, they will cease from sin. These characters, that utterly perish in their own corruption, are the accursed children that we read of in Deut. xxviii. 22d; Pet. ii. 14. I now say once for all, if Mr. K. is prepared to prove that any part of the punishment inflicted upon those cursed children, is to take place in eternity; I shall then, and not till then, acknowledge that I am wrong, and propagating false doctrine.

As we have proved that all men die in their sins, instead of some men; unless Mr. K. prove the reverse, it will necessarily follow, that if those who die in sin, go to punishment, and their punishment is eternal, all, without exception, will be endlessly lost. Perhaps, Mr. K. will favour us with another evidence of his integrity in favour of his favourite doctrine of endless wo! If so, we shall be heartily willing to give him a re-hearing at any time he may think best.

Mr. K. proves that some die in their sins by adverting to the case of the Antideluvians, Sodomites, &c. But why labour to prove that which every one acknowledges to be true? Again: "How many times has the drunkard, in attempting to reel from the tavern to his dwelling, landed in eternity! In how many instances have men laid violent hands upon themselves, and taken their own lives!" All this we admit; but what has this to do with endless misery? Speaking of the assassin being killed, the moment he was about to murder his neighbour, he adds—"Those persons died in the act of wickedness. The circumstances of the death of some of them, cut them off from the possibility of repentance." I would ask Mr. K. if he will risk his arguments on the supposition, that the Antideluvians and Sodomites will be eternally lost? On this ground, no doubt if any. We will now spend a few moments in investigating this subject.

1st. The old world which was once drowned is to be saved. See Peter, 3d chapter:—"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the spirit; by the which he went and preached to the spirits in prison, which sometime were disobedient, &c." Who were those who were sometime disobedient. (not eternally so,) when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah? Here I would inquire, what did Christ preach to those Antideluvians? Perhaps Mr. K. would answer—Endless Wo! But what would he preach this doctrine for? To preach is to teach; and to teach supposes the party taught to be ignorant. Were the Antideluvians ignorant of the duration of their punishment? No, says Mr. K. Did they know why they were punished? Ans. No. Did Christ preach to them for their good? Certainly not. But what does Peter say he preached to them for? Answer, "That they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit. It appears that Christ went up and down in the earth doing good. Paul says, God is the same to-day, yesterday, and forever. If so, I think he must have went to the Antideluvians to do them good; and it is blasphemy to say the reverse. Mr. K. supposes those who have been swept from the face of the earth in their sins, to be cut off from the possibility of repentance. If so, Christ preached to them that they might live according to God in the spirit, without repentance. Mr. K. will now say, that there is no proof of any man's being delivered from death in another world;—that Peter meant, that Christ preached through Noah to the Antideluvians, &c. In reply to this, I remark, 1st, St. Paul, Heb. ii. 15th, says: "Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he (Christ) also took part of the same, that, through death, he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil; and deliver them, who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage." As Mr. K. supposes there can be no alteration for the better in another world, I would ask him, where Christ will deliver those spoken of in the above text? It will not do to answer, in this life; for they who are all their lifetime subject to bondage, cannot be delivered in this life; for that would prove, that they were not in bondage all their life time, that is, to their latest breath. Therefore, they will be brought to live, according to God in the spirit, in another world.

2d. Does Peter say that Christ preached through Noah? No, certainly not. "Christ being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the spirit, by which, he (Christ) went and preached to those which were some time disobedient in the day of Noah." The plain obvious fact is, that after Christ was crucified, he went, as the spiritual head of every man, and proclaimed 'glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people;' to those departed spirits. How must the hearts of those prisoners have expanded with joy, love and gratitude at the appearance of this heavenly visitant! How must they have exclaimed—

"Blest Jesus, what delicious fare!
How sweet thy entertainments are;
Never did angels taste above,
Redeeming grace and gentle love."

As it regards the Sodomites, it is only necessary to add at this time, that God hath said they shall be restored. See Ezekiel, chap. xvi. 53d-63d. I shall not transcribe the whole chapter here, but wish the reader to examine for himself. Notwithstanding God punished them for their wickedness, he declares, "Nevertheless, I will remember my covenant with thee in the days of thy youth, and will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant: then thou shalt remember thy ways, and be ashamed, (not damned,) when thou shalt receive thy sisters, thine elder, and thy younger; and I will give them unto thee for daughters but not by the covenant: (that is of works:) and I will establish my covenant with thee; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord: that thou mayest remember and be confounded, and never more open thy mouth, because of thy shame when I am pacified toward thee for all thou hast done, saith the Lord God."

Mr. K. inquires how a drunkard can repent in a fit of intoxication? In my turn I would ask, how the drunkard will obtain his liquor to get drunk? If he has none he cannot get intoxicated; therefore he may reform.

Again: my opponent inquires, "how the self-murderer can repent?" and then answers—"it cannot be," &c. But I would ask if Paul has not said, that the "Gifts and calling of God are without repentance?"—Rom. xi.

29th. Though it is said, (in the present tense,) "that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him;" yet it is said "his life is hid with Christ in God."

I have now passed through Mr. K.'s arguments under his 1st proposition, and submit the result of my examination to an enlightened publick. It is true I have said nothing on the agency of man—spoken of by my opponent—because it is a matter of indifference with me at present.

I must be pardoned here, for mentioning one more clause on page 4th. He states, "it is possible for sinners to continue on, in a course of rebellion and die in the very act of wickedness; and no man can prove that this will not be the case." According to Mr K.'s reasoning; he either must say it is possible for all men to be saved, and it cannot be proved, that that which is possible to be done, will not be done; or turn Calvinist, and say it is impossible for all mankind to be saved; therefore they will not be.

REMARKS

BY N. DOOLITTLE.

NO. 2.

Having in a former number noticed, in a very brief manner, the character of false gods, and their prophets,—their doctrines, and the effect of their doctrines; we design in this communication to notice 1st, the character of the true God who is the blessed and only Potentate—the King of kings, and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality, &c. 2nd. The character of his prophets or teachers—speak of some of their doctrines, and notice their glorious and happy effect when received into the minds of the children of men.

When finite mortals raise their minds to contemplate the perfections of Jehovah—that Being of beings who, from the confusion of chaos, caused the universe in order, in beauty and grandeur to arise; they are lost in wonder. The imagination, after its sublimest flight, will return weary and unsatisfied from the boundless and incomprehensible field; for none, by searching, can find out God to perfection. Being self-existent, and the cause of all existence, he must be independent and infinite in all his attributes, "seeing he giveth life and breath to all things." When we look around us upon what God has made, we behold a few faint glories of his perfections shining forth in his works. The existence of the wide world is a sublime exhibition of infinite power. The heavenly bodies, that in order pursue their revolving course, from which no jar of discord can turn them aside, tell us that infinite wisdom marked out their path and devised their harmonious plan. The impartial beneficence of the Most High, is seen throughout all his works. It

"Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
Glow in the stars, and blossoms in the trees,
Lives through all life, extends through all extent, Spreads undivided, operates unspent."

In short, the heavens above, the earth beneath, unite in declaring with one unanimous voice that the "Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." His divine presence pervades and fills his boundless empire.

"To him, no high, no low, no great no small :
He fills, he bounds, connects, and equals all."

He is ever regardful of the wants of his animal creation. The inexhaustible stores of his munificence, like the treasures of an unfailing ocean, are always open to supply their need. His watchful and parental care is ever extended over his offspring man. We cannot wander where he is not, nor where he beholds us not with unchangeable affection. "How excellent is thy loving kindness. O God ! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings. They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house ; and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasure "

In the Scriptures of divine truth the Lord Most High has revealed himself to us as all glorious in his character, as a Being every way entitled to our highest praise, adoration and love. We can there read of his Almighty Power, of his Infinite Wisdom—his boundless and unchangeable love ; and contemplate him as our Father in heaven,—the friend and benefactor of the human race. The least of his creatures are objects of his regard :

"He sees with equal eye, as God of all,
A hero perish, or a sparrow fall."

We can learn his impartial benevolence, loving kindness, and tender mercy, from the instructions of Christ, who is said to be the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person. He told his disciples that to become imitators of God as dear children,—to be merciful as their Father in heaven was merciful ; they must love their enemies ; bless them who cursed them, and pray for those who despitefully used and persecuted them : that they must be kind to the evil and to the unthankful. Here we learn that no partiality nor malevolence dwells with the God of heaven : but he who created the round world and they which dwell therein, loves his enemies ; that his goodness extends to all. As an evidence of this, we are commanded to behold the sun rising and shedding its rays indiscriminately upon all, and to witness the showers of rain descending upon the just and on the unjust. Is this the character of the God of heaven ? How worthy of our supreme affection. No "terrors clothe his brow, no thunderbolts of wrath to drive our souls to fiercer flames below." All is love—impartial love, and goodness all divine.

Having noticed the character of the true and living God ; and discovered that he is incomparably glorious, and altogether lovely in all his perfections ; we pass secondly to consider the character of his prophets or teachers, and notice their doctrine.

Those who go forth as teachers of the Most High, to declare the Gospel of God's Salvation, if commissioned from heaven, will imitate the conduct and example of him who first proclaimed its joyful tidings on the earth. They never will manifest by their conduct a disposition which says, "s and by, for I am holier than thou," or represent themselves as inheriting some better favours from heaven than others ; but they will be clothed with meekness and humility. They will endeavour to alleviate the sorrows of the afflicted, to dry up the tears of the mourner, and convey a balm of consolation to the wounded heart. They will deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before God. Being possessed of that philanthropick disposition so strikingly exhibited in the conduct of our exalted Saviour ; they will strive to promote the true happiness and spiritual welfare of all mankind, and study by a well ordered life and Godly conversation, to adorn the glorious doctrine of their Redeemer in all things. Realizing "that he who putteth a piece of new cloth upon an old garment thereby makes the rent worse," as ministers of the gospel of reconciliation, they never will mingle its peaceful and heavenly tidings with the fiery threatenings and thunders of Mount Sinai. As the gospel is a scheme of divine and impartial grace, unfolding the unchangeable love of heaven to man, and revealing the eternal purposes and designs of Jehovah relative to his final destiny ; hence, as bearers of its cheering messages, they have no other tidings to proclaim. Having received nothing from their heavenly Father but his loving kindness and tender mercy, they have nothing else to communicate to others. Knowing that it is the "goodness of God that leadeth men to repentance," they will tell them the story of man's fall, and the glorious news of his redemption ; of that unchangeable love that was not withdrawn from him when he had become estranged from God, and had disobeyed the injunction of his Maker. They will inform them that Christ has come, and tasted death for every man,—died, and rose again, as an evidence that we, in due time, shall rise also, and be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God : that he has brought life and immortality to light through the gospel, as the treasure which heaven has in store for all the alienated and now wandering children of men. They will remind them of the declaration of all God's holy prophets who, St. Peter declares, have testified of the restitution of all things since the world began. This will carry their minds forward to that period, when all the designs of God shall be brought to a noble and grand completion; when an end shall be made of sin; when God shall be all in all; when the last wanderer shall return an humble penitent to his heavenly Father's house; when tears shall be wiped from off all faces, and the whole creation unite like one happy family in singing the song of heaven. They will also, if they do their duty, impress upon their hearers the importance of, and the benefits resulting from, keeping the commandments of God, by pointing out to them the evil consequences of pursuing a course in vice, and the glory and happiness arising from pursuing the path of virtue; thereby inducing them to refuse the evil, and choose the good. They will ever strive to lead the wayward children of men to the fountain of true joy by marking out the road that leads to heaven.—In short, they will always, as they carry along the glad tidings of salvation, communicate that instruction and those soul-cheering truths which are calculated to promote the true glory and felicity of man; “as becometh good ministers of Jesus Christ nourished up in the words of faith and sound doctrine.” When mankind are thus brought to behold the character of the Most High, and become acquainted with the sublime truths of the gospel, love and gratitude to God will spring up in every heart. They will no longer imagine Deity as clothed with vengeance and offended with the works of his hands; but they will know that the glory of God consists in the happiness, and not the misery of his creatures. Mankind will no longer represent God,

“As predestinating some to heaven without pretence, And some to hell for no offence, Inflicting endless pains, for transient crimes, And favouring sects, or nations, men or times.”

But they will see and realize that Jehovah's kind providence, and tender mercy is extended over all; that all mankind are brethren, belonging to the same family, of which Christ is the head; who will guide them through this unfriendly world, and finally bring them to a home of eternal life and immortal glory, in that world where change and decay will never come. Beholding ten thousand evidences of God's impartial love in the heaven's above, and the earth beneath, they will banish all those creeds and systems of faith which eventually limit his mercy to a part of mankind to the shades of eternal night; realizing that man's final destiny “is to glorify God and enjoy him forever.” Then there will be but one people, the people of God. All partition walls will be broken down. Bigotry will not lift her head to curse the world any more. Mankind will be drawn by the cords of brotherly love to unite in the bonds of union. No jarring discords, nor clashing interests will exist. And the angel of Peace clothed with divine benignity will descend and take up her abode among the children of men.

ADVOCATE AND INVESTIGATOR.

“EARNESTLY CONTENT FOR THE FAITH.”

“ALBANY CHRISTIAN REGISTER”—AGAIN.

Having through the politeness of the editor of the “Albany Christian Register,” received an extra copy of that paper, (for which he will please accept our warmest thanks,) we are enabled to conclude our reply. The next paragraph in order, is the following:

“We are aware that universalists pay very little regard to the means used in any branch of their doctrine: and hence we see them ridiculing tract societies, sabbath schools, and the other ordinances calculated to make the rising generation fear God, and become useful and wholesome members of society.—They will of course deny the truth of this assertion, when based on broad grounds; but whoever is acquainted in the least with the sinful propensities of our natures, from the cradle to the grave, and the consequent effect of their indulgence or restraint, must know, that teach a child in the way he should not go and when it is old it will not depart from it. The wharves of our city present a most lamentable evidence of the truth of this position. Go to the hundreds of squallid and bloated objects who are staggering under their filth and dirt, and ask them if they were brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord whether they were Sunday school scholars—whether they were taught to read or ridicule tracts: or whether their parents have instructed them in the theoretical or practical rudiments of universalism, and we will leave it to the advocate to contrast and record the difference between the “Liberal” and the “Limitarian” system”

The first sentence in the above paragraph we are unable to comprehend. If however, it was the intention of the writer to accuse us of neglect in the use of means to inculcate our doctrine, we will assure him, that his brethren generally do not censure us very often on that account; and we will endeavour to be more industrious in future! We plead guilty to the charge of hostility to tract societies, sabbath schools, &c. feeling assured that they are only kept up by sectarians to afford them opportunities to instil into the tender minds of children, those absurd tenets, by a propogation of which they gain a livelihood. Those institutions (we never heard them called ordinances before) are resorted to, with a view of sustaining what reason and revelation condemn. For this reason we oppose them. They are designed to "make the rising generation fear"—the devil—more than God; and ought to be exposed to contempt!

The Register speaks of "the sinful propensities of our natures;" but where is the proof that the propensities of nature are sinful? We admit that sinful propensities exist; but affirm, that they are creatures of education. Let ministers refrain from dealing "damnation round the world," and there will no longer be found a propensity to profanity,—let them cease from preaching the delusive doctrine that we can escape the just punishment of our sins, and sin will no longer exist in all God's holy mountain!

We are willing to ask the dissolute the cause of their sinfulness; and firmly believe there would be found a large majority of instances, in which crime originated in the doctrine of endless woe. Go to the "squalid and bloated objects" of whom Mr. Hoffman speaks, and they will tell you, that they were brought up under the influence of orthodoxy! Go to our State Prisons, and inquire of the miserable beings there confined, what are their sentiments,—and not one who knows the doctrine of Universalism can be found among them! Indeed it is a notorious fact, that the children of orthodox ministers and strenuous professors, are generally more liable to go astray than others! But how can it be said, that hundreds of those miserable beings are rendered thus wretched, in consequence of having been instructed in Universalism; when it is well known that but a very small proportion of the inhabitants of this country have even known the sentiment,—much less believed it? We are surprized that any one should impute so much evil to a doctrine yet in its infancy! By comparing the conduct of Universalists with that of Limitarians, we confess ourselves unable to discover any great superiority in the latter. But we desire to improve in virtue, rather than to boast of our own righteousness. We admit that Universalists are not as good as their doctrine requires them to be; while for the gratification of the Limitarians, we confess they are altogether better than their god, or their doctrine! But we attend to what follows.

"Let us suppose for an instant, the great family of man, with all their passions, to believe the end of this life an introduction into one of eternal happiness; what would be the result? would it do away or increase the necessity of bolts and bars? would the "laws of conscience" induce our wise editor to intrust his property with a strange brother, taking a draft on his conscience for the faithful application of it? Any man, in the least acquainted with poor degraded human nature, acknowledges the necessity of a belief in future punishments to be interwoven with our existence, to make man even a tolerable member of society, setting aside the influence of that belief on his conduct as a christian."

We have no objection against supposing what would be the condition of the great family of man, were all believers in universal salvation; for that would be the case of every individual of Adam's progeny so far as himself is concerned. All Limitarians entertain a hope for themselves, of salvation from future punishment. The difference, therefore, between an Universalist and Limitarian is simply this—the former believes in his own salvation and that of all mankind—the latter believes in his own salvation and that of a part of mankind. Now we leave it for Mr. Hoffman to decide, whether the former belief would increase the necessity of bolts and bars. Again:—The doctrine of endless punishment has long prevailed, and yet the fact stares us in the face, that crime increases under its influence! Nor will it be pretended that those who believe that abominable absurdity, are always restrained from evil? For, if the editor of the Register will call to mind a few cases of infamous conduct on the part of clergymen of his own faith, in his own city, he will not presume to make the statement.—Neither the laws of conscience, nor the fear of that hell they preached to others, restrained them from the most dark and disgraceful crimes! We profess to know something of "poor, degraded human nature," but we confess ourself unable to find any thing in future endless punishment which is calculated to restrain the passions or propensities of mankind. For the doctrine of endless hell-torments, in all its ramifications, contains enough to warrant the expectation of an escape from all the penalty of God's holy law; while on the other hand, the doctrine of Universalism, teaches the solemn and restraining truth, that God "will by no means clear the guilty." To suppose, therefore, that a belief in future punishments must be interwoven with our existence, to make man even a tolerable member of society, is an assumption neither authorized by experience, nor testified by scripture. Will Mr. Hoffman pretend that the fear of hell is all that makes him "a tolerable member of society?" If so, we pity him, and commiserate the condition of his neighbours! At all events, when we hear him virtually say, that those who do not believe in hell torments hereafter, are not tolerable members of society, we conclude that the belief in such punishment, though it be interwoven with his existence, has not been productive of any too much charity! But we shall presently see that he refutes himself.

"But what constitutes a universalist christian? The bare profession of the dogmas of the church, without a particle of pretention to faith or good works. This fact is sufficiently evidenced in the dissolute and abandoned life of the bulk of its professors, and corroborated by the unhappy acknowledgements of the Advocate last week. By this, we do not mean to be understood as saying that a universalist cannot be a wholesome citizen; for we are acquainted with many individuals, who doubt the existence of revealed truth altogether, whose walk in life is so unexceptionable otherwise, that we leave their religious speculations to be impugned by Him who at all times judgeth aright. But we mean to say, that the doctrine advanced by the editor of the Advocate, is not only inconsistent with all the revealed perfections of the Creator, but also subversive of the moral and good government of society."

It is truly surprising to witness the disposition of our opponents to take to themselves all that is holy and good, while they deny to Universalists the privilege of being considered either sincere in their professions, or honest in their faith. Who told the editor of the Register that a bare profession of the dogmas of the church without a particle of pretention of faith or good works constitute a "Universalist Christian?" If our opponents will for once open their eyes, they will find to their confusion, that the reason why Universalists are denounced, is because they believe too much—because they have too much faith! And, although we wish not to put ourselves on a level with Limitarians, by boasting of our good works, yet we hesitate not to say, that, as a people, we fear not to compare moral characters with our opponents.

But Mr. Hoffman thinks the statement made by him, "is sufficiently evidenced in the dissolute and abandoned life of the bulk of its professors!" Here, again, we find a specimen of Mr. H.'s charity. But, as a sufficient refutation of this ungenerous accusation, we refer him to our prisons! Nay, we venture to say, that there is less crime committed by Universalists, than by any other denomination of Christians in our country, having due regard to the numerical strength of the different parties. We advise our friend of the Register, to look at home, and see if professors of his own faith are not, as a body, subject to the common frailties of human nature—see if there are not many among them, who, were it not for their assumed sanctity, would be despised by the upright in heart for their want of charity, their disposition to injure and oppress, their hypocrisy, their dissolute habits, and as above stated, their debauchery! The City of Albany alone has produced two instances within a few years, in which clergymen of the Limitarian faith, have been convicted of the most black transactions! To this might be added a third instance in which intemperance seized upon its victim, and dragged him from the Desk and from the world! And yet, the Albany Christian Register accuses a denomination, of which the editor knows but little, of being dissolute and abandoned! We repeat, let them first cast the beam out of their own eye, and then they will see more clearly to pluck the mote out of their neighbour's eye. It is, however, to be ingeniously acknowledged, that there are many who call themselves Universalists, whose lives are not conformed to the precepts of the heavenly doctrine they profess; yet these cases are to be imputed to the former degradation of their minds, under the influence of the "fear that hath torment," and not to any demoralizing tendency of the doctrine of Universalism. But the orthodox, (as they call themselves,) have a happy faculty of palming off upon us all those who have been rendered desperate in wickedness under the droppings of their own sanctuary! This unfair treatment will yet result to their own disgrace; for be it known unto them, (their assertions to the contrary notwithstanding,) that we do hold to the necessity of good works, and encourage it in our preaching with as much faithfulness as our accusers.

As relates to our "unhappy acknowledgments," we briefly observe, that the evil in the conduct of some of our brethren at which we hinted, was a disposition to copy after the bad practices of our opponents; and that we honestly consider it an evil of the greatest magnitude, to have Universalists favourably disposed towards the "orthodox" unholiness of the times.

The assertion that the doctrine we advance is "inconsistent with all the revealed perfections of the Creator, and subversive of the morals and good government of society," we pass with one remark. It is much easier for our opponents to make such assertions, than it is to prove the truth of their declarations. Let them attempt to sustain by scripture or argument what they advance, and we are ready to meet them.

But, we would invite the reader to look at a statement in the foregoing paragraph of the Register, and compare it with one before quoted. Here we are told, that he does "not mean to be understood that a Universalist cannot be a wholesome citizen"—but just before we find it declared as follows: "Any man in the least acquainted with poor degraded human nature, acknowledges the necessity of a belief in future punishments to be interwoven with our existence to make man even a tolerable member of society." This is a specimen of their consistency! They do not deny that Universalists may be wholesome citizens; and yet a belief in hell torments must be interwoven with our existence to make man even a tolerable member of society! Mr. Hoffman! thou hast immortalized thyself!!

TO OUR PATRONS.—The fifth volume of the Advocate is drawing to a close, and we earnestly invite those who have not paid us, to forward their several dues, either through our agents or otherwise, without delay. The expenses of the establishment are great, and we find ourselves under the necessity of urging payment. Mr. Tuttle, one of the publishers, is now on a tour to the West, and those who do not send by mail, we hope will be prepared to pay promptly, what remains due, to him. Brethren, don't forget us!

NEW PAPER.—We have received the three first numbers of a paper entitled "Star in the West," edited by J. Ridwell and D. D. Hall, published at Eaton, (O.) and designed to sustain liberal christianity and free inquiry. We have not time to express fully our good opinion of the work—suffice it to say that its appearance and matter are a sufficient recommendation of the work—may God bless this star in the West and cause its effulgence to enlighten the minds of ten thousand.

SERMON.

Twice had the sun gone down on the earth, and all as yet was quiet at the sepulchre; death held his sceptre over the Son of God; still and silent the hours passed on; the guards stood by their posts, the rays of the midnight moon gleamed on their helmets and on their spear; the enemies of Christ exulted in their success, the hearts of his friends were sunk in despondency and sorrow; the spirits of glory waited with anxious suspense to behold the event, and wondered at the depth and the ways of God. At length the morning star, arising in the east, announced the approach of light; the third day began to dawn on the world, when on a sudden the earth trembled to its centre, and the powers of Heaven were shaken; an angel of God descended; the guards shrunk back from the terror of his presence, and fell prostrate on the ground. His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment was as white as snow; he rolled away the stone from the door of the sepulchre, and sat on it. But who is he that cometh from the tomb, with dyed garments from the bed of death?—He that is glorious in his appearance, walking in the greatness of his strength! it is thy Prince of Zion! Christian, it is your Lord!—He hath trodden the wine press alone; he hath stained his raiment with blood; but now as the first born from the womb of nature, he meets the morning of his resurrection.—He arises, a conqueror from the grave; he returns with blessings from the world of spirits; he brings salvation to the sons of men. Never did the returning sun usher in a day so glorious! It was the jubilee of the universe! The Father of mercies looked down from his throne in the Heavens with complacency; he beheld his world restored—he saw his work, that it was good. Then did the desert rejoice, the face of nature was gladdened before him, when the blessings of the Eternal descended, as the dews of heaven, for the refreshing of the nations.

INTENDED TO PROMOTE THE CAUSE OF GOD'S IMPARTIAL GRACE, FREE INQUIRY, AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

L. S. EVERETT, EDITOR.

The "Gospel Advocate and Impartial Investigator" is too well known to the public to require a development of its character or object. Judging from the liberal patronage it has received, we conclude our endeavours to spread the knowledge of unadulterated Truth have met with the approbation of our friends; and while it is acknowledged that a work of this kind is much needed, we trust that our faithfulness, and devoted endeavours to promote the cause we have espoused, will secure at least the continuance if not an increase of patronage.

During the progress of the 5th Volume, we have received such and so many unqualified assurances of the approbation of the publick, that a discontinuance of the work would be an act of contempt to our generous patrons and friends. We have therefore resolved to enter upon the publication of the Sixth Volume with the determination to persevere in the cause with more entire devotedness; and while we enter upon the arduous task, we look to God and a generous publick for that encouragement to which our labours may entitle us.

The sixth volume will be somewhat improved in its appearance, though not materially different from the fifth. Every weekly number will contain a pleasing variety of doctrinal, practical, historical, polemical, poetical, and miscellaneous matter; to which will be added a brief summary of general intelligence, in small type. Our columns, as heretofore, will be open to the arguments of our opponents, and the well written essays of our friends. Religion and morality will be assiduously inculcated; virtue will be approbated and encouraged; vice will be openly and fearlessly exposed; honest opinions will be respected; the rights of man will be protected; and the arts of hypocrisy will be duly castigated. Amongst other things, it will be our constant endeavour to promote unity and peace within the borders of our Zion, by concentrating the strength, and perpetuating the prosperity of the cause of impartiality.

CONDITIONS.

The Gospel Advocate and Impartial Investigator Vol. 6, will be published by L. S. EVERETT and G. TUTTLE, every Saturday, at Auburn, Cayuga County, N. Y. and afforded to subscribers who receive them by mail at One Dollar and fifty cents, and to village subscribers who receive them at their doors two dollars—payable in advance.

No subscription will be received for less than one year, (which includes the whole volume,) and no paper will be discontinued until all arrearages are paid.—Those who have received the Fifth volume will be considered as subscribers for the sixth unless notice of discontinuance is given before the first of January next; at which time the volume will commence. It will be printed on good paper, Super Royal, 8 vo. and handsome type, each number to contain eight pages, making in all four hundred and sixteen, to which a handsome Title page and Index will be added at the end of the year.

Those who have hitherto acted as agents are requested to continue such during the year. Post Masters are respectfully requested to act as agents, and will confer a particular favour by sending remittances and procuring subscribers.

Any person who will obtain six new subscribers and will forward the pay for the same, shall receive the seventh copy gratis. All Letters must be addressed to the "Editor of the Gospel Advocate, Auburn, Cayuga Co. N. Y." and come free of postage in order to receive attention.

Auburn, Cayuga Co. N. Y. Oct. 1827.

The GOSPEL ADVOCATE, and IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR, is published every Saturday, by L. S. EVERETT and G. TUTTLE, at $1 50, if paid in advance; $2 00, if paid within six months, and $2 50, if not paid within the year.

REMARKS

ON 1ST KINGS, XVIII. 21.

BY N. DOOLITTLE.

NO. 3.

We have now in a very brief manner noticed the character of a false God, and his prophets; their communications, and the effect produced by them. Secondly, we have noticed a few traits of the character of the "only living, and true God." Also the character of his prophets or teachers; their doctrines, and their glorious, and happy effect when believed and received into the minds, of the children of men.

Now kind reader if the Lord be God, if his Glory consists in the happiness of his creatures, if he has created for good and noble purposes, and has designed that his offspring shall never be losers, but eventually gainers by their existence; if he possesses the disposition and will to save all men, and will finally guide them from this world to a state of immortal happiness beyond the grave, where sin, nor death, where no corroding care, imperfection, sorrow, no pain will ever find admission; then follow him. Let his precepts be engraved upon the palms of your hands, and be as ornaments about your neck. Then joy and peace shall spring up around you wherever you go.—Then a mindfulness of his everlasting love, and the recollection of his tenderness, united with a firm and unshaken confidence in his promises, will be to you a solace in every scene of life; it will produce tranquility and resignation of mind, in the hour of affliction, and enable you to triumph in death. But if Baal, be the true God if he has created mankind designing that a great portion of them should be, or knowing that they would be endlessly miserable, if he is a partial, and cruel being, if he is clothed with a cloud of vengeance, filled with vindictive wrath, which like a storm of rain, will finally burst upon the head of his defenceless offspring and consign them to the fiery pit of eternal despair; then follow him. Then the reflection that some of your near and dear kindred, may be among that forlorn and illfated number, will drive quietude from your breast, harrow your soul up with gloomy doubts, and corroding fears, and strew the path of life with thorns, which will pierce you through with many sorrows. Perhaps you will indulge a faint hope, that, although now you could not feel reconciled to such a dispensation, yet when arrived at the anticipated heaven, you will be entirely resigned. But let me ask; can you now unmoved, listen to a tale of woe? Is your heart so destitute of every tender sensibility of human nature, that you can calmly look around you, and behold your fellow beings weeping in sorrow, groaning in misery, sinking under the weight of calamity and affliction, deprived of all they once esteemed dear on earth, without one emotion of pity? if not, if the miseries of your fellow beings here, on earth, excite your tender compassion, how then will you be able to join in singing the praises of God in heaven, while you behold those who were your friends and kindred when on earth, groaning in burnings that will never end? How then, unless your soul has become transformed into that of the cold and hard hearted barbarian, will you be able to behold a scene like this, without extending your hand to their relief, or in sorrow lifting your cries for their release? Reader, think on these things; meditate seriously, examine yourself, and see whether you be in the faith. Remember that to be the children of the most high, we are required to love our enemies, to bless them that curse us; again we are commanded to love our neighbour as we do ourselves; if so, we shall feel as interested in our neighbours happiness as our own. Then ask yourself the question, if when arrived at the mansions of Glory, if you can join with the ransomed in singing the song of Redeeming love, while you reflect, that your neighbour, whom you loved as you did yourself, is consigned to never ending misery? Therefore halt no longer, I entreat you, betwixt two opinions; if the Lord be God; then follow him, but if Baal, then follow him.

Brethren in the faith once delivered to the saints, a few words to you in the sentiments of fraternal affections.

We profess to believe in that God who is the saviour of all men. This God is our refuge, and a very present help in time of trouble; therefore will we not fear, though hell with all her fiery hosts in black array conspire against us. Instead of being discouraged we have abundant reason to rejoice in the prospect that is now opening before us. The present is an eventful period in the moral world. The light and splendour of that gospel which brings life, and immortality to light, as the treasures designed by heaven for fallen man, is breaking forth in the east and in the west. The mists of moral darkness which have so long enveloped the minds of men, and prevented the light of divine truth from shining into them, are now fast vanishing away before the bright rays of the sun of righteousness. The alarm has gone forth in the cause of the enemy, and we trust will continue to progress until the walls of that fabrick, which error, bigotry, and superstition has reared in our land, will, like the walls of Jericho, tumble to the ground, to be reared no more. Already there are many, very many whose minds were once distracted by the gloomy doubts and fears of Error; that now, with gratitude bless the day when first they listened to the gospel's joyful sound, which conveyed a consolation to their troubled minds, and a balm to their wounded spirits.—They are now enabled to rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory, while they contemplated the day, when Christ who gave his life a ransom for all; shall see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied. "When his own soft hand, shall wipe the tears from every weeping eye," and when God shall mould the minds of all, into his own divine likeness, and raise them to the enjoyment of eternal life.—But my brethren, while we look around us, and behold many rejoicing in that liberty, wherewith Christ has made them free, and believe our cause to be the cause of God, and see it progressing onward in its majesty under the guidance of the omnipotent arm of Jehovah; let not this prospect of good success, cause you to slack your hands. Remember that we are surrounded by designing and intriguing enemies, who would rejoice in our down fall as a church, and delighted to see us as a people, scattered to the four winds of heaven. Because we follow not with them, they fain would call down fire from heaven to consume us. Seeing these things are so, it is all important that we should be instant in season, and out of season; and be always ready to render a reason for the hope that is within us. For we can say with the Apostle, we therefore labour, and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the saviour of all men. Yet, if in him we put our trust, we need not fear; although our foes girt us round on every side, yet if we look to the Almighty, who ruleth in the armies of heaven for support, and take to ourselves the whole armour of the Gospel, we shall be able to overcome all opposing foes, and cause their waves of malice to roll back upon themselves, to their own destruction. If we look to the throne of the most high for protection, we need not fear any condemnation against us. The Almighty will be to us a covert from the storm, and a refuge from the tempest. He will teach our hands to war, and our fingers to fight.—Let no division be seen in our ranks. Remember that "united we stand, but divided we fall." Therefore be drawn together by the cords of union, in the bands of brotherly love, then one of you will be able to chase a thousand, and two to put ten thousand to flight.—Therefore be joined heart and hand, in the cause in which you are engaged. Let not the love of the world, nor a thirst for popular applause, ever cause you to turn back, or shrink from the performance of your duty, unless you would wish to have the close of life embittered, and your soul pierced through with sorrow, by the reflection that you have lived to but little purpose, save the acquisition of worldly gain, or an empty title. What are all the treasures, titles, and honours of this world, in comparison with that diadem of glory which encircles the brow of him, who fearless of the frowns of blinded man, becomes a willing votary in the cause of truth? He has a mind that soars above the grovelling objects of earth. The vile epithets of swearing opposers disturb him not. With a firm and steady purpose of soul, he pursues on to the end of his race, with his eye fixed on heaven. When arrived at the end of his journey, the last hour of his life is lighted up with the smiles of an approving conscience, and a halo of glory encircles him, while he passes on to receive the appellation of well done good and faithful servant. Finally while we contend earnestly for the faith, once delivered to the saints; let us ever be mindful of the example of him who despising the shame, endured the cross, and is sit down on the right hand of the Majesty on high. Let that forbearance, that meekness, humility and love, which shone forth so conspicuously in the character of our exalted saviour, be ever manifest in your conduct; remember that the eyes of the world are upon you, therefore be watchful and pray, that you may be delivered from temptation, be kept from falling, and be led in that strait and narrow way, which leads to eternal life. Be imitators of God, as dear children; be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in every good work. Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, be kind and tender hearted to the evil, and to the unthankful; then shall you be called the children of the Highest. Then peaceful will be your journey through life, and in death your minds will be "calm and tranquil as the unruffled Lake, when the soft beams of the setting sun are reflected from its bosom, and leave a promise of a glorious morning to come."

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

A GENTLE HINT.

A few days since, while in conversation with a friend, I was informed that one of the "chosen few" came into the northern part of this village, to inquire into the various pursuits of certain persons, as well as to ascertain the condition of their souls. He commenced his arduous duties with a female, and in the course of his important examination, asked if Mrs. S***** (a very respectable neighbour) did not work and employ herself too much in her domestick concerns on the sabbath? and if she did not too frequently associate with the universalists? We do not know what reply our female friend made to the inquiries, but would inform that noble ambassador, that should he happen that way again, and will have the politeness to call, as we are best acquainted with ourselves and our own domestick concerns, we will give him a fair statement of facts; and if found wanting in the SCALE of justice, we humbly hope and trust that he will refer us to some passage which will teach us our duty in language so plain that those who REED may run and yet understand.

A FRIEND TO FAIR PLAY.

Auburn Nov. 3.

REMARK.

With the circumstance above hinted at, and the person referred to we are not acquainted. If there are any personal allusions we hope they may be understood (as they were doubtless intended) to correct the abuse too frequently experienced from those who meddle with other men's matters, and are in scripture appropriately denominated "busy bodies." If those over righteous persons who feel such a lively interest in the salvation of "poor immortal souls" would visit and relieve the widows and fatherless, the poor and distressed, we should think them better employed! Ed.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

To the Editor of the Gospel Advocate.

An article in your 43d No. has induced me to mature a proposition which I have for some time had in view, and offer it to the Students in the Theological Seminary in this place.

After a candid, and I trust prayerful examination of Holy Writ, I have been led to full faith in the promises of our Heavenly Father, that though Christ our Redeemer, in due season the entire family of man shall be released from sin, and placed in a state of Holiness, and consequent happiness.

I have met with much opposition from those who are prone to quote the Creeds of Men, in lieu of the Gospel. I have been called Infidel, it has been said of me that I denied the Lord that bought me—I have been gravely (and I doubt not sincerely) told, by a pious Calvinistic Divine, that my belief in the impartial and universal goodness of God would land my soul in Hell—I have heard those of my faith called Dogs; and from the ought to be sacred desk—I have heard moral and pious men anathematized, and the orthodox flock cautioned to hold them in utter detestation as Heathens—I have heard a proclamation of Jehovah's infinite love to all his creatures, called the Devil's preaching—and the Preacher, the Devil's recruiting Serjeant.

All these persecutions and many more have I witnessed; and not even with my very feeble knowledge of Biblical history, have I yet found an individual opponent in this community, but that prefers abuse to argument.

If the doctrine I have embraced is of a soul destroying nature; a damnable heresy; how vastly important that I should realize my error and forsake it;—this leads to my proposition.

I have the pleasure of a partial acquaintance with the Reverend Professors in the Seminary, and believe them to be good and pious men; with the Student's I am not much conversant, but hope in Christian charity they walk worthy of their profession.

It is not as a brag, a bet, or an insult, but with a sincere desire to elicit christian truth that I offer through you, Twenty dollars, for the best written essay against universal salvation; to be the original production of a Student in the Theological Seminary, Auburn; no less than five nor more than ten essays to be written; their comparative merit, to be decided, and a selection of one made by the Rev. Professors of said Seminary. The money to be paid on delivery of the essay to you, either by one of the Professors, or under their certificate by the first of January next, the essay to be published in the Gospel Advocate.

I repeat, the above offer is not made as a brag, a bet, or an insult; but with an earnest desire to inform myself and my fellow beings of the existence of a soul-destroying error; if such it be.

The money is not offered to buy an essay, but as a reasonable compensation for labour bestowed, and I humbly trust good may result from the inquiry. S.

¶ The gentleman who has made the above offer, has politely favoured us with his name, and the above sum will be ready for delivery at any time when the terms of the proposal shall be complied with. We pledge ourself, to publish the prize essay as soon after the first of January as possible. In addition to the above, we hereby offer, as an encouragement to greater exertion, for the second best essay against the doctrine of Universalism; a complete set of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, to be delivered to the author as above or subject to his order.

FOR THE GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

A FRAGMENT.

The kindly influence of religion on the heart and condition of man, has been contended for, in all countries and in all ages of the world. Most men who have reflected on the nature and numberless variety of the evils attending our journey through life, have ac-knowledgeed the necessity of some friendly spirit to cheer our hearts, and bear us up above the pressure of calamity. They have clasped Religion to their bosoms and pronounced her the solace of their gloomy hours and the lightener of every affliction.

Considered in this view, no philanthropist—no rational man can for a moment hesitate to enforce her claims, and persuade all to grant her a cordial reception. But alas! there is another side at which we must look—another medium through which we must contemplate the utility of what men call religion. When properly understood she is no doubt the friend of man; but such has been the folly and imprudence of her professed admirers that she has generally banished peace from our bosoms, and quietness from our dwellings. Lamentably true indeed it is, that men have debased true Religion and dressed up a sickly monster in her stead and placed around such ornaments and tinselled finery as their disordered imaginations supposed would render it attracting. At the shrine of this creature of their own manufacture they have bowed with the most blind devotion, and extolled the merits of their idol in the language of the most enthusiastic adoration. Well had it been for human felicity if this mistake had gone no farther; but such are our dispositions we think every body must love what we do, and sacrifice upon the altar of our idolatry.—Hence, not satisfied with their own infatuation, these blind worshippers have sought with the most unrelenting zeal to reduce all the rest of mankind to a like situation. Here arises the difficulty—here originated the bitter contentions and cruel persecutions which have alienated the affections of kindred—destroyed domestick felicity and scattered the poisonous seed of discord and strife in the bosom of every society.

How strange! Religion which was first sought to dissipate the melancholy of disappointment—to soften the obduracy of the heart and render man alive to the feelings and wants of man—to make all kind and relieving to each other, and in a word to entwine the cords of fraternal affections around each heart, and make all to pass smoothly and quietly along the tide of life; should be converted to a successful means of increasing that which it was designed to destroy! What is it to me whether my neighbour uses the same formula in his worship—the same phraseology in his prayers, as I do or not? What is it to me what my neighbour believes, or what are his opinions? If true, it is well, if false they cannot alter the nature of things, or render untrue the decrees of the Almighty.

If a man sustains a character consistent with moral goodness; if he maintains justice and fidelity in all his intercourse with society, and practices humanity in all its forms; what right have I to censure him? what right have I to consider him otherwise than a good man, a faithful supporter of virtue, and one who must be acceptable to God, and deserving the approbation of every friend of man?

O ye blinded, deluded disputers and theological wranglers! how long shall this gross infatuation hurry you to the destruction of every thing dear to human nature, of every thing soothing to the philanthropick bosom and joyous to the benevolent heart. Has not the past history of the church, written in blood and by the lights of expiring victims taught you, men have thought, and always will think differently upon the same subject? Has it not taught you that it is insane to attempt to reduce all to one mode of thinking, or to the adoption of a uniform system of faith? Such indeed may have been the dreams of bigots and visionaries, but whoever has marked the vast variety in the human family, must admit, that while each retains his identity, nothing like uniformity can be expected. Leave, then, your contentions about particular notions, enlarge the mind, take one expansive view of the magnitude of Jehovah's works and then ask, what importance can my opinion have in the scale of being? How can all the creatures to whom Deity has given life, be reduced to the same condition I am in? or how is it to be expected that all should worship in the same manner? Answer these questions, and you will then have learned to bear with all these differences; you will become charitable to all, willing each should believe and speak according to his own ideas of truth. You will then have true Religion; you will then enjoy yourselves, and you will be willing all others should; you will think for yourselves and be willing to grant the same to others; you will lean on God for protection, and trust in due time all will do the same.

O. A. BROWNSON.

FAITH AND GOOD WORKS.—A gentleman relates that he once received a curious illustration on this important subject from a person with something of a clerical appearance, with whom he happened to enter into conversation, while riding along the sea shore:—"Sir," said the stranger, "my opinion of the matter is this: let us suppose that I am in a boat in that bay, with two oars, one of which I call Faith and the other Good Works; now I want to proceed to that town at the head of the bay: If I put out the oar faith and pull with it, I shall only pull the boat round and round, without advancing an inch. If I lay in Faith and put out the oar Good Works, I shall just pull myself round and round only in a contrary direction; but if I pull with both oars, Faith and Good Works, and give the boat's head the proper direction, then I shall be certain of arriving at the wished for haven."

"ALBANY CHRISTIAN REGISTER"---AGAIN.

We conclude what we have to say in reply to the Christian Register, with a brief notice of the following paragraph:
